Then was there one that Sir Launcelot had sent unto that place, which went to espy what time the queen should go unto her death. And anon as he saw the queen despoiled into her smock and shriven, then he gave Sir Launcelot warning anon. Then was there but spurring and plucking up of horse, and right so¹¹ they came unto the fire. And who that stood against them, there were they slain, full many a noble knight. For there was slain Sir Beliance le Orgulous; Sir Segwarides; Sir Griflet; Sir Brandiles; Sir Aglovale; Sir Tor; Sir Gauter, Sir Gillimere, Sir Reynold, three brethren; and Sir Damas; Sir Priamus; Sir Kay l’Estrange; Sir Driaunt; Sir Lambegus; Sir Herminde; Sir Pertolope, Sir Perimones, two brethren which were called the Green Knight and the Red Knight.

And so in this rushing and hurling, as Sir Launcelot thrang here and there, it misfortuned him to slay Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, the noble knight, for they were unarmed and unware.¹² As the French book sayeth, Sir Launcelot smote Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth upon the brainpans, wherethrough that¹³ they were slain in the field. Howbeit¹⁴ in very truth Sir Launcelot saw them not. And so were they found dead among the thickest of the press.¹⁵ Then Sir Launcelot, when he had thus done, and slain and put to flight all that would withstand him, then he rode straight unto Queen Guinevere and made cast a kirtle and a gown¹ upon her, and then he made her to be set behind him and prayed her to be of good cheer. Now wit you well the queen was glad that she was at that time escaped from the death, and then she thanked God and Sir Launcelot.

And so he rode his way with the queen, as the French book sayeth, unto Joyous Gard, and there he kept her as a noble knight should. And many great lords and many good knights were sent him, and many full noble knights drew unto him. When they heard that King Arthur and Sir Launcelot were at debate² many knights were glad, and many were sorry of their debate.

Now turn we again unto King Arthur, that when it was told him how and in what manner the queen was taken away from the fire, and when he heard of the death of his noble knights, and in especial Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, then he swooned for very pure sorrow.

And when he awoke of his swough,³ then he said, "Alas, that ever I bore crown upon my head! For now have I lost the fairest fellowship of noble knights that ever held Christian king together."⁴ Alas, my good knights be slain and gone away from me, that now within this two days I have lost nigh forty knights, and also the noble fellowship of Sir Launcelot and his blood,⁵ for now I may nevermore hold them together with my worship. Now, alas, that ever this war began! Now, fair fellows," said the king, "I charge you that no man tell Sir Gawain of the death of his two brethren, for I am sure," said the king, "when he heareth tell that Sir Gareth is dead, he will go nigh⁶ out of his mind. Mercy Jesu!" said the king, "why slew he Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth? For I dare say, as for Sir Gareth, he loved Sir Launcelot of all men earthly."⁷

"That is truth," said some knights, "but they were slain in the hurling⁸ as Sir Launcelot thrang in the thickest of the press. And as they were unarmed he smote them and wist not whom that he smote, and so unhappily⁹ they were slain."

"Well," said Arthur, "the death of them will cause the greatest mortal war that ever was, for I am sure that when Sir Gawain knoweth hereof that Sir Gareth is slain, I shall never have rest of him till I have destroyed Sir Launcelot's kin and himself both, other ellis he to destroy¹⁰ me. And therefore," said the king, "wit you well, my heart was never so heavy as it is now. And much more I am sorrier for my good knights' loss than for the loss of my fair queen, for queens I might have enough, but such a fellowship of good knights shall never be together in no company. And now I dare say," said King Arthur, "there was never Christian king that ever held such a fellowship together. And alas, that ever Sir Launcelot and I should be at debate! Ah, Agravain, Agravain!" said the king, "Jesu forgive it thy soul, for thine evil will that thou hadst and Sir Mordred, thy brother, unto Sir Launcelot hath caused all this sorrow."

And ever among these complaints the king wept and swooned.

Then came there one to Sir Gawain and told him how the queen was led away with Sir Launcelot, and nigh a four-and-twenty knights slain.

"Ah, Jesu, save me my two brethren!" said Sir Gawain, "For full well wist I," said Sir Gawain, "that Sir Launcelot would rescue her, other ellis he would die in that field; and to say the truth he were not of worship but if he had rescued the queen, insomuch as she should¹¹ have been brent for his sake. And as in that," said Sir Gawain, "he hath done but knightly, and as I would have done myself and I had stood¹² in like case. But where are my brethren?" said Sir Gawain. "I marvel that I see not¹³ of them."

Then said that man, "Truly, Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth be slain."

"Jesu defend!" said Sir Gawain, "For all this world I would not that they were slain, and in especial¹⁴ my good brother Sir Gareth.”

“Sir,” said the man, “he is slain, and that is great pity.”

“Who slew him?” said Sir Gawain.

“Sir Launcelot,” said the man, “slew them both.”

“That may I not believe,” said Sir Gawain, “that ever he slew my good brother Sir Gareth, for I dare say, my brother loved him better than me and all his brethren and the king both. Also I dare say, and¹ Sir Launcelot had desired my brother Sir Gareth with him, he would have been with him against the king and us all. And therefore I may never believe that Sir Launcelot slew my brethren.”

“Verily, sir,” said the man, “it is noised² that he slew him.”

“Alas,” said Sir Gawain, “now is my joy gone!”

And then he fell down and swooned, and long he lay there as he had been dead. And when he arose out of his swough he cried out sorrowfully, and said, “Alas!”

And forthwith³ he ran unto the king, crying and weeping, and said,

“Ah, mine uncle King Arthur, my good brother Sir Gareth is slain, and so is my brother Sir Gaheris, which were two noble knights.”

Then the king wept and he both, and so they fell on swooning.

And when they were revived, then spake Sir Gawain and said, “Sir, I will go and see my brother Sir Gareth.”

“Sir, ye may not see him,” said the king, “for I caused him to be interred⁴ and Sir Gaheris both, for I well understood that ye would make overmuch sorrow, and the sight of Sir Gareth should⁵ have caused your double sorrow.”

“Alas, my lord,” said Sir Gawain, “how slew he my brother, Sir Gareth? I pray you tell me.”

“Truly,” said the king, “I shall tell you as it hath been told me: Sir Launcelot slew him and Sir Gaheris both.”

“Alas,” said Sir Gawain, “they bore none arms against him, neither of them both.”

“I wot not⁶ how it was,” said the king, “but as it is said, Sir Launcelot slew them in the thick press and knew them not. And therefore let us shape a remedy for to revenge their deaths.”

“My king, my lord, and mine uncle,” said Sir Gawain, “wit you well, now I shall make you a promise which I shall hold by my knighthood, that from this day forward I shall never fail⁷ Sir Launcelot until that one of us have slain that other. And therefore I require you, my lord and king, dress you unto the wars,⁸ for wit you well, I will be revenged upon Sir Launcelot; and therefore, as ye will have my service and my love, now haste you thereto and assay⁹ your friends. For I promise unto God,” said Sir Gawain, “for the death of my brother, Sir Gareth, I shall seek Sir Launcelot throughout seven kings’ realms, but I shall slay him, other ellis he shall slay me.”

“Sir, ye shall not need to seek him so far,” said the king, “for as I hear say, Sir Launcelot will abide¹⁰ me and us all within the castle of Joyous Gard. And much people draweth unto him as I hear say.”

“That may I right well believe,” said Sir Gawain, “but, my lord,” he said, “assay your friends and I will assay mine.”

“It shall be done,” said the king, “and as I suppose I shall be big enough to drive him out of the biggest¹¹ tower of his castle.”

So then the king sent letters and writs throughout all England, both the length and the breadth, for to asummon all his knights. And so unto King Arthur drew many knights, dukes, and earls, that he had a great host, and when they were assembled the king informed them how Sir Launcelot had bereft him¹² his queen. Then the king and all his host made them ready to lay siege about Sir Launcelot where he lay within Joyous Gard.

And anon Sir Launcelot heard thereof and purveyed him of¹³ many good knights; for with him held many knights, some for his own sake and some for the queen's sake. Thus they were on both parties well furnished and garnished of all manner of thing that longed unto¹ the war. But King Arthur's host was so great that Sir Launcelot's host would not abide² him in the field. For he was full loath to do battle against the king; but Sir Launcelot drew him unto his strong castle with all manner of victual plenty, and as many noble men as he might suffice³ within the town and the castle.

Then came King Arthur with Sir Gawain with a great host and laid siege all about Joyous Gard, both the town and the castle. And there they made strong war on both parties, but in no wise Sir Launcelot would ride out of the castle, of long time; and nother he would not suffer none of his good knights to issue out, nother of the town nother⁴ of the castle, until fifteen weeks were past.

So it fell upon a day in harvest time that Sir Launcelot looked over the walls and spake on height⁵ unto King Arthur and to Sir Gawain: "My lords both, wit you well all this is in vain that ye make at this siege, for here win ye no worship, but maugre⁶ and dishonour. For and it list me to come myself out and my good knights, I should full⁷ soon make an end of this war."

"Come forth," said King Arthur unto Sir Launcelot, "and⁸ thou darest, and I promise thee I shall meet thee in midst of this field."

"God defend me," said Sir Launcelot, "that ever I should encounter with the most noble king that made me knight."

"Now, fie upon thy fair language!"⁹ said the king, "for wit thou well and trust it, I am thy mortal foe and ever will to my death-day, for thou hast slain my good knights and full noble men of my blood, that shall I never recover again. Also thou hast lain by my queen and holden her many winters, and sithen,¹⁰ like a traitor, taken her away from me by force."

"My most noble lord and king," said Sir Launcelot, "ye may say what ye will, for ye wot well with yourself I will not strive. But thereas ye say that I have slain your good knights, I wot well that I have done so, and that me sore repenteth; but I was forced to do battle with them in saving of my life, other ellis I must have suffered¹¹ them to have slain me. And as for my lady, Queen Guinevere, except your person of your highness and my lord Sir Gawain, there nis no knight under heaven that dare make it good upon me¹² that ever I was traitor unto your person. And where it please you to say that I have holden my lady, your queen, years and winters, unto that I shall ever make a large answer, and prove it upon any knight that beareth the life,¹³ except your person and Sir Gawain, that my lady, Queen Guinevere, is as true a lady unto your person as is any lady living unto her lord, and that will I make good with my hands. Howbeit it hath liked¹⁴ her good grace to have me in favour and cherish me more than any other knight; and unto my power again I have deserved her love, for oftentimes, my lord, ye have consented that she should have be brent and destroyed in your heat, and then it fortuneth me to do¹⁵ battle for her; and or I departed from her adversary they confessed their untruth, and she full worshipfully excused.¹⁶ And at such times, my lord Arthur," said Sir Launcelot, "ye loved me and thanked me when I saved your queen from the fire, and then ye promised me forever to be my good lord. And now methinketh¹⁷ ye reward me evil for my good service. should have been brent for my sake; for sithen I have done battles for your queen in other quarrels than in mine own quarrel, meseemeth now I had more right to do battle for her in her right¹ quarrel. And therefore, my good and gracious lord," said Sir Launcelot, "take your queen unto your good grace, for she is both true and good."

"Fie on thee, false recrayed² knight!" said Sir Gawain. "For I let thee wit: my lord, mine uncle King Arthur shall have his queen and thee both maugre thy visage, and slay you both and save you, whether it please him."³

"It may well be," said Sir Launcelot, "but wit thou well, my lord Sir Gawain, and me list to come out of this castle ye should win me and the queen more harder⁴ than ever ye won a strong battle."

"Now, fie on thy proud words!" said Sir Gawain. "As for my lady the queen, wit thou well I will never say her shame.⁵ But thou, false and recrayed knight," said Sir Gawain, "what cause hadst thou to slay my good brother Sir Gareth, that loved thee more than me and all my kin? And alas, thou madest him knight thine⁶ own hands! Why slewest thou him that loved thee so well?"

"For to excuse me," said Sir Launcelot, "it boteneth me not,⁷ but by Jesu, and by the faith that I owe unto the high order of knighthood, I would with as good a will have slain my nephew Sir Bors de Ganis at that time. And alas, that ever I was so unhappy,"⁸ said Sir Launcelot, "that I had not seen Sir Gareth and Sir Gaheris!"

"Ah, thou false knight," said Sir Gawain, "that thou meanest by Sir Lamorak.¹³ But wit thou well, I slew him!"

"Sir, ye slew him not yourself," said Sir Launcelot, "for it had been overmuch for you, for he was one of the best knights christened of his age. And it was great pity of his death."

"Well, well, Sir Launcelot," said Sir Gawain, "sithen thou enbraided me of Sir Lamorak, wit thou well, I shall never leave thee till I have thee at such avail¹⁴ that thou shalt not escape my hands."

But the French book sayeth¹ King Arthur would have taken his queen again and to have been accorded with Sir Launcelot, but Sir Gawain would not suffer him by no manner of mean.² And so Sir Gawain made many men to blow upon³ Sir Launcelot, and so all at once they called him “false recrayed knight.”

But when Sir Bors de Ganis, Sir Ector de Maris, and Sir Lionel heard this outcry they called unto them Sir Palomides and Sir Lavain and Sir Urry with many more knights of their blood, and all they went unto Sir Launcelot and said thus: “My lord, wit you well we have great scorn of the great rebukes that we have heard Sir Gawain say unto you; wherefore we pray you, and charge⁴ you as ye will have our service, keep us no longer within these walls, for we let you wit plainly we will ride into the field and do battle with them. For ye fare as a man that were afeard, and for all your fair speech it will not avail you, for wit you well Sir Gawain will never suffer you to accord⁵ with King Arthur. And therefore fight for your life and right, and⁶ ye dare.”

“Alas,” said Sir Launcelot, “for to ride out of this castle and to do battle I am full loath.”

Then Sir Launcelot spake on height unto King Arthur and Sir Gawain: “My lord, I require you and beseech you, sithen that I am thus required and conjured to ride into the field, that neither you, my lord King Arthur, nother⁷ you, Sir Gawain, come not into the field.”

“What shall we do then?” said Sir Gawain. “Is not this the king’s quarrel to fight with thee? And also it is my quarrel to fight with thee because of the death of my brother, Sir Gareth.”

“Then must I needs unto battle,”⁸ said Sir Launcelot. “Now wit you well, my lord Arthur and Sir Gawain, ye will repent it whensomever⁹ I do battle with you.”

And so then they departed either from other; and then either party made them ready on the morn for to do battle, and great purveyance¹⁰ was made on both sides. And Sir Gawain let purvey many knights for to wait upon Sir Launcelot for to overset¹¹ him and to slay him. And on the morn at undern¹² King Arthur was ready in the field with three great hosts.

And then Sir Launcelot’s fellowship came out at the three gates in full good array;¹³ and Sir Lionel came in the foremost battle, and Sir Launcelot came in the middle, and Sir Bors came out at the third gate. And thus they came in order and rule¹⁴ as full noble knights. And ever Sir Launcelot charged all his knights in any wise¹⁵ to save King Arthur and Sir Gawain.

Then came forth Sir Gawain from the king’s host and proffered¹⁶ to joust. And Sir Lionel was a fierce knight, and lightly he encountered with him, and there Sir Gawain smote Sir Lionel throughout the body, that he dashed¹⁷ to the earth like as he had been dead. And then Sir Ector de Maris and other more¹⁸ bore him into the castle.

And anon there began a great stour,¹⁹ and much people were slain. And ever Sir Launcelot did what he might to save the people on King Arthur’s party. For Sir Bors and Sir Palomides and Sir Saphir overthrew many knights, for they were deadly knights, and Sir Blamour de Ganis and Sir Bleoberis, with Sir Bellinger le Beuse, these six knights did much harm. And ever was King Arthur about Sir Launcelot to have slain him, and ever

Sir Launcelot suffered¹ him and would not strike again.

So Sir Bors encountered with King Arthur, and Sir Bors smote him; and so he alighted² and drew his sword, and said to Sir Launcelot, "Sir, shall I make an end of this war?"—for he meant to have slain him.

"Not so hardy," said Sir Launcelot, "upon pain of thy head, that thou touch him no more!³ For I will never see that most noble king that made me knight nother slain nor shamed."

And therewithal Sir Launcelot alighted of his horse and took up the king and horsed him again, and said thus: "My lord the king, for God's love, stint this strife, for ye get here no worship and I would do mine utterance.⁴ But always I forbear⁵ you, and ye nor none of yours forbeareth not me. And therefore, my lord, I pray you remember what I have done in many places, and now am I evil rewarded."

So when King Arthur was on horseback he looked on Sir Launcelot; then the tears brast out of his eyen, thinking of the great courtesy⁶ that was in Sir Launcelot more than in any other man. And therewith the king rode his way, and might no longer behold him, saying to himself, "Alas, alas, that ever yet this war began!"

And then either party of the battles withdrew them to repose them, and buried the dead, and searched the wounded men, and laid to their wounds soft salves;⁷ and thus they endured that night till on the morn. And on the morn by undern they made them ready to do battle, and then Sir Bors led the vaward.⁸

So upon the morn there came Sir Gawain, as breme⁹ as any boar, with a great spear in his hand. And when Sir Bors saw him he thought to revenge his brother, Sir Lionel, of the despite¹⁰ Sir Gawain gave him the other day. And so, as they that knew either other, fewtered their spears, and with all their might of their horses and themselves so fiercely they met together and so felonously that either bore other through,¹¹ and so they fell both to the bare earth. And then the battle joined,¹² and there was much slaughter on both parties. Then Sir Launcelot rescued Sir Bors and sent him into the castle, but neither Sir Gawain nother Sir Bors died not of their wounds, for they were well holpen.¹³

Then Sir Lavain and Sir Urry prayed Sir Launcelot to do his pain¹⁴ and fight as they do: "For we see that ye forbear and spare, and that doth us much harm. And therefore we pray you spare not your enemies no more than they do you."

"Alas," said Sir Launcelot, "I have no heart to fight against my lord Arthur, for ever meseemeth¹⁵ I do not as me ought to do."

"My lord," said Sir Palomides, "though ye spare them never so much all this day, they will never con you thank; and if they may get you at avail¹⁶ ye are but a dead man."

So then Sir Launcelot understood that they said him truth. Then he strained himself more than he did toforehand, and because of his nephew, Sir Bors, was sore wounded, he pained¹⁷ himself the more. And so within a little while, by evensong¹⁸ time, Sir Launcelot's party the better stood; for their horses went in blood past the fetlocks,¹⁹ there were so many people slain. And then for very pity Sir Launcelot withheld his knights and suffered King Arthur's party to withdraw them on side.¹ And so he withdrew his meinie² into the castle, and either parties buried the dead and put salve unto the wounded men. So when Sir Gawain was hurt, they on King Arthur's party were not so orgulous³ as they were toforehand to do battle.

So of this war that was between King Arthur and Sir Launcelot it was noised through all Christian realms, and so it came at the last by relation⁴ unto the Pope. And then the Pope took a consideration of the great goodness of King Arthur and of the high prowess of Sir Launcelot, that was called the most noblest knight of the world. Wherefore the Pope called unto him a noble clerk that at that time was there present (the French book sayeth it was the Bishop of Rochester), and the Pope gave him bulls under lead, and sent them unto the king, charging him upon pain of interdicting of all England that he take his queen again and accord⁵ with Sir Launcelot.

So when this Bishop was come unto Carlisle he showed the king his bulls, and when the king understood them he wist not what to do; but full fain⁶ he would have been accorded with Sir Launcelot, but Sir Gawain would not suffer him. But to have the queen, he thereto agreed—but in no wise he would suffer the king to accord with Sir Launcelot—but as for the queen, he consented. So the Bishop had of the king his great seal and his assurance, as he was a true and anointed king, that Sir Launcelot should go safe and come safe, and that the queen should not be said unto of the king, notherof none other,⁷ for nothing done of time past. And of all these appointments the Bishop brought with him sure writing⁸ to show unto Sir Launcelot.

So when the Bishop was come to Joyous Gard, there he showed Sir Launcelot how he came from the Pope with writing unto King Arthur and unto him. And there he told him the perils, if he withheld the queen from the king.

"Sir, it was never in my thought," said Sir Launcelot, "to withhold the queen from my lord Arthur, but I keep her for this cause: insomuch as she should have been brent for my sake, meseemed it was my part to save her life and put her from that danger till better recover⁹ might come. And now I thank God," said Sir Launcelot, "that the Pope hath made her peace. For God knoweth," said Sir Launcelot, "I will be a thousandfold more gladder to bring her again than ever I was of her taking away, with this I may be sure to come safe and go safe, and that the queen shall have her liberty and never for nothing that hath been surmised afore this time that she never from this stand in no peril.¹⁰ For ellis," said Sir Launcelot, "I dare adventure me to keep her from an harder shower¹¹ than ever yet I had."

"Sir, it shall not need you," said the Bishop, "to dread thus much, for wit you well, the Pope must be obeyed, and it were not the Pope's worship nother my poor honesty¹² to know you distressed nother the queen, nother in peril nother shamed."

And then he showed Sir Launcelot all his writing, both from the Pope and King Arthur.

"This is sure enough," said Sir Launcelot, "for full well I dare trust my lord's own writing and his seal, for he was never shamed of¹³ his promise. Therefore," said Sir Launcelot unto the Bishop, "ye shall ride unto the king afore and recommend me unto his good grace, and let him have knowledging that this same day eight days,¹⁴ by the grace of God, I myself shall bring the queen unto him. And then say ye to my most redoubted king that I will say largely for the queen; that I shall none except for dread nother for fear but the king himself and my lord Sir Gawain, and that is for the king's love more than for himself."¹

So the Bishop departed and came to the king to Carlisle, and told him all how Sir Launcelot answered him; so that made the tears fall out at the king's eyen.

Then Sir Launcelot purveyed him an hundred knights, and all well clothed in green velvet, and their horses trapped² in the same to the heels, and every knight held a branch of olive in his hand in tokening of peace. And the queen had four-and-twenty gentlewomen following her in the same wise. And Sir Launcelot had twelve coursers³ following him, and on every courser sat a young gentleman; and all they were arrayed in white velvet with sarpes of gold about their quarters, and the horse trapped in the same wise down to the heels, with many ouches i-set⁴ with stones and pearls in gold, to the number of a thousand. And in the same wise was the queen arrayed, and Sir Launcelot in the same, of white cloth of gold tissue.⁵ And right so as you have heard, as the French book maketh mention, he rode with the queen from Joyous Gard to Carlisle. And so Sir Launcelot rode throughout Carlisle, and so into the castle, that all men might behold them; and there was many a weeping eyen.

And then Sir Launcelot himself alighted and voided⁶ his horse, and took adown the queen, and so led her where King Arthur was in his seat; and Sir Gawain sat afore him, and many other great lords. So when Sir Launcelot saw the king and Sir Gawain, then he led the queen by the arm, and then he kneeled down and the queen both. Wit you well, then was there many a bold knight with King Arthur that wept as tenderly as⁷ they had seen all their kin dead afore them. So the king sat still and said no word.

And when Sir Launcelot saw his countenance, he arose up and pulled up the queen with him, and thus he said full knightly: "My most redoubted king, ye shall understand, by the Pope's commandment and yours, I have brought to you my lady the queen, as right requir-eth. And if there be any knight, of what degree that ever he be of, except your person, that will say or dare say but that she is true and clean⁸ to you, I here myself, Sir Launcelot du Lake, will make it good upon his body that she is a true lady unto you.

"But, sir, liars ye have listened, and that hath caused great debate⁹ betwixt you and me. For time hath been, my lord Arthur, that ye were greatly pleased with me when I did battle for my lady, your queen; and full well ye know, my most noble king, that she hath be put to great wrong or¹⁰ this time. And sithen it pleased you at many times that I should fight for her, therefore meseemeth,¹¹ my good lord, I had more cause to rescue her from the fire when she should have been brent for my sake.

"For they that told you those tales were liars, and so it fell upon them; for by likelihood, had not the might of God been with me, I might never have endured with fourteen knights, and they armed and afore purposed, and I unarmed and not purposed; for I was sent unto my lady, your queen, I wot not for what cause, but I was not so soon within the chamber door but anon¹² Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred called me traitor and false regrayed knight."

"By my faith, they called thee right!" said Sir Gawain.

"My lord, Sir Gawain," said Sir Launcelot, "in their quarrel¹³ they proved not themselves the best, nother in the right."

"Well, well, Sir Launcelot," said the king, "I have given you no cause to do to me as ye have done, for I have worshipped¹ you and yours more than any other knights.”

“My lord,” said Sir Launcelot, “so ye be not displeased, ye shall understand that I and mine have done you oftentimes better service than any other knights have done, in many diverse places; and where ye have been full hard bestead diverse times, I have rescued you from many dangers; and ever unto my power² I was glad to please you and my lord Sir Gawain. In jousts and in tournaments and in battles set, both on horseback and on foot, I have often rescued you, and you, my lord Sir Gawain, and many more of your knights in many diverse places.

“For now I will make avaunt,” said Sir Launcelot: “I will that ye all wit that as yet I found never no manner of knight but that I was overhard for him and I had done mine utterance, God grant mercy!³ Howbeit I have been matched with good knights, as Sir Tristram and Sir Lamorak, but ever I had favour unto them and a deeming what they were.⁴ And I take God to record, I never was wroth nor greatly heavy with no good knight and I saw him busy and about to win worship; and glad I was ever when I found a good knight that might anything⁵ endure me on horseback and on foot. Howbeit Sir Carados of the Dolorous Tower was a full noble knight and a passing strong man, and that wot ye, my lord Sir Gawain; for he might well be called a noble knight when he by fine force pulled you out of your saddle and bound you overthwart afore him to his saddle-bow.⁶ And there, my lord Sir Gawain, I rescued you and slew him afore your sight. Also I found your brother, Sir Gaheris, and Sir Tarquin leading him abunden afore him; and there also I rescued your brother and slew Sir Tarquin and delivered three-score-and-four⁷ of my lord Arthur’s knights out of his prison. And now I dare say,” said Sir Launcelot, “I met never with so strong a knight nor so well-fighting as was Sir Carados and Sir Tarquin, for they and I fought to the uttermost. And therefore,” said Sir Launcelot unto Sir Gawain, “meseemeth ye ought of right to remember this; for, and⁸ I might have your good will, I would trust to God for to have my lord Arthur’s good grace.”

“Sir, the king may do as he will,” said Sir Gawain, “but wit thou well, Sir Launcelot, thou and I shall never be accorded while we live, for thou hast slain three of my brethren. And two of them thou slew traitorly and piteously, for they bore none harness against thee, nother none would do.”⁹

“Sir, God would they had been armed,” said Sir Launcelot, “for then had they been on life.¹⁰ And as for Gareth, I loved no kinsman I had more than I loved him, and ever while I live,” said Sir Launcelot, “I will bewail Sir Gareth his¹¹ death, not all only for the great fear I have of you, but for many causes which causeth me to be sorrowful. One is that I made him knight; another is, I wot well he loved me above all other knights; and the third is, he was passing noble and true, courteous and gentle and well-conditioned.¹² The fourth is, I wist well, anon as I heard that Sir Gareth was dead, I knew well that I should never after have your love, my lord Sir Gawain, but everlasting war betwixt us. And also I wist well that ye would cause my noble lord King Arthur forever to be my mortal foe. And as Jesu be my help, and by my knighthood, I slew never Sir Gareth nother his brother by my willing; but alas that ever they were unarmed that unhappy day!

“But this much I shall offer me to you,” said Sir Launcelot, “if it may please the king’s good grace and you, my lord Sir Gawain: I shall first begin at Sandwich, and there I shall go in my shirt, bare-foot, and at every

And this shall I perform while that I have any livelihood in Christendom, and there is none of all these religious places but they shall be performed, furnished and garnished² with all things as an holy place ought to be. And this were fairer and more holier and more parfit to their souls than ye, my most noble king, and you, Sir Gawain, to war upon me, for thereby shall ye get none avail."³

Then all the knights and ladies that were there wept as they were mad, and the tears fell on King Arthur his⁴ cheeks.

"Sir Launcelot," said Sir Gawain, "I have right well heard thy language and thy great proffers.⁵ But wit thou well, let the king do as it pleaseth him, I will never forgive thee my brothers' death, and in especial the death of my brother Sir Gareth. And if mine uncle, King Arthur, will accord with thee, he shall lose my service, for wit thou well," said Sir Gawain, "thou art both false to the king and to me."

"Sir," said Sir Launcelot, "he beareth not the life that may make it good!⁶ And ye, Sir Gawain, will charge me with so high a thing, ye must pardon me, for then needs must I answer you."⁷

"Nay, nay," said Sir Gawain, "we are past that as at this time, and that causeth⁸ the Pope, for he hath charged mine uncle the king that he shall take again his queen and to accord with thee, Sir Launcelot, as for this season, and therefore thou shalt go safe as thou came.

But in this land thou shalt not abide past a fifteen-days, such summons I give thee, for so the king and we were condescended and accorded ere⁹ thou came. And ellis," said Gawain, "wit thou well, thou should not a-comen here but if it were maugre thine head.¹⁰ And if it were not for the Pope's commandment," said Sir Gawain, "I should do battle with thee mine own hands, body for body, and prove it upon thee that thou hast been both false unto mine uncle, King Arthur, and to me both; and that shall I prove on thy body, when thou art departed from hence, wheresomever¹¹ that I find thee!"

Then Sir Launcelot sighed, and therewith the tears fell on his cheeks, and then he said thus: "Most noblest Christian realm, whom I have loved aboven all other realms! And in thee I have gotten a great part of my worship, and now that I shall depart in this wise, truly me repents¹² that ever I came in this realm, that I should be thus shamefully banished, undeserved and causeless. But fortune is so variant, and the wheel so mutable¹³ that there is no constant abiding. And that may be proved by many chronicles, as of noble Hector of Troy and Alexander, the mighty conqueror, and many more other: when they were most in their royalty, they alighted passing low.¹⁴ And so fareth it by¹⁵ me," said Sir Launcelot, "for in this realm I had worship, and by me and mine all the whole Round Table hath been increased more in worship, by me and mine, than ever it was by any of you all.

"And therefore wit thou well, Sir Gawain, I may live upon my lands as well as any knight that here is. And if ye, my most redoubted king, will come upon my lands with Sir Gawain to war upon me, I must endure you as well as I may. But as to you, Sir Gawain, if that ye come there, I pray you charge me not with treason nother felony, for and ye do, I must answer you."

"Do thou thy best," said Sir Gawain, "and therefore hie¹ thee fast that thou were gone. And wit thou well we shall soon come after, and break the strongest castle that thou hast, upon thy head!"

"It shall not need that," said Sir Launcelot, "for and I were as orgulous set as ye are, wit you well I should² meet you in midst of the field."

"Make thou no more language," said Sir Gawain, "but deliver the queen from thee, and pick thee lightly³ out of this court!"

"Well," said Sir Launcelot, "and I had wist of this shortcoming, I would 'a advised me twice or that⁴ I had come here. For and the queen had been so dear unto me as ye noise her, I durst have kept⁵ her from the fellowship of the best knights under heaven."

And then Sir Launcelot said unto Queen Guinevere, in hearing of the king and them all, "Madam, now I must depart from you and this noble fellowship forever. And sithen it is so, I beseech⁶ you to pray for me, and I shall pray for you. And tell ye me, and if ye be hard bestead by any false tongues, but lightly, my good lady, send me word; and if any knight's hands under the heaven may deliver⁷ you by battle, I shall deliver you."

And therewithal Sir Launcelot kissed the queen, and then he said all openly,

"Now let see whatsomever he be in this place that dare say the queen is not true unto my lord Arthur, let see who will speak and⁸ he dare speak."

And therewith he brought the queen to the king, and then Sir Launcelot took his leave and departed. And there was nother king, duke, earl, baron, nor knight, lady nor gentlewoman, but all they wept as people out of mind, except Sir Gawain. And when this noble knight Sir Launcelot took his horse to ride out of Carlisle, there was sobbing and weeping for pure dole of⁹ his departing.

And so he took his way to Joyous Gard, and then ever after he called it the "Dolorous Gard."¹⁰ And thus departed Sir Launcelot from the court forever.

And so when he came to Joyous Gard, he called his fellowship unto him and asked them what they would do. Then they answered all wholly together with one voice, they would do as he would do.

"Then, my fair fellows," said Sir Launcelot, "I must depart out of this most noble realm. And now I shall depart, it grieveth me sore, for I shall depart with no worship for a flemed man departeth never out of a realm with no¹¹ worship. And that is to me great heaviness, for ever I fear after my days¹² that men shall chronicle upon me that I was flemed out of this land. And ellis, my fair lords, be ye sure, and I had not drad shame, my lady Queen Guinevere and I should¹³ never have departed."

Then spake noble knights, as Sir Palomides and Sir Saphir, his brother, and Sir Bellinger le Beuse, and Sir Urry with Sir Lavain, with many other: "Sir, and ye will so be disposed to abide in this land we will never fail you; and if ye list¹⁴ not abide in this land, there is none of the good knights that here be that will fail you, for many causes. realm, wit you well it shall like us as well to go in other countries with you, and there to take such part as you do.”¹

“My fair lords,” said Sir Launcelot, “I well understand you, and as I can, I thank you. And ye shall understand, such livelihood as I am born unto I shall depart with you in this manner of wise: that is for to say, I shall depart all my livelihood and all my lands freely among you, and myself will have as little as any of you; for, have I sufficient that may long unto my person, I will ask none other riches nother array.² And I trust to God to maintain you³ on my lands as well as ever ye were maintained.”

Then spake all the knights at once: “Have he shame that will leave you! For we all understand in this realm will be now no quiet, but ever debate⁴ and strife, now the fellowship of the Round Table is broken. For by the noble fellowship of the Round Table was King Arthur upborne, and by their noblesse⁵ the king and all the realm was ever in quiet and rest. And a great part,” they said all, “was because of your most noblesse, Sir Launcelot.”

“Now, truly I thank you all of your good saying. Howbeit, I wot well that in me was not all the stability of this realm, but in that I might I did my devoir.⁶ And well I am sure I knew many rebellions in my days that by me and mine were peased; and that I trow we all shall hear of in short space, and that me sore repenteth.⁷ For ever I dread me,”⁸ said Sir Launcelot, “that Sir Mordred will make trouble, for he is passing envious, and applyeth him much to trouble.”

And so they were accorded to depart with Sir Launcelot to his lands. And to make short this tale, they trussed, and paid⁹ all that would ask them; and wholly an hundred knights departed with Sir Launcelot at once, and made their avows they would never leave him for weal ne for woe.¹⁰ And so they shipped at Cardiff, and sailed unto Benwick (some men call it Bayonne and some men call it Beaune, where the wine of Beaune is). But to say the sooth, Sir Launcelot and his nephews was lords of all France and of all the lands that longed unto France; he and his kindred rejoiced¹¹ it, all through Sir Launcelot’s noble prowess. And then he stuffed and furnished and garnished¹² all his noble towns and castles. Then all the people of those lands came unto Sir Launcelot on foot and hands.¹³ And so when he had stablished¹⁴ all those countries, he shortly called a parliament, and there he crowned Sir Lionel king of France; and Sir Bors he crowned him king of all King Claudas’ lands; and Sir Ector de Maris, Sir Launcelot’s younger brother, he crowned him king of Benwick and king of all Guienne, which was Sir Launcelot’s own lands; and he made Sir Ector prince of them all.

And thus he departed his lands and advanced¹⁵ all his noble knights. And first he advanced them of his blood, as Sir Blamour, he made him duke of Limousin in Guienne; and Sir Bleoberis, he made him duke of Poitiers; and Sir Gahalantine, he made him duke of Auvergne; and Sir Galihodin, he made him duke of Saintonge; and Sir Galihud, he made him earl of Périgord; and Sir Menaduke, he made him earl of Rouergue; and Sir Villiers the Valiant, he made him earl of Béarn; and Sir Hebes le Renowne, he made him earl of Comminges; and Sir Lavain, he made him earl of Armagnac; and Sir Urry, he made him earl of Astarac; and Sir Neroveus, he made him earl of Pardiac; and Sir Plenorius, he made him earl of Foix; and Sir Selises of the Dolorous Tower, he made him earl of Marsan; and Sir Melias de Lisle, he made him earl of Tursan; and Sir

Bellengere le Beuse, he made him earl of the Landes; and Sir Palomides, he made him duke of Provence; and Sir Saphir, he made him duke of Languedoc; and Sir Clegis, he gave him the earldom of Agen; and Sir Sadok, he gave him the earldom of Sarlat; and Sir Dinas le Seneschal, he made him duke of Anjou; and Sir Clarrus, he made him duke of Normandy. Thus Sir Launcelot rewarded his noble knights, and many more meseemeth¹ it were too long to rehearse.

So leave we Sir Launcelot in his lands and his noble knights with him, and return we again unto King Arthur and unto Sir Gawain that made a great host aready to the number of three-score thousand.² And all thing was made ready for shipping to pass over the sea, to war upon Sir Launcelot and upon his lands. And so they shipped at Cardiff. And there King Arthur made Sir Mordred chief ruler of all England, and also he put the queen under his governance; because Sir Mordred was King Arthur's son, he gave him rule of his land and of his wife. And so the king passed the sea and landed upon Sir Launcelot's lands, and there he brent³ and wasted, through the vengeance of Sir Gawain, all that they might overrun.

So when this word was come unto Sir Launcelot, that King Arthur and Sir Gawain were landed upon his lands and made full great destruction and waste, then spake Sir Bors and said, "My lord, Sir Launcelot, it is shame that we suffer⁴ them thus to ride over our lands. For wit you well, suffer ye them as long as ye will, they will do you no favour and they may handle⁵ you."

Then said Sir Lionel, that was ware and wise, "My lord, Sir Launcelot, I will give you this counsel: let us keep our strong-walled towns until they have hunger and cold and blow on their nails, and then let us freshly set upon them and shred them down as sheep in a fold, that ever after aliaunts may take ensample how they land upon our lands."⁶

Then spake King Bagdemagus to Sir Launcelot and said, "Sir, your courtesy will shend us all, and your courtesy hath waked all this sorrow; for and they thus override our lands, they shall by process bring us all to nought⁷ while we thus in holes us hide."

Then said Sir Galihud unto Sir Launcelot, "Sir, here been knights come of king's blood that will not long droop and dare⁸ within these walls. Therefore give us leave, like as we been knights, to meet them in the field, and we shall so deal with them that they shall curse the time that ever they came into this country."

Then spake seven brethren of North Wales which were seven noble knights—for a man might seek seven kings' lands or⁹ he might find such seven knights—and these seven noble knights said all at once, "Sir Launcelot, for Christ's sake, let us ride out with Sir Galihud, for we were never wont to cower in castles nother¹⁰ in noble towns."

Then spake Sir Launcelot, that was master and governor of them all, and said, "My fair lords, wit you well I am full loath to ride out with my knights for shedding of Christian blood; and yet my lands I understand be full bare for to sustain any host awhile for the mighty wars that whilom¹¹ made King Claudas upon this country and upon my father, King Ban, and on mine uncle, King Bors. Howbeit¹² we will at this time keep our strong walls. And I shall send a messenger unto my lord Arthur a treatise for to take, for better is peace than always war."

So Sir Launcelot sent forth a damsel with a dwarf with her, requiring¹³ King Arthur to leave his warring upon his lands. And so she start upon a palfrey,¹⁴ and a dwarf ran by her side.

And when she came to the pavilion of King Arthur, there she alighted, and there met her a gentle¹⁵ knight, Sir Lucan the Butler, and said, "Fair damsel, come ye from Sir Launcelot du Lake?"

"Yea, sir," she said, "therefore came I hither, to speak with my lord the king."

"Alas," said Sir Lucan, "my lord Arthur would accord with Sir Launcelot, but Sir Gawain will not suffer him." And then he said, "I pray to God, damsel, that ye may speed, for all we that been about the king would¹ that Launcelot did best of any knight living."

And so with this Sir Lucan led the damsel to the king, where he sat with Sir Gawain, for to hear what she would say. So when she had told her tale the water ran out of the king's eyen.² And all the lords were full³ glad for to advise the king to be accorded with Sir Launcelot, save all only Sir Gawain.

And he said, "My lord, mine uncle, what will ye do? Will ye now turn again, now ye are passed this far upon your journey? All the world will speak of you villainy⁴ and shame."

"Now," said King Arthur, "wit you well, Sir Gawain, I will do as ye advise me; and yet meseemeth," said King Arthur, "his fair proffers⁵ were not good to be refused. But sithen I am come so far upon this journey, I will that ye give the damsel her answer, for I may not speak to her for pity, for her proffers been so large."⁶

Then Sir Gawain said unto the damsel, "Thus say ye to Sir Launcelot, that it is waste labour now to sue to⁷ mine uncle. For tell him, and he would have made any labour for peace, he should have made it or⁸ this time, for tell him now it is too late. And say to him that I, Sir Gawain, so send him word, that I promise him by the faith that I owe to God and to knighthood, I shall never leave him till he hath slain me or I him!"

So the damsel wept and departed, and so there was many a weeping eye. And then Sir Lucan brought the damsel to her palfrey, and so she came to Sir Launcelot, where he was among all his knights. And when Sir Launcelot had heard her answer, then the tears ran down by his cheeks.

And then his noble knights came about him and said, "Sir Launcelot, wherefore make ye such cheer?"⁹ Now think what ye are, and what men we are, and let us noble knights match them in midst of the field."

"That may be lightly¹⁰ done," said Sir Launcelot, "but I was never so loath to do battle. And therefore I pray you, sirs, as ye love me, be ruled at this time as I will have you. For I will always flee that noble king that made me knight; and when I may no further, I must needs¹¹ defend me. And that will be more worship for me and us all than to compare¹² with that noble king whom we have all served."

Then they held their language,¹³ and as that night they took their rest. And upon the morning early, in the dawning of the day, as knights looked out, they saw the city of Benwick besieged round about, and gan¹⁴ fast to set up ladders. And they within kept them out of the town and beat them mightily from the walls.

Then came forth Sir Gawain, well armed, upon a stiff¹⁵ steed, and he came before the chief gate with his spear in his hand, crying: "Where art thou, Sir Launcelot? Is there none of all your proud knights that dare break a spear with me?"

Then Sir Bors made him ready and came forth out of the town. And there Sir Gawain encountered with Sir Bors, and at that time he smote¹⁶ him down from his horse, and almost he had slain him. And so Sir Bors was rescued and borne into the town. Then came forth Sir Lionel and thought to revenge him, and either fewtered their spears and so ran together, and there they met spitously, but Sir Gawain had such a grace that he smote Sir Lionel down and wounded him there passingly sore.¹⁷ And then Sir Lionel was rescued and borne into the town. And thus Sir Gawain came every day, and failed not but that he smote down one knight or other.

So thus they endured half a year, and much slaughter was of people on both parties.

Then it befell upon a day that Sir Gawain came afore the gates, armed at all pieces,¹ on a noble horse, with a great spear in his hand, and then he cried with a loud voice and said, "Where art thou now, thou false traitor, Sir Launcelot? Why holdest thou thyself within holes and walls like a coward? Look out, thou false traitor knight, and here I shall revenge upon thy body the death of my three brethren!"

And all this language heard Sir Launcelot every deal.²

Then his kin and his knights drew about him, and all they said at once unto Sir Launcelot, "Sir, now must you defend you like a knight, other ellis ye be shamed forever, for now ye be called upon³ treason it is time for you to stir. For ye have slept over long and suffered⁴ overmuch."

"So God me help," said Sir Launcelot, "I am right heavy at Sir Gawain's words, for now he chargeth⁵ me with a great charge. And therefore I wot as well as ye I must needs defend me, other ellis to be recreant."⁶

Then Sir Launcelot bade⁷ saddle his strongest horse and bade let fetch his arms and bring all to the tower of the gate.

And then Sir Launcelot spake on height⁸ unto the king and said, "My lord Arthur and noble king that made me knight, wit you well I am right heavy for your sake that ye thus sue upon me."⁹ And always I forbear you, for and I would be vengeable I might have met you in midst the field or this time, and thereto¹⁰ have made your boldest knights full tame. And now I have forborne you and suffered you half a year, and Sir Gawain, to do what ye would¹¹ do. And now I may no longer suffer to endure, but needs I must defend myself, insomuch as Sir Gawain hath becalled me of treason; which is greatly against my will that ever I should fight against any of your blood, but now I may not forsake it—for I am driven thereto as beast till a bay."¹²

Then Sir Gawain said unto Sir Launcelot, "And thou darest do battle, leave thy babbling and come off,¹³ and let us ease our hearts!"

Then Sir Launcelot armed him and mounted upon his horse, and either of them got great spears in their hands. And so the host without stood still all apart, and the noble knights of the city came a great number, that when King Arthur saw the number of men and knights he marvelled and said to himself, "Alas, that ever Sir Launcelot was against me! For now I see that he hath forborne me." And so the covenant was made, there should no man nigh them nother deal with them till the tone were dead other yolden.¹⁴

Then Sir Launcelot and Sir Gawain departed a great way in sunder, and then they came together with all their horse¹⁵ mights as fast as they might run, and either smote other in midst of their shields. But the knights were so strong and their spears so big that their horse might not endure their buffets,¹⁶ and so their horses fell to the earth. And then they avoided their horses and dressed their shields afore them; then they came together and gave many sad strokes on diverse places of their bodies, that the blood brast¹⁷ out on many sides.

Then had Sir Gawain such a grace and gift that an holy man had given him, that every day in the year, from undern¹⁸ till high noon, his might increased those three hours as much as thrice his strength. And that caused Sir Gawain to win great honour. And for his sake

King Arthur made an ordinance that all manner of battles for any quarrels that should be done afore King Arthur should begin at undern; and all was done for Sir Gawain's love, that by likelihood if Sir Gawain were on the one party, he should have the better in battle while his strength endured three hours. But there were that time but few knights living that knew this advantage that Sir Gawain had, but King Arthur all only.

So Sir Launcelot fought with Sir Gawain, and when Sir Launcelot felt his might evermore increase, Sir Launcelot wondered and dard him sore to be shamed; for, as the French book sayeth, he weened,¹ when he felt Sir Gawain's double his strength, that he had been a fiend and none earthly man. Wherefore Sir Launcelot traced and traversed,² and covered himself with his shield, and kept his might and his breath during three hours. And that while Sir Gawain gave him many sad brunts,³ that all knights that beheld Sir Launcelot marvelled how he might endure him, but full little understood they that travail that Sir Launcelot had to endure him. And then when it was past noon Sir Gawain's strength was gone and he had no more but his own might.

When Sir Launcelot felt him so come down, then he stretched him up and strode near Sir Gawain and said thus: "Now I feel ye have done your worst! And now, my lord Sir Gawain, I must do my part, for many a great and grievous strokes I have endured you this day with great pain."

And so Sir Launcelot doubled his strokes and gave Sir Gawain such a stroke upon the helmet that sideling⁴ he fell down upon his one side. And Sir Launcelot withdrew him from him.

"Why withdrawest thou thee?" said Sir Gawain. "Turn again, false traitor knight, and slay me out! For and thou leave me thus, anon as⁵ I am whole I shall do battle with thee again."

"Sir," said Sir Launcelot, "I shall endure you, by God's grace! But wit thou well, Sir Gawain, I will never smite⁶ a felled knight."

And so Sir Launcelot departed and went unto the city. And Sir Gawain was borne unto King Arthur's pavilion, and anon leeches were brought unto him of the best, and searched⁷ and salved him with soft ointments.

And then Sir Launcelot said, "Now have good day, my lord the king! For wit you well ye win no worship at these walls, for and I would my knights outbring, there should many a doughty⁸ man die. And therefore, my lord Arthur, remember you of old kindness, and howsoever⁹ I fare, Jesu be your guide in all places."

"Now, alas," said the king, "that ever this unhappy¹⁰ war began! For ever Sir Launcelot forbearth me in all places, and in like wise my kin, and that is seen well this day, what courtesy¹¹ he showed my nephew, Sir Gawain."

Then King Arthur fell sick for sorrow of Sir Gawain, that he was so sore hurt, and because of the war betwixt him and Sir Launcelot. So after that they on King Arthur's party kept the siege with little war without-forth, and they withinforth kept their walls and defended them when need was.

Thus Sir Gawain lay sick and unsound three weeks in his tents with all manner of leechcraft¹² that might be had. And as soon as Sir Gawain might go and ride, he armed him at all points and bestrode a stiff courser and got a great spear in his hand, and so he came riding afore the chief gate of Benwick. And there he cried on height and said,

"Where art thou, Sir Launcelot? Come forth, thou false traitor knight and recrayed,¹³ for I am here, Sir Gawain, that will prove this that I say upon thee!"

And all this language Sir Launcelot heard, and said thus: "Sir Gawain, me repents of¹ your foul saying, that ye will not cease your language. For ye wot well, Sir Gawain, I know your might and all that ye may² do, and well ye wot, Sir Gawain, ye may not greatly hurt me."

"Come down, traitor knight," said he, "and make it good the contrary with thy hands! For it mishapped me the last battle to be hurt of thy hands; therefore, wit thou well, I am come this day to make amends, for I ween³ this day to lay thee as low as thou laigest me."

"Jesu defend me," said Sir Launcelot, "that ever I be so far in your danger⁴ as ye have been in mine, for then my days were done. But, Gawain," said Launcelot, "ye shall not think that I shall tarry long, but sithen that ye unknighly call me thus of treason, ye shall have both your hands full of me."

And then Sir Launcelot armed him at all points and mounted upon his horse and got a great spear in his hand and rode out at the gate. And both their hosts were assembled, of them without and within, and stood in array full manly, and both parties were charged⁵ to hold them still to see and behold the battle of these two noble knights. And then they laid their spears in their rests and so came together as thunder. And Sir Gawain brake his spear in an hundred pieces to his hand, and Sir Launcelot smote him with a greater might, that Sir Gawain's horse feet raised, and so the horse and he fell to the earth.

Then Sir Gawain deliverly devoided⁶ his horse and put his shield afore him, and eagerly drew his sword and bade Sir Launcelot, "Alight, traitor knight!" and said, "If a mare's son hath failed me, wit thou well a king's son and a queen's son⁷ shall not fail thee."

Then Sir Launcelot devoided his horse and dressed his shield afore him and drew his sword, and so came⁸ eagerly together and gave many sad strokes, that all men on both parties had wonder. But when Sir Launcelot felt

Sir Gawain's might so marvellously increase, he then withheld his courage and his wind, and so he kept him under covert⁹ of his might and of his shield: he traced and traversed here and there to break Sir Gawain's strokes and his courage. And ever Sir Gawain enforced himself with all his might and power to destroy Sir Launcelot, for, as the French book sayeth, ever as Sir Gawain's might increased, right so¹⁰ increased his wind and his evil will. And thus he did great pain unto Sir Launcelot three hours, that he had much ado to defend him.¹¹

And when the three hours were passed, that he felt Sir Gawain was come home to his own proper strength, then Sir Launcelot said,

"Sir, now I have proved you twice that ye are a full dangerous knight and a wonderful man of might,¹² and many wonder deeds have ye done in your days, for by your might increasing ye have deceived many a full noble knight. And now I feel that ye have done your mighty deeds, and now, wit you well, I must do my deeds."

And then Sir Launcelot strode near Sir Gawain and doubled his strokes, and ever Sir Gawain defended him mightily, but nevertheless Sir Launcelot smote such a stroke upon his helm, and upon the old wound, that Sir Gawain sank down and swooned.

And anon as he did awake he waved and foined¹³ at Sir Launcelot as he lay, and said, "Traitor knight, wit thou well I am not yet slain. Therefore come thou near me and perform this battle to the utterance!"¹⁴

"I will no more do than I have done," said Sir Launcelot. "For when I see you on foot I will do battle upon you all the while I see you stand upon your feet; but to smite a wounded man that may not stand, God defend me from such a shame!"

And then he turned his way toward the city; and Sir Gawain evermore calling him "traitor knight" and said,

Thus as this siege endured, and as Sir Gawain lay sick nearhand a month, and when he was well recovered and ready within three days to do battle again with Sir Launcelot, right so² came tidings unto King Arthur from England that made King Arthur and all his host to remove.

As Sir Mordred was ruler of all England, he let make letters³ as though that they had come from beyond the sea, and the letters specified that King Arthur was slain in battle with Sir Launcelot. Wherefore⁴ Sir Mordred made a parliament, and called the lords together, and there he made them to choose him king. And so was he crowned at Canterbury, and held a feast there fifteen days.

And afterward he drew him unto Winchester, and there he took Queen Guinevere, and said plainly that he would wed her (which was his uncle's wife and his father's wife).

And so he made ready for the feast, and a day prefixed that they should be wedded; wherefore Queen Guinevere was passing heavy, but she durst not discover⁵ her heart, but spake fair, and agreed to Sir Mordred's will. And anon she desired of Sir Mordred to go to London to buy all manner things that longed⁶ to the bridal. And because of her fair speech Sir Mordred trusted her and gave her leave. And so when she came to London she took the Tower of London and suddenly in all haste possible she stuffed it with all manner of victual, and well garnished⁷ it with men, and so kept it.

And when Sir Mordred wist this he was passing wroth out of measure.⁸ And short tale to make, he laid a mighty siege about the Tower and made many assaults, and threw engines unto them, and shot great guns.⁹ But all might not prevail, for Queen Guinevere would never, for fair speech nother¹⁰ for foul, never to trust unto Sir Mordred to come in his hands again.

Then came the Bishop of Canterbury, which was a noble clerk¹¹ and an holy man, and thus he said unto Sir Mordred: "Sir, what will ye do? Will ye first displease God and sithen¹² shame yourself and all knighthood? For is not King Arthur your uncle, and no farther but your mother's brother, and upon her he himself begat you, upon his own sister?¹³ Therefore how may ye wed your own father's wife? And therefore, sir," said the Bishop, "leave this opinion, other ellis I shall curse you with book, bell and candle."¹⁴

"Do thou thy worst," said Sir Mordred, "and I defy thee!"

"Sir," said the Bishop, "wit you well I shall not fear me to do that me¹⁵ ought to do. And also ye noise¹⁶ that my lord Arthur is slain, and that is not so, and therefore ye will make a foul work in this land!"

"Peace, thou false priest!" said Sir Mordred, "for and thou chafe¹⁷ me anymore, I shall strike off thy head."

So the Bishop departed, and did the cursing in the most orgulust wise¹⁸ that might be done. And then Sir Mordred sought the Bishop of Canterbury for to have slain him. Then the Bishop fled, and took part of his goods with him, and went nigh unto¹ Glastonbury. And there he was a priest-hermit in a chapel, and lived in poverty and in holy prayers; for well he understood that mischievous² war was at hand.

Arthur does not know that Morgause is his sister until after they have slept together. She becomes pregnant with Mordred, who is thus both Arthur's nephew and his son.

Then Sir Mordred sought upon Queen Guinevere by letters and sonds,³ and by fair means and foul means, to have her to come out of the Tower of London. But all this availed nought, for she answered him shortly, openly and privily, that she had liefer⁴ slay herself than be married with him.

Then came there word unto Sir Mordred that King Arthur had araised the siege from Sir Launcelot and was coming homeward with a great host to be avenged upon Sir Mordred; wherefore Sir Mordred made write writs unto all the barony⁵ of this land, and much people drew unto him. For then was the common voice among them that with King Arthur was never other life but war and strife, and with Sir Mordred was great joy and bliss. Thus was King Arthur depraved and evil said of; and many there were that King Arthur had brought up of nought,⁶ and given them lands, that might not then say him a good word.

Lo ye all Englishmen, see ye not what a mischief⁷ here was? For he that was the most⁸ king and noblest knight of the world, and most loved the fellowship of noble knights—and by him they all were upholden—and yet might not these Englishmen hold them content with him. Lo, thus was the old custom and usages⁹ of this land, and men say that we of this land have not yet lost that custom. Alas, this is a great default of us Englishmen, for there may no thing us please no term.¹⁰

And so fared the people at that time: they were better pleased with Sir Mordred than they were with the noble King Arthur, and much people drew unto Sir Mordred and said they would abide with him for better and for worse. And so Sir Mordred drew with a great host to Dover, for there he heard say that King Arthur would arrive, and so he thought to beat his own father from his own lands. And the most party of all England held with Sir Mordred, for the people were so newfangle.¹¹

And so as Sir Mordred was at Dover with his host, so came King Arthur with a great navy of ships and galleys and carracks, and there was Sir Mordred ready awaiting upon his landing, to let his own father to land¹² upon the land that he was king over. Then there was launching of great boats and small, and full of noble men of arms; and there was much slaughter of gentle knights, and many a full bold baron was laid full low¹³ on both parties. But King Arthur was so courageous that there might no manner of knight let him to land,¹⁴ and his knights fiercely followed him. And so they landed maugre Sir Mordred's head¹⁵ and all his power, and put Sir Mordred aback, and all his people.

So when this battle was done King Arthur let search¹⁶ his people that were hurt and dead. And then was noble Sir Gawain found in a great boat, lying more than half dead. When King Arthur knew that he was laid so low, he went unto him and so found him. And there the king made great sorrow out of measure, and took Sir Gawain in his arms, and thrice he there swooned.

And then when he was waked, King Arthur said, "Alas! Sir Gawain, my sister¹⁷ son, here now thou liest, the man in the world that I loved most. And now is my joy gone. now have I lost my joy of you both, wherefore all mine earthly joy is gone from me.”

“Ah, mine uncle,” said Sir Gawain, “now I will that ye wit¹ that my death-days be come. And all I may wite mine own hastiness and my wilfulness, for through my wilfulness I was causer of mine own death; for I was this day hurt and smitten upon mine old wound that Sir Launcelot gave me, and I feel myself that I must needs² be dead by the hour of noon. And through me and my pride ye have all this shame and disease, for had that noble knight Sir Launcelot been with you, as he was and would have been, this unhappy war had never been begun; for he, through his noble knighthood and his noble blood, held all your cankered enemies in subjection and danger.³ And now,” said Sir Gawain, “ye shall miss Sir Launcelot. But alas that I would not accord with him! And therefore, fair uncle, I pray you that I may have paper, pen, and ink, that I may write unto Sir Launcelot a letter written with mine own hand.”

So when paper, pen and ink was brought, then Sir Gawain was set up weakly by King Arthur, for he was shriven a little afore.⁴ And then he took his pen and wrote thus, as the French book maketh mention:

“Unto thee, Sir Launcelot, flower of all noble knights that ever I heard of or saw by my days, I, Sir Gawain, King Lot’s son of Orkney, and sister’s son unto the noble King Arthur, send thee greeting, letting thee to have knowledge that the tenth day of May I was smitten upon the old wound that thou gave me afore the city of Benwick, and through that wound I am come to my death-day. And I will that all the world wit that I, Sir Gawain, knight of the Table Round, sought my death, and not through thy deserving, but mine own seeking. Wherefore I beseech thee, Sir Launcelot, to return again unto this realm and see my tomb and pray some prayer more other less for my soul. ⁵ sedge Letter.

“Also, Sir Launcelot, for all the love that ever was betwixt us, make no tarrying, but come over the sea in all the goodly haste that ye may, with your noble knights, and rescue that noble king that made thee knight, for he is full straitly bestead⁶ with a false traitor which is my half-brother, Sir Mordred. For he hath crowned himself king and would have wedded my lady, Queen Guinevere; and so had he done, had she not kept the Tower of London with strong hand. And so the tenth day of May last past my lord King Arthur and we all landed upon them at Dover, and there he put that false traitor, Sir Mordred, to flight. And so it there misfortuned me to be smitten upon the stroke that ye gave me of old.

“And the date of this letter was written but two hours and a half before my death, written with mine own hand and subscribed⁷ with part of my heart blood. And therefore I require thee, most famous knight of the world, that thou wilt see my tomb.”

And then he wept and King Arthur both, and swooned. And when they were awaked both, the king made Sir Gawain to receive his sacrament,⁸ and then Sir Gawain prayed the king for to send for Sir Launcelot and to cherish him aboven all other knights. And so at the hour of noon Sir Gawain yielded up the ghost.⁹ And then the king let inter him¹⁰ in a chapel within Dover Castle. And there yet all men may see the skull of him, and the same wound is seen that Sir Launcelot gave in battle.

Then was it told the king that Sir Mordred had pight¹¹ a new field upon Barham Down.¹² And so upon the morn King Arthur rode thither to him, and there was a great battle betwixt them, and much people were slain on both parties. But at the last King Arthur’s party stood best, and Sir Mordred and his party fled unto Canterbury. And then the king let search all the downs for his knights that were slain and interred them; and salved them with soft salves that full sore were wounded.

⁶ tarrying Delay; goodly Considerable; straitly bestead Severely pressed.

⁷ subscribed Signed.

⁸ sacrament Last rites, in which the recipient is anointed with blessed oil and takes communion.

⁹ the ghost His spirit, soul.

¹⁰ let inter him Had him buried.

¹¹ pight Pitched, set up.

¹² Down Hill.

Then much people drew unto King Arthur, and then they said that Sir Mordred warred upon King Arthur with wrong. And anon King Arthur drew him with his host down by the seaside westward, toward Salisbury. And there was a day assigned betwixt King Arthur and Sir Mordred, that they should meet upon a down beside Salisbury, and not far from the seaside. And this day was assigned on Monday after Trinity Sunday,¹ whereof King Arthur was passing glad that he might be avenged upon Sir Mordred.

Then Sir Mordred araised much people about London, for they of Kent, Sussex and Surrey, Essex, Suffolk and Norfolk held the most party² with Sir Mordred. And many a full noble knight drew unto him and also to the king; but they that loved Sir Launcelot drew unto Sir Mordred.

So upon Trinity Sunday at night King Arthur dreamed a wonderful dream, and in his dream him seemed that he saw upon a chafflet a chair, and the chair was fast to a wheel, and thereupon sat King Arthur in the richest cloth of gold³ that might be made. And the king thought there was under him, far from him, an hideous deep black water, and therein was all manner of serpents and worms⁴ and wild beasts, foul and horrible. And suddenly the king thought that the wheel turned up-so-down,⁵ and he fell among the serpents, and every beast took him by a limb. And then the king cried as he lay in his bed, "Help! help!" And then knights, squires and yeomen awaked the king, and then he was so amazed⁶ that he wist not where he was.

And then so he awaked until it was nigh day, and then he fell on slumbering again, not sleeping nor thoroughly waking. So the king seemed verily⁷ that there came Sir Gawain unto him with a number of fair ladies with him.

So when King Arthur saw him he said, "Welcome, my sister's son, I weened⁸ ye had been dead. And now I see thee on live, much am I beholden unto⁹ Almighty Jesu. Ah, fair nephew, what been¹⁰ these ladies that hither be come with you?"

"Sir," said Sir Gawain, "all these be ladies for whom I have foughten for, when I was man living. And all these are those that I did battle for in righteous quarrels,¹¹ and God hath given them that grace at their great prayer, because I did battle for them for their right, that they should bring me hither unto you. Thus much hath given me leave God for to warn you of your death: for and¹² ye fight as to-morn with Sir Mordred, as ye both have assigned, doubt ye not ye shall be slain, and the most party of your people on both parties. And for the great grace and goodness that Almighty Jesu hath unto you, and for pity of you and many more other good men there shall be slain, God hath sent me to you of His special grace to give you warning that in no wise ye do battle as to-morn, but that ye take a treatise for a month-day.¹³ And proffer you largely,¹⁴ so that to-morn ye put in a delay. For within a month shall come Sir Launcelot with all his noble knights and rescue you worshipfully,¹⁵ and slay Sir Mordred and all that ever will hold with him."

Then Sir Gawain and all the ladies vanished. And anon the king called upon his knights, squires, and yeomen, and charged them wightly¹⁶ to fetch his noble lords and wise bishops unto him. And when they were come the king told them of his avision: that Sir Gawain had told him and warned him that and¹⁷ he fought on the morn he should be slain.

¹ Trinity Sunday Feast day, celebrating the divine Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, on the first Sunday after Pentecost.

² araised Raised (as troops); the most party I.e., the greater part.

⁷ the king seemed verily It seemed to the king truly.

⁸ weened Thought.

⁹ on live Alive; beholden unto Obligated to.

¹⁰ what been Who are.

¹¹ righteous quarrels Just complaints or suits.

¹² hath ... God I.e., God has given me leave; for and For if.

¹³ take a treatise Make a treaty; month-day Period lasting until this day of the following month.

¹⁴ proffer you largely Make a generous offer.

¹⁵ worshipfully Honorably.

¹⁶ charged Commanded; wightly Quickly.

¹⁷ avision Dream or vision; that and That if.

Then the king commanded Sir Lucan the Butler and his brother Sir Bedivere the bold, with two bishops with them, and charged them in any wise to take a treatise for a month-day with Sir Mordred: "And spare not, proffer him lands and goods as much as ye think reasonable."

So then they departed and came to Sir Mordred where he had a grim host of an hundred thousand. And there they entreated Sir Mordred long time, and at the last Sir Mordred was agreed for to have Cornwall and Kent by King Arthur's days;¹ and after that all England, after the days of King Arthur. Then were they condescended that King Arthur and Sir Mordred should meet betwixt both their hosts, and everich² of them should bring fourteen persons. And so they came with this word unto Arthur.

Then said he, "I am glad that this is done," and so he went into the field.

And when King Arthur should depart, he warned all his host that and³ they see any sword drawn, "look ye come on fiercely and slay that traitor, Sir Mordred, for I in no wise trust him."

In like wise Sir Mordred warned his host that "and ye see any manner of sword drawn, look that ye come on fiercely and so slay all that ever before you standeth, for in no wise I will not trust for this treatise."⁴ And in the same wise said Sir Mordred unto his host, "for I know well my father will be avenged upon me."

And so they met as their pointment was, and were agreed and accorded thoroughly. And wine was fette,⁵ and they drank together. Right so came out an adder⁶ of a little heathbush, and it stang a knight in the foot. And so when the knight felt him so stung, he looked down and saw the adder; and anon he drew his sword to slay the adder, and thought none other⁷ harm. And when the host on both parties saw that sword drawn, then they blew bemes, trumpets, and horns, and shouted grimly, and so both hosts dressed them together.⁸ And King Arthur took his horse and said, "Alas, this unhappy day!" and so rode to his party, and Sir Mordred in like wise.

And never since was there seen a more dolefuller battle in no Christian land, for there was but rushing and riding, foining⁹ and striking, and many a grim word was there spoken of either to other, and many a deadly stroke. But ever King Arthur rode throughout the battle of Sir Mordred many times and did full nobly, as a noble king should do, and at all times he fainted¹⁰ never. And Sir Mordred did his devoir¹¹ that day and put himself in great peril. And thus they fought all the long day, and never stinted¹² till the noble knights were laid to the cold earth. And ever they fought still till it was near night, and by then was there an hundred thousand laid dead upon the earth.

Then was King Arthur wood wroth out of measure,¹³ when he saw his people so slain from him. And so he looked about him and could see no more of all his host, and good knights left no more on live but two knights: the one was Sir Lucan de Butler and his brother, Sir Bedivere; and yet they were full sore wounded.

"Jesu mercy!" said the king, "where are all my noble knights become? Alas, that ever I should see this doleful day! For now," said King Arthur, "I am come to mine end. But would to God," said he, "that I wist now where were that traitor Sir Mordred that hath caused all this mischief."¹⁴

Then King Arthur looked about and was ware¹⁵ where stood Sir Mordred leaning upon his sword among a great heap of dead men.

¹⁴ wist Knew; mischief Destruction.

¹⁵ ware Aware of.

"Now, give me my spear," said King Arthur unto Sir Lucan, "for yonder I have espied the traitor that all this woe hath wrought."¹

"Sir, let him be," said Sir Lucan, "for he is unhappy.² And if ye pass this unhappy day ye shall be right well³ revenged. And, good lord, remember ye of your night's dream and what the spirit of Sir Gawain told you tonight, and yet God of His great goodness hath preserved you hitherto. And for God's sake, my lord, leave off this, for, blessed be God, ye have won the field: for yet we been here three on live, and with Sir Mordred is not one on live. And therefore if ye leave off now, this wicked day of destiny is past."

"Now tide me death, tide me life,"⁴ said the king, "now I see him yonder alone, he shall never escape mine hands. For at a better avail⁵ shall I never have him."

"God speed you well,"⁶ said Sir Bedivere.

Then the king got his spear in both his hands, and ran toward Sir Mordred, crying and saying, "Traitor, now is thy death-day come!"

And when Sir Mordred saw King Arthur he ran until him with his sword drawn in his hand, and there King Arthur smote Sir Mordred under the shield with a foin of his spear throughout the body more than a fathom.⁷ And when Sir Mordred felt that he had his death's wound he thrust himself with the might that he had up to the burr of King Arthur's spear, and right so he smote his father, King Arthur, with his sword holding in both his hands, upon the side of the head, that the sword pierced the helmet and the tay⁸ of the brain. And therewith Mordred dashed⁹ down stark dead to the earth.

And noble King Arthur fell in a swough to the earth, and there he swooned oftentimes, and Sir Lucan and Sir

Bedivere oftentimes hove¹⁰ him up. And so weakly betwixt them they led him to a little chapel not far from the sea, and when the king was there, him thought him¹¹ reasonably eased. Then heard they people cry in the field.

"Now go thou, Sir Lucan," said the king, "and do me to wit what betokens¹² that noise in the field."

So Sir Lucan departed, for he was grievously wounded in many places; and so as he yode he saw and hearkened by the moonlight how that pillers and robbers were come into the field to pille and to rob many a full noble knight of brooches and bees¹³ and of many a good ring and many a rich jewel. And who that were not dead all out, there they slew them for their harness¹⁴ and their riches. When Sir Lucan understood his work he came to the king as soon as he might, and told him all what he had heard and seen.

"Therefore by my rede,"¹⁵ said Sir Lucan, "it is best that we bring you to some town."

"I would it were so," said the king, "but I may not stand, my head works¹⁶ so. Ah, Sir Launcelot," said King Arthur, "this day have I sore missed thee! And alas, that ever I was against thee! For now have I my death, whereof Sir Gawain me warned in my dream."

Then Sir Lucan took up the king the tone party and Sir Bedivere the other party, and in the lifting up the king swooned, and in the lifting Sir Lucan fell in a swoon, that part of his guts fell out of his body, and therewith the noble knight his heart brast.¹⁷ And when the king awoke he beheld Sir Lucan, how he lay foaming at the mouth and part of his guts lay at his feet.

"Alas," said the king, "this is to me a full heavy sight, to see this noble duke so die for my sake, for he would have holpen me that¹⁸ had more need of help than I.

Alas, that he would not complain him, for his heart was so set to help me! Now Jesu have mercy upon his soul."

Then Sir Bedivere wept for the death of his brother.

"Now leave this mourning and weeping, gentle knight," said the king, for all this will not avail me. For wit thou well, and¹ I might live myself, the death of Sir Lucan would grieve me evermore. But my time passeth on fast," said the king. "Therefore," said King Arthur unto Sir Bedivere, "take thou here Excaliber, my good sword, and go with it to yonder water's side; and when thou comest there, I charge thee throw my sword in that water, and come again and tell me what thou seest there."

"My lord," said Sir Bedivere, "your commandment shall be done, and lightly² bring you word again."

So Sir Bedivere departed. And by the way he beheld that noble sword, and the pommel and the haft³ was all precious stones. And then he said to himself, "If I throw this rich sword in the water, thereof shall never come good, but harm and loss." And then Sir Bedivere hid Excaliber under a tree, and so as soon as he might he came again unto the king and said he had been at the water and had thrown the sword into the water.

"What saw thou there?" said the king.

"Sir," he said, "I saw nothing but waves⁴ and winds."

"That is untruly⁵ said of thee," said the king. "And therefore go thou lightly again and do my commandment; as thou art to me lief⁶ and dear, spare not, but throw it in."

Then sir Bedivere returned again and took the sword in his hand; and yet him thought sin and shame to throw away that noble sword. And so eft⁷ he hid the sword and returned again and told the king that he had been at the water and done his commandment.

"What sawest thou there?" said the king.

"Sir," he said, "I saw nothing but waters wap and waves wan."⁸

² lightly (I will) quickly.

³ pommel Knob at the top of the hilt; haft Handle.

⁴ waves Waves.

⁵ untruly Dishonestly and disloyally.

⁶ lief Beloved.

⁸ wap Lap at the shore; wan Darken.

"Ah, traitor unto me and untrue," said King Arthur, "now hast thou betrayed me twice. Who would ween⁹ that thou that hast been to me so lief and dear, and also named so noble a knight, that thou would betray me for the riches of this sword? But now go again lightly; for thy long tarrying putteth me in great jeopardy of my life, for I have taken cold. And but if¹⁰ thou do now as I bid thee, if ever I may see thee, I shall slay thee mine owne¹¹ hands, for thou wouldst for my rich sword see me dead."

Then Sir Bedivere departed and went to the sword and lightly took it up, and so he went unto the water's side. And there he bound the girdle¹² about the hilts, and threw the sword as far into the water as he might. And there came an arm and an hand above the water, and took it and cleight¹³ it, and shook it thrice and brandished, and then vanished with the sword into the water. So Sir Bedivere came again to the king and told him what he saw.

"Alas," said the king, "help me hence, for I dread me¹⁴ I have tarried over long."

Then Sir Bedivere took the king upon his back and so went with him to the water's side. And when they were there, even fast by the bank hove¹⁵ a little barge with many fair ladies in it, and among them all was a queen, and all they had black hoods. And all they wept and shrieked when they saw King Arthur.

"Now put me into that barge," said the king. And so he did softly, and there received him three ladies with great mourning. And so they set him down, and in one of their laps King Arthur laid his head.

And then the queen said, "Ah, my dear brother, why have ye tarried so long from me? Alas, this wound on your head hath caught overmuch cold."

And anon they rowed fromward the land, and Sir Bedivere beheld all those ladies go froward¹⁶ him.

⁹ ween Believe.

¹⁰ And but if Unless.

¹¹ mine owne (With) my own.

¹³ cleight Clashed.

¹⁴ dread me Fear.

¹⁵ fast by Right close to; hove Floated; barge Small ship with sails.

¹⁶ froward Away from.

Then sir Bedivere cried and said, "Ah, my lord Arthur, what shall become of me, now ye go from me and leave me here alone among mine enemies?"

"Comfort thyself," said the king, "and do as well as thou mayest, for in me is no trust for to trust in. For I must into the vale of Avalon¹ to heal me of my grievous wound. And if thou hear nevermore of me, pray for my soul."

But ever the queen and ladies wept and shrieked, that it was pity to hear. And as soon as Sir Bedivere had lost sight of the barge he wept and wailed, and so took² the forest and went all that night.

And in the morning he was ware, betwixt two holts hoar,³ of a chapel and an hermitage. Then was Sir Bedivere fain, and thither he went, and when he came into the chapel he saw where lay an hermit grovelling on all fours, fast thereby a tomb was new graven.⁴ When the hermit saw Sir Bedivere he knew him well, for he was but little tofore Bishop of Canterbury, that Sir Mordred flemed.⁵

"Sir," said Sir Bedivere, "what man is there here interred that you pray so fast⁶ for?"

"Fair son," said the hermit, "I wot not verily but by deeming.⁷ But this same night, at midnight, here came a number of ladies and brought here a dead corse⁸ and prayed me to inter him. And here they offered an hundred tapers, and they gave me a thousand bezants."⁹

"Alas," said Sir Bedivere, "that was my lord King Arthur, which lieth here graven¹⁰ in this chapel."

Then Sir Bedivere swooned, and when he awoke he prayed the hermit that he might abide with him still,¹¹ there to live with fasting and prayers.

"For from hence will I never go," said Sir Bedivere, "by my will, but all the days of my life here to pray for my lord Arthur."

"Sir, ye are welcome to me," said the hermit, "for I know you better than ye ween¹² that I do: for ye are Sir Bedivere the bold, and the full noble duke Sir Lucan de Butler was your brother."

Then Sir Bedivere told the hermit all as ye have heard tofore, and so he beleft¹³ with the hermit that was beforehand Bishop of Canterbury. And there Sir Bedivere put upon him¹⁴ poor clothes, and served the hermit full lowly in fasting and in prayers.

Thus of Arthur I find no more written in books that been authorized, nother more of the very certainty of his death heard I never read,¹⁵ but thus was he led away in a ship wherein were three queens; that one was King Arthur sister, Queen Morgan le Fay, the tother¹⁶ was the Queen of North Galis, and the third was the Queen of the Waste Lands. Also there was Dame Nineve, the chief lady of the lake, which had wedded Sir Pelleas, the good knight; and this lady had done much for King Arthur. And this Dame Nineve would never suffer Sir Pelleas to be in no place where he should be in danger of his life, and so he lived unto the uttermost¹⁷ of his days with her in great rest.

Now more of the death of King Arthur could I never find, but that these ladies brought him to his grave, and such one was interred there which the hermit bore witness that sometime¹⁸ was Bishop of Canterbury. But yet the hermit knew not in certain that he was verily the body of King Arthur; for this tale Sir Bedivere, a knight of the Table Round, made it to be written.

Yet some men say in many parts of England that King Arthur is not dead, but had¹⁹ by the will of our Lord Jesu into another place; and men say that he shall come again, and he shall win the Holy Cross.¹ Yet I will not say that it shall be so, but rather I would say, here in this world he changed his life. And many men say that there is written upon the tomb this:

Hic iacet Arthurus, rex quondam rexque futurus.²

And thus leave I here Sir Bedivere with the hermit that dwelled that time in a chapel beside Glastonbury, and there was his hermitage. And so they lived in prayers and fastings and great abstinence.

And when Queen Guinevere understood that King Arthur was dead and all the noble knights, Sir Mordred and all the remnant, then she stole away with five ladies with her, and so she went to Amesbury. And there she let make herself³ a nun, and weared white clothes and black, and great penance she took upon her as ever did sinful woman in this land. And never creature could make her merry, but ever she lived in fasting, prayers and alms-deeds,⁴ that all manner of people marvelled how virtuously she was changed.

Now leave we the queen in Amesbury, a nun in white clothes and black—and there she was abbess and ruler, as reason would⁵—and now turn we from her and speak we of Sir Launcelot du Lake,⁶ that when he heard in his country that Sir Mordred was crowned king in England and made war against King Arthur, his own father, and would let him to land⁷ in his own land (also it was told him how Sir Mordred had laid a siege about the Tower of London, because the queen would not wed him), then was Sir Launcelot wroth out of measure and said to his kinsmen, “Alas, that double traitor Sir Mordred, now me repenteth that ever he escaped my hands, for much shame hath he done unto my lord Arthur. For I feel by this doleful letter that Sir Gawain sent me, on whose soul Jesu have mercy, that my lord Arthur is full hard bestead.⁸ Alas,” said Sir Launcelot, “that ever I should live to hear of that most noble king that made me knight thus to be overset with⁹ his subject in his own realm. And this doleful letter that my lord Sir Gawain hath sent me afore his death, praying me to see his tomb, wit you well his doleful words shall never go from my heart. For he was a full noble knight as ever was born. And in an unhappy hour was I born that ever I should have that mishap¹⁰ to slay first Sir Gawain, Sir Gaheris, the good knight, and mine own friend Sir Gareth that was a full noble knight. Now, alas, I may say I am unhappy that ever I should do thus. And yet, alas, might I never have hap¹¹ to slay that traitor, Sir Mordred.”

“Now leave your complaints,” said Sir Bors, “and first revenge you of the death of Sir Gawain, on whose soul Jesu have mercy. And it will be well done that ye see his tomb, and secondly that ye revenge my lord Arthur and my lady Queen Guinevere.”

“I thank you,” said Sir Launcelot, “for ever ye will my worship.”¹²

Then they made them ready in all haste that might be, with ships and galleys, with him and his host to pass into England. And so at the last he came to Dover, and there he landed with seven kings, and the number was hideous¹³ to behold.

Then Sir Launcelot speered of men of Dover where was the king become.¹⁴ And anon the people told him how he was slain and Sir Mordred too, with an hundred thousand that died upon a day; and how Sir Mordred gave King Arthur the first battle there at his landing, and there was Sir Gawain slain; and upon the morn Sir Mordred fought with the king on Barham Down, and there the king put Sir Mordred to the worse.¹⁵

"Alas," said Sir Launcelot, "this is the heaviest tidings¹ that ever came to my heart! Now, fair sirs," said Sir Launcelot, "show me the tomb of Sir Gawain."

And anon he was brought into the castle of Dover, and so they showed him the tomb. Then Sir Launcelot kneeled down by the tomb and wept, and prayed heartily for his² soul. And that night he let make a dole of³ all that would come of the town or of the country. They had as much flesh and fish and wine and ale, and every man and woman he dealt to twelve pence,⁴ come whoso would. Thus with his own hand dealt he this money, in a mourning gown, and ever he wept heartily,⁵ and prayed the people to pray for the soul of Sir Gawain. And on the morn all the priests and clerks that might be gotten in the country and in the town were there, and sang Masses of Requiem.⁶ And there offered first Sir Launcelot, and he offered an hundred pound, and then the seven kings offered, and every of them offered forty pound. Also there was a thousand knights, and every of them offered a pound; and the offering dured⁷ from the morn to night. And there Sir Launcelot lay two nights upon his tomb in prayers and in doleful weeping.

Then on the third day, Sir Launcelot called the kings, dukes, and earls, with the barons and all his noble knights, and said thus: "My fair lords, I thank you all of your coming into this country with me. But wit you well, all we are come too late, and that shall repent me⁸ while I live, but against death may no man rebel. But sithen⁹ it is so," said Sir Launcelot, "I will myself ride and seek my lady, Queen Guinevere. For, as I hear say, she hath had great pain and much disease,¹⁰ and I hear say that she is fled into the west. And therefore ye all shall abide me here, and but if I come again within these fifteen days, take your ships and your fellowship and depart into your country, for I will do as I say¹¹ you."

Then came Sir Bors and said, "My lord Sir Launcelot, what think ye for to do, now for to ride in this realm? Wit you well ye shall do find¹² few friends."

"Be as be may as for that," said Sir Launcelot, "keep you still here, for I will forth on my journey, and no man nor child¹³ shall go with me."

So it was no boot to strive,¹⁴ but he departed and rode westerly, and there he sought a seven or eight days. And at last he came to a nunnery; and anon Queen Guinevere was ware of Sir Launcelot as she walked in the cloister.¹⁵ And anon as she saw him there, she swooned thrice, that all ladies and gentlewomen had work enough to hold the queen from the earth.

So when she might speak she called her ladies and gentlewomen to her, and then she said thus: "Ye marvel, fair ladies, why I make this fare.¹⁶ Truly," she said, "it is for the sight of yonder knight that yonder standeth. Wherefore I pray you call him hither to me."

Then Sir Launcelot was brought before her; then the queen said to all those ladies, "Through this same man and me hath all this war be wrought,¹⁷ and the death of the most noblest knights of the world; for through our love that we have loved together is my most noble lord slain. Therefore, Sir Launcelot, wit thou well I am set in such a plight to get my soul-heal.¹⁸ And yet I trust, through God's grace and through His Passion of His wounds wide, that after my death I may have a sight of the blessed face of Christ Jesu, and on Doomsday to sit on His right side;¹ for as sinful as ever I was now are saints in heaven. And therefore, Sir Launcelot, I require thee and beseech thee heartily, for all the love that ever was betwixt us, that thou never see me no more in the visage.² And I command thee, on God's behalf, that thou forsake my company, and to thy kingdom look thou turn again, and keep well thy realm from war and wrack.³ For as well as I have loved thee heretofore, mine heart will not serve⁴ now to see thee, for through thee and me is the flower of kings and knights destroyed. And therefore go thou to thy realm, and there take ye a wife, and live with her with joy and bliss. And I pray thee heartily to pray for me to the everlasting Lord that I may amend my misliving."

"Now, my sweet madam," said Sir Launcelot, "would ye⁵ that I should turn again unto my country, and there to wed a lady? Nay, madam, wit you well, that shall I never do, for I shall never be so false unto you of that⁶ I have promised. But the self destiny that ye have taken you to, I will take me to, for the pleasure of Jesu, and ever for you I cast me⁷ specially to pray."

"Ah, Sir Launcelot, if ye will do so and hold thy promise! But I may never believe you," said the queen, "but that ye will turn to the world again."

"Well, madam," said he, "ye say as it pleaseth you, for yet wist⁸ ye me never false of my promise. And God defend but that I should forsake the world as ye have done; for in the quest of the Sankgrail I had that⁹ time forsaken the vanities of the world, had not your love been. And if I had done so at that time with my heart, will and thought, I had passed all the knights that ever were in the Sankgrail¹⁰ except Sir¹¹ Galahad,¹² my son. Wherefore, madam, I pray you kiss me, and never no more."¹⁶

"Nay," said the queen, "that I shall never do, but abstain you from such works."¹⁷

And they departed; but there was never so hard an hearted man but he would have wept to see the dolour¹⁸ that they made, for there was lamentation as they had be stung with spears, and many times they swooned. And the ladies bore the queen to her chamber.

And Sir Launcelot awoke, and went and took his horse, and rode all that day and all night in a forest, weeping. And at last he was ware of an hermitage and a chapel stood betwixt two cliffs; and then he heard a little bell ring to mass. And thither he rode and alighted, and tied his horse to the gate, and heard mass. And he that sang mass was the Bishop of Canterbury. Both the Bishop and Sir Bedivere knew Sir Launcelot, and they spake together after mass. But when Sir Bedivere had told his tale all whole, Sir Launcelot's heart almost brast for sorrow, and Sir Launcelot threw his arms abroad, and said, "Alas! Who may trust this world?"¹

And then he kneeled down on his knee and prayed the Bishop to shrive him and assoil him;² and then he besought the Bishop that he might be his brother.³ Then the Bishop said, "I will gladly," and there he put an habit⁴ upon Sir Launcelot. And there he served God day and night with prayers and fastings.

Thus the great host abode at Dover. And then Sir Lionel took fifteen lords with him and rode to London to seek Sir Launcelot; and there Sir Lionel was slain and many of his lords. Then Sir Bors de Ganis made the great host for to go home again, and Sir Bors, Sir Ector de Maris, Sir Blamour, Sir Bleoberis, with more other of Sir Launcelot's kin, took on them to ride all England overthwart and endlong⁵ to seek Sir Launcelot. So Sir Bors by fortune rode so long till he came to the same chapel where Sir Launcelot was. And so Sir Bors heard a little bell knell,⁶ that rang to mass; and there he alighted and heard mass. And when mass was done the Bishop, Sir Launcelot, and Sir Bedivere came to Sir Bors, and when Sir Bors saw Sir Launcelot in that manner clothing, then he prayed the Bishop that he might be in the same suit. And so there was an habit put upon him, and there he lived in prayers and fasting.

And within half a year there was come Sir Galihud, Sir Galihodin, Sir Blamour, Sir Bleoberis, Sir Villiers, Sir Clarrus, and Sir Gahalantine. So all these seven noble knights there abode still. And when they saw Sir Launcelot had taken him to such perfection, they had no lust⁷ to depart, but took such an habit as he had.

Thus they endured in great penance six year. And then Sir Launcelot took the habit of priesthood of the Bishop, and a twelve-month⁸ he sang mass. And there was none of these other knights but they read in books and holp⁹ for to sing mass, and rang bells, and did lowly all manner of service. And so their horses went where they would, for they took no regard of no worldly riches; for when they saw Sir Launcelot endure such penance in prayers and fastings they took no force what pain they endured, for to see the noblest knight of the world take such abstinence that he waxed full¹⁰ lean.

And thus upon a night there came a vision to Sir Launcelot and charged¹¹ him, in remission of his sins, to haste him unto Amesbury: "And by then thou come there, thou shalt find Queen Guinevere dead. And therefore take thy fellows with thee, and purvey them of an horse bier,¹² and fetch thou the corse of her, and bury her by her husband, the noble King Arthur."

So this avision came to Launcelot thrice in one night. Then Sir Launcelot rose up or¹³ day and told the hermit.

"It were well done," said the hermit, "that ye made you ready and that ye disobey not the avision."

Then Sir Launcelot took his seven fellows with him, and on foot they yede¹⁴ from Glastonbury to Amesbury, the which is little more than thirty mile, and thither they came within two days, for they were weak and feeble to go. And when Sir Launcelot was come to Amesbury within the nunnery, Queen Guinevere died but half an hour before.

And the ladies told Sir Launcelot that Queen Guinevere told them all or she passed that Sir Launcelot had been priest near a twelve-month: "and hither he cometh as fast as he may to fetch my corse,¹⁵ and beside my lord King Arthur he shall bury me." Wherefore the queen said in hearing of them all, "I beseech Almighty God that I may never have power to see Sir Launcelot with my worldly eyen."¹⁶

"And thus," said all the ladies, "was ever¹ her prayer these two days till she was dead."

Then Sir Launcelot saw her visage,² but he wept not greatly, but sighed. And so he did all the observance of the service himself, both the Dirige,³ and on the morn he sang mass. And there was ordained an horse bier, and so with an hundred torches ever brenning about the corse of the queen and ever Sir Launcelot with his eight fellows went about the horse-bier, singing and reading many an holy orison, and frankincense upon the corse incensed.⁴

Thus Sir Launcelot and his eight fellows went on foot from Amesbury unto Glastonbury; and when they were come to the chapel and the hermitage, there she had a Dirige, with great devotion. And on the morn the hermit that sometime was Bishop of Canterbury sang the mass of Requiem with great devotion, and Sir Launcelot was the first that offered, and then all his eight fellows. And then she was wrapped in cered cloth of Rennes, from the top to the toe, in thirtyfold; and after she was put in a web⁵ of lead, and then in a coffin of marble.

And when she was put in the earth Sir Launcelot swooned, and lay long still while the hermit came and awaked him, and said, "Ye be to blame, for ye displease God with such manner of sorrow-making."

"Truly," said Sir Launcelot, "I trust I do not displease God, for He knoweth mine intent: for my sorrow was not, nor is not, for any rejoicing of sin, but my sorrow may never have end. For when I remember of her beauty and of her noblesse, that was both with her king and with her, so when I saw his corpse and her corpse so lie together, truly mine heart would not serve to sustain my careful⁶ body. Also when I remember me how by my default, mine orgule,⁷ and my pride that they were both laid full low that were peerless that ever was living of Christian people, wit you well," said Sir Launcelot, "this remembered, of their kindness and mine unkindness, sank so to mine heart that I might not sustain myself." So the French book maketh mention.⁸

Then Sir Launcelot never after ate but little meat, nor drank, till he was dead, for then he sickened more and more and dried and dwined⁹ away. For the Bishop nor none of his fellows might not make him to eat and little he drank, that he was waxen by a cubit¹⁰ shorter than he was, that the people could not know him. For evermore, day and night, he prayed, but sometime he slumbered a broken sleep. Ever he was lying grovelling on the tomb of King Arthur and Queen Guinevere, and there was no comfort that the Bishop nor Sir Bors nor none of his fellows could make him, it availed not.¹¹

So within six weeks after, Sir Launcelot fell sick and lay in his bed. And then he sent for the Bishop that there was hermit, and all his true fellows.

Then Sir Launcelot said with dreary steven, "Sir Bishop, I pray you give to me all my rites that longeth to¹² a Christian man."

"It shall not need you,"¹³ said the hermit and all his fellows. "It is but heaviness of your blood. Ye shall be well mended by the grace of God to-morn."

"My fair lords," said Sir Launcelot, "wit you well my careful body will into the earth, I have warning more than now I will say. Therefore give me my rites."

So when he was houseled and anealed¹⁴ and had all that a Christian man ought to have, he prayed the

Bishop that his fellows might bear his body to Joyous Gard (some men say it was Alnwick, and some men say it was Bamburgh).¹

"Howbeit," said Sir Launcelot, "me repenteth sore, but I made mine avow² sometime that in Joyous Gard I would be buried. And because of breaking of mine avow, I pray you all, lead³ me thither."

Then there was weeping and wringing of hands among his fellows.

So at a season⁴ of the night they all went to their beds, for they all lay in one chamber. And so after midnight, against day, the Bishop that was hermit, as he lay in his bed asleep, he fell upon⁵ a great laughter. And therewith all the fellowship awoke and came to the Bishop and asked him what he ailed.⁶

"Ah, Jesu mercy!" said the Bishop, "why did ye awake me? I was never in all my life so merry and so well at ease."

"Wherefore?"⁷ said Sir Bors.

"Truly," said the Bishop, "here was Sir Launcelot with me, with more angels than ever I saw men in one day. And I saw the angels heave up Sir Launcelot unto heaven, and the gates of heaven opened against⁸ him."

"It is but dretching of swevens," said Sir Bors, "for I doubt not Sir Launcelot aileth nothing but good."⁹

"It may well be," said the Bishop. "Go ye to his bed, and then shall ye prove the sooth."¹⁰

So when Sir Bors and his fellows came to his bed, they found him stark dead; and he lay as he had smiled, and the sweetest savour¹¹ about him that ever they felt.

Then was there weeping and wringing of hands, and the greatest dole¹² they made that ever made men. And on the morn the Bishop did his mass of Requiem, and after the Bishop and all the nine knights put Sir Launcelot in the same horse-bier that Queen Guinevere was laid in tofore that¹³ she was buried. And so the Bishop and they all together went with the body of Sir Launcelot daily till they came to Joyous Gard; and ever they had an hundred torches brenning about him. And so within fifteen days they came to Joyous Gard. And there they laid his corpse in the body of the choir, and sang and read many psalters¹⁴ and prayers over him and about him. And ever his visage was laid open and naked, that all folks might behold him; for such was the custom in those days that all men of worship¹⁵ should so lie with open visage till that they were buried.

And right thus as they were at their service, there came Sir Ector de Maris, that had seven year sought all England, Scotland, and Wales, seeking his brother, Sir Launcelot. And when Sir Ector heard such noise and light in the choir of Joyous Gard, he alighted and put his horse from him and came into the choir. And there he saw men sing and weep, and all they knew Sir Ector, but he knew not them.

Then went Sir Bors unto Sir Ector and told him how there lay his brother, Sir Launcelot, dead. And then Sir Ector threw his shield, sword, and helm from him, and when he beheld Sir Launcelot's visage he fell down in a swoon. And when he waked, it were hard any tongue to tell the doleful complaints¹⁶ that he made for his brother.

"Ah, Launcelot!" he said, "thou were head¹⁷ of all Christian knights. And now I dare say," said Sir Ector, "thou Sir Launcelot, there thou liest, that thou were never matched of¹⁸ earthly knight's hand. And thou were the courteoust knight that ever bore shield; and thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode horse; and thou were the truest lover, of a sinful man, that ever loved woman; and thou were the kindest man that ever strake¹ with sword; and thou were the godliest person that ever came among press of knights; and thou was the meekest man and the gentlest that ever ate in hall among ladies; and thou were the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put spear in the rest.”²

Then there was weeping and dolour³ out of measure.

Thus they kept Sir Launcelot's corpse on-loft⁴ fifteen days, and then they buried it with great devotion. And then at leisure they went all with the Bishop of Canterbury to his hermitage, and there they were together more than a month.

Then Sir Constantine, that was Sir Cador's son of Cornwall,⁵ was chosen king of England. And he was a full noble knight, and worshipfully he ruled this realm. And then this King Constantine sent for the Bishop of Canterbury, for he heard say where he was. And so he was restored unto his bishopric,⁶ and left that hermitage. And Sir Bedivere was there ever still hermit to his life's end.

Then Sir Bors de Ganis, Sir Ector de Maris, Sir Gahalantine, Sir Galihud, Sir Galihodin, Sir Blamour, Sir Bleoberis, Sir Villiers le Valiant, Sir Clarrus of Claremont, all these knights drew them⁷ to their countries. Howbeit King Constantine would have had them with him, but they would not abide⁸ in this realm. And there they all lived in their countries as holy men.

And some English books maken mention that they went never out of England after the death of Sir Launcelot—but that was but favour of makers.⁹ For the French book maketh mention—and is authorized—that Sir Bors, Sir Ector, Sir Blamour and Sir Bleoberis went into the Holy Land, thereas Jesu Christ was quick and dead, and anon as they had established¹⁰ their lands. For, the book sayeth, so Sir Launcelot commanded them for to do or¹¹ ever he passed out of this world. And these four knights did many battles upon the miscreants, or Turks.¹² And there they died upon a Good Friday for God's sake. Here is the end of the whole book of King Arthur and of his noble knights of the Round Table, that when they were whole together there was ever an hundred and forty.¹³ And here is the end of the Death of Arthur.

I pray you, all gentlemen and gentlewomen that readeth this book of Arthur and his knights from the beginning to the ending, pray for me while I am on live that God send me good deliverance.¹⁴ And when I am dead, I pray you all pray for my soul.

For this book was ended the ninth year of the reign of King Edward the Fourth, by Sir Thomas Malory, knight, as Jesu help him for¹⁵ His great might, as he is the servant of Jesu both day and night.

 IN CONTEXT
Early Editions of *Morte Darthur*CAXTON'S PREFACE¹

After that I had accomplished and finished diverse histories, as well of contemplation as of other historical and worldly acts of great conquerors and princes, and also certain books of ensamples² and doctrine, many noble and diverse gentlemen of this realm of England came and demanded me many and oft times, wherefore that I have not do made and imprint³ the noble history of the Saint Grail,⁴ and of the most renowned Christian king—first and chief of the three best Christians—and worthy, King Arthur, which ought most to be remembered among us Englishmen to-fore all other Christian kings.

For it is notourly⁵ known through the universal world, that there be nine worthies⁶ and the best that ever were, that is to wit, three Paynims, three Jews, and three Christian men. As for the Paynims, they were tofore the Incarnation of Christ, which were named, the first Hector of Troy, of whom the history is comen both in ballad and in prose, the second Alexander the Great, and the third Julius Caesar, Emperor of Rome,⁷ of whom the histories be well known and had. And as for the three Jews, which also were tofore the Incarnation of our Lord, of whom the first was duke Joshua which brought the children of Israel into the land of behest, the second David King of Jerusalem, and the third Judas Maccabeus,⁸ of these three the Bible rehearseth all their noble histories and acts. And since the said Incarnation have been three noble Christian men, stalled⁹ and admitted through the universal world into the number of the nine best and worthy. Of whom was first the noble Arthur, whose noble acts I purpose to write in this present book here following. The second was Charlemagne,¹⁰ or Charles the Great, of whom the history is had in many places, both in French and in English. And the third and last was Godfrey of Bouillon,¹ of whose acts and life I made a book unto the excellent prince and king of noble memory, King Edward the Fourth.

The said noble gentlemen instantly² required me to imprint the history of the said noble king and conqueror King Arthur, and of his knights, with the history of the Saint Grail, and of the death and ending of the said Arthur; affirming that I ought rather to imprint his acts and noble feats, than of Godfrey of Bouillon, or any of the other eight, considering that he was a man born within this realm, and king and emperor of the same, and that there be in French diverse and many noble volumes of his acts, and also of his knights.

To whom I answered that diverse men hold opinion that there was no such Arthur, and that all such books as been made of him be feigned and fables, because that some chronicles make of him no mention, nor remember him nothing,³ nor of his knights.

Whereto they answered, and one in special said, that in him that should say or think that there was never such a king called Arthur might well be aretted⁴ great folly and blindness. For he said that there were many evidences of the contrary. First ye may see his sepulchre in the monastery of Glastonbury. And also in Polychronicon,⁵ in the fifth book the sixth chapter, and in the seventh book the twenty-third chapter, where his body was buried, and after found, and translated⁶ into the said monastery. Ye shall see also in the history of Bochas, in his book De Casu Principum,⁷ part of his noble acts, and also of his fall. Also Galfridus in his British book⁸ recounteth his life: and in diverse places of England many remembrances be yet of him, and shall remain perpetually, and also of his knights. First in the Abbey of Westminster, at St. Edward's shrine, remaineth the print of his seal in red wax closed in beryl,⁹ in which is written, Patricius Arthurus, Britannie, Gallie, Germanie, Dacie, Imperator.¹⁰ Item¹¹ in the castle of Dover ye may see Gawaine's skull, and Cradok's mantle; at Winchester the Round Table; in other places Lancelot's sword and many other things. Then all these things considered, there can no man reasonably gainsay but there was a king of this land named Arthur. For in all places, Christian and heathen, he is reputed and taken for one of the nine worthy, and the first of the three Christian men. And also, he is more spoken of beyond the sea, more books made of his noble acts, than there be in England, as well in Dutch, Italian, Spanish, and Greek, as in French. And yet of record remain in witness of him in Wales, in the town of Camelot, the great stones and the marvellous works of iron lying under the ground, and royal vaults, which diverse now living have seen. Wherefore it is a marvel why he is no more renowned in his own country, save only it accordeth to the Word of God, which saith that no man is accepted for a prophet in his own country.

Then all these things aforesaid alleged, I could not well deny but that there was such a noble king named Arthur, and reputed one of the nine worthy, and first and chief of the Christian men. And many noble volumes be made of him and of his noble knights in French, which I have seen and read beyond the sea, which be not had in our maternal tongue.¹ But in Welsh be many and also in French, and some in English but nowhere nigh all. Wherefore, such as have late² been drawn out³ briefly into English I have after the simple conning⁴ that God hath sent to me, under the favour and correction of all noble lords and gentlemen, enprised⁵ to imprint a book of the noble histories of the said King Arthur, and of certain of his knights, after a copy unto me delivered, which copy Sir Thomas Malory did take out of certain books of French, and reduced⁶ it into English.

And I, according to my copy, have done set it in imprint,⁷ to the intent that noble men may see and learn the noble acts of chivalry, the gentle and virtuous deeds that some knights used in those days, by which they came to honour, and how they that were vicious were punished and oft put to shame and rebuke; humbly beseeching all noble lords and ladies, with all other estates of what estate or degree⁸ they been of, that shall see and read in this said book and work, that they take the good and honest acts in their remembrance, and to follow the same. Wherein they shall find many joyous and pleasant histories, and noble and renowned acts of humanity, gentleness, and chivalry. For herein may be seen noble chivalry, courtesy, humanity, friendliness, hardiness, love, friendship, cowardice, murder, hate, virtue, and sin. Do after the good and leave the evil, and it shall bring you to good fame and renown.

And for to pass the time this book shall be pleasant to read in, but for to give faith and belief that all is true that is contained herein, ye be at your liberty; but all is written for our doctrine,⁹ and for to beware that we fall not to vice nor sin, but to exercise and follow virtue, by which we may come and attain to good fame and renown in this life, and after this short and transitory life to come unto everlasting bliss in heaven; the which He grant us that reigneth in heaven, the blessed Trinity. Amen.

Then to proceed forth in this said book, which I direct unto all noble princes, lords and ladies, gentlemen or gentlewomen, that desire to read or hear read of the noble and joyous history of the great conqueror and excellent king, King Arthur, sometime king of this noble realm, then called Britain; I, William Caxton, simple person, present this book following, which I have enprised to imprint, and treateth of the noble acts, feats of arms of chivalry, prowess, hardiness, humanity, love, courtesy, and very gentleness, with many wonderful histories and adventures.

THE RENAISSANCE AND THE EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

The term “Renaissance” has turned out to be a good deal less stable than was once assumed. The word “Rinascenza” (Italian: “rebirth”), from which “Renaissance” derives, was coined by the Italian historian Giorgio Vasari in 1550 to refer to what Vasari saw as having taken place in Italy over the previous two centuries: a rebirth of the ideas and the aesthetic values associated with the classical cultures of ancient Greece and Rome, after a thousand-year-long era in which civilization had gone into eclipse. By the time of Vasari it had already become conventional to think of that thousand-year period as the “Middle Ages” (or, using the Latinized form of the same phrase, the “medieval period”).¹ Subsequently the habit developed of seeing the Renaissance as being followed by another discrete era, the Reformation, a period characterized above all by the challenge presented by Protestantism to the authority of the Church of Rome.

Recent generations of scholarship have done much to destabilize this conceptual framework. Medievalists have located a variety of “renaissances” in, for example, the ninth and the twelfth centuries, and have thoroughly debunked the idea that the supposed “dark ages” were lacking intellectual or cultural life. Scholars have also distinguished among the later renaissances of the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries: a renaissance in Italy that began in the early fourteenth century (with the writings of Dante and Petrarch and the paintings of Giotto) and reached its full flowering in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries (the age of Machiavelli, of Leonardo da Vinci, and of Michelangelo); a renaissance that occurred in northern Europe in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, especially in the Low Countries but also manifesting itself in France and in England (among the leading figures of this renaissance were the great Humanist thinkers Desiderius Erasmus and Sir Thomas More, and the painters Jan van Eyck and Hans Holbein); and a renaissance that occurred in England toward the end of the sixteenth century in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth I (the age of Edmund Spenser, Sir Philip Sidney, and Christopher Marlowe as well as Shakespeare). Other scholars, though, have questioned whether or not England ever experienced anything that can properly be termed a “Renaissance.”

At a minimum, then, the phenomena associated with “the Renaissance” extended over a considerable stretch of time and across much of Europe. But they were not isolated from one another, sharing a tendency to focus on human concerns in new ways (and, in the visual arts, to depict the human form in persuasively realistic if often idealized representations). Historically too, the various renaissances were connected by a variety of direct links, many of them stemming from royal initiatives. The French King Francis I (1494–1547) lent vibrant support to new ideas from Italy and brought to France such renowned Italian artists as Andrea del Sarto and Leonardo da Vinci. In England, Henry VII (1457–1509) and his mother, Margaret, encouraged the “new learning” and brought to England the great Dutch scholar Erasmus; promoted men such as Thomas More, the scholar John Colet and Bishop John Fisher, who championed better education and classical learning; patronized William Caxton (who in 1476 had set up the first printing press in England); and founded two colleges at Cambridge University.

It was on this foundation that Henry’s son, Henry VIII, built his fully developed Renaissance court. The prevailing image of Henry VIII is that of the figure he became in the 1530s and ’40s, adding pound upon pound as he accumulated wife after wife. The young Henry—trim and lively, a sporting monarch and a man of culture, the “golden boy” peer of Francis I of France and Charles V, the Holy Roman Emperor—is a very different figure. Under the young Henry an international culture flourished in which leading continental humanist thinkers and great artists—the Dutch painter Hans Holbein most prominent among them—were persuaded to spend substantial amounts of time in England.

This manifestation of English Renaissance culture in the early sixteenth century was followed near the end of the century by an extraordinary cultural flowering of a different character—the Elizabethan Renaissance. This Renaissance followed the Protestant Reformation, and in consequence took on a different religious coloring from that of the Christian humanism so central to the Italian Renaissance and the early Northern Renaissance, which took shape before Martin Luther launched the Protestant Reformation in 1517. The word “Renaissance” is commonly applied to sixteenth-century and early seventeenth-century English culture, but many historians and even literary historians now prefer to term the era between about 1600 and some time in the eighteenth century the “early modern period.”

Here, as elsewhere, it is important to distinguish among the constituent parts of the British Isles. A later section of this introduction discusses developments in these areas more fully—as does the introduction to the “Literature in Ireland, Gaelic Scotland, and Wales” section found in this volume. Ireland, Scotland, and Wales each remained largely independent of English political control throughout much of the period covered by this introduction, and each also retained strongly independent literary and cultural traditions through the period—though the greatest periods of cultural flourishing in Ireland, Scotland, and Wales during the late medieval and early modern eras came far earlier than they did in England.

Regardless of whether or not we term it a “renaissance,” the period between 1500 and 1660 in England saw massive political, social, and religious change, change intimately connected to developments on the continent. The period begins and ends with a country exhausted by war: in 1500 memories of a long series of wars fought over the right of succession to the English throne (the “Wars of the Roses”) were still fresh, and in 1660 the return of Charles II from exile marked the end of the republican Commonwealth established after civil wars that had brought tumult to England, Scotland, and Ireland. Over these 160 years the national church—the foundation of the country’s devotional practices and beliefs—changed its entire orientation at least four times and was subject to constant debate and evolution. Centuries-old rites and traditions in the countryside, which still resonated strongly throughout society in the early sixteenth century, began to disappear and even to become objects of nostalgia. The world of maypoles and of Morris dancing, of hobbyhorses and bonfires, was bitterly opposed as “pagan” or “papist” by more radical reformers, and while such traditional pastimes were supported by the early Stuart monarchs, they were a thing of the past by the end of the period.

Medieval ideals of chivalry were kept alive (or resurrected) largely for political and social purposes even as a developing moneyed economy was refashioning the world. A succession of monarchs established munificent (if sometimes rough-hewn) court cultures, and a vibrant street life in London and other towns was a vital part of English culture. The English language, though still widely thought inferior to Latin, experienced exuberant growth. Scientific investigations of a recognizably “modern” sort were beginning to be carried out toward the end of the period, even as belief in demons, witches, and astrology increased, as did a more recondite belief in alchemy. For many years a woman reigned as monarch, and in literature a common conceit had it that male lovers were enslaved to the females they adored; yet the actual status of women probably did not improve over this period. How did this jumble coalesce in English literature? Let us begin by looking more closely at Renaissance humanism and at the Protestant Reformation.

HUMANISM

Nowadays the word humanist is often used to imply a “secular” opposition to religion in general and Christianity in particular. The opposite is the case with Renaissance humanism, particularly north of Italy. Humanists were distinguished from other scholars not by exclusive focus on human or secular texts, but rather by their focus on secular writings, particularly classical ones, as well as on religious texts and thought. Thus Erasmus produced books on Greco-Roman culture and editions of the New Testament in the original Greek and of works by patristic writers. In one key particular, humanism was in accord with Protestant thought: Erasmus and many other humanists supported making the Bible available in the vernacular. But—as attested by Thomas More’s willingness to die rather than approve England’s separation from the Roman Catholic Church—humanists tended to be more willing than Luther or, later, Calvin to remain connected to Roman Catholic tradition. (Erasmus, for example, favored reform within the Catholic Church but opposed a full Protestant Reformation.)

The recovery and reappraisal of works from classical Greece and Rome was central to Renaissance humanism

—as it had been to medieval scholasticism centuries earlier. The recovery of texts by the scholastics, however, had stressed applying classical learning to theological ends, emphasized Aristotle’s works, and tended to treat classical writings as authoritative. For Renaissance humanists, classical writings were of interest for many purposes: the epic poems of Homer and Virgil and the erotic poems of Ovid were of as much interest as the writings of the philosophers. And many humanists felt little obligation to demonstrate that a seemingly new idea in fact accorded with ancient authority. Renaissance humanism was often prepared to break new ground, and to acknowledge breaking it.

Of the Greek philosophers, Plato, rather than Aristotle, came to the fore. Of particular importance was the Platonic concept of ideal forms—the notion that for every physical object, metaphysical concept, and ethical principle there is an ideal abstract form that in fact is more “real” than its manifestations in the actual or material world. It is not difficult to see how Platonic “ideas” could be harmonized with Christian ideals, and many humanist thinkers endeavored to do just that.¹ But Platonic philosophy also lent force to the sometime humanist impulse, particularly in Italy, to celebrate humanity itself, if not without reference to a Creator then with unprecedented emphasis on human potential and free will. A groundbreaking text here was the Oration on the Dignity of Man (1486) by the Florentine writer Pico della Mirandola. As Pico saw it, upon man, at the moment of his creation, God bestowed seeds pregnant with all possibilities, the germs of every form of life. Whichever of these a man shall cultivate, the same will mature and bear fruit in him. If vegetative, he will become a plant; if sensual, he will become brutish; if rational, he will reveal himself as a heavenly being; if intellectual, he will be an angel and the son of God. ... Who then will not look with awe upon this our chameleon?

Northern humanists such as Erasmus and More were less optimistic about human nature, but nevertheless the contrast between Pico’s confidence and the emphasis on the inherent sinfulness of man (and even more of woman) in both medieval Christianity and the theology of the French Protestant John Calvin (1509–64) could hardly be more marked. It is in the writings of the humanists that we see the possibility of imagining human society as a body independent of the workings of God. The supreme English example is More's Utopia, which imagines, although with a countering irony and ambivalence, the transformation of a culture through fundamentally different but entirely human-made social structures and practices.

Though scholars differ as to its extent and influence, most agree that Renaissance humanism helped transform sixteenth-century English literature. The poems of Thomas Wyatt, a member of Henry VIII's court who introduced the Petrarchan sonnet to English literature, show the impact of Renaissance humanism, as do prose works such as Sir Thomas Elyot's The Book of the Governor (1531) and Roger Ascham's The Schoolmaster (1570). Renaissance humanism is also generally agreed to have contributed to a new exuberance and a new richness in the English language, despite its occasional tendency toward philological pedantry and a sometimes uncomprehending prejudice against medieval scholastic philosophy. One contribution was the introduction of yet more tropes of classical rhetoric into English and an increased attention to English as a language worth study and further polish. According to Ascham, the study of Latin, "wisely brought into schools, truly taught, and constantly used," would "work a true choice [in] placing of words, a right ordering of sentences, and easy understanding of the tongue, a readiness to speak, a facility to write, a true judgement both of his own and other men's doings, what tongue soever he doth use." (Ascham is here practicing what he preaches, using several of the figures of classical rhetoric in the construction of his long and elaborately balanced sentence.)

Humanists such as Erasmus wrote primarily in Latin, but their rhetorical impulse and linguistic exuberance spilled over into the vernacular. Under the influence of Joachim Du Bellay, who had defended French in similar terms, Richard Mulcaster (Edmund Spenser's teacher) asked some pointed questions and gave impassioned answers:

Is it not indeed a marvellous bondage, to become servants to one tongue for learning's sake the most of our time, with loss of most time, whereas we may have the very same treasure in our own tongue, with the gain of more time? Our own bearing the joyful title of our liberty and freedom, the Latin tongue remembering us of our thralldom and bondage? I love Rome, but London better; I favour Italy, but England more; I honour the Latin, but I worship the English.

Like much else about this period, the extent to which "Renaissance humanism" is a useful concept is subject to debate. Earlier notions of Renaissance humanism often assumed a top-down view of the period in which coherent intellectual movements were prime moving forces of socio-economic as well as political and cultural change. Recent scholars doubt that such movements in intellectual history are often quite so unified and coherent, believing that bottom-up change driven by socio-economic or religious forces may have at least as great an impact. Nevertheless, "Renaissance humanism" remains central to any discussion of the period.

SCIENTIFIC INQUIRY

Science and technology had not been dead in the Middle Ages, as witness developments in, for example, optics. It is the early modern period, however, that saw the start of what was later to be called, with a little exaggeration, "the scientific revolution." And yet the story of scientific development in early modern Europe is one of twists and paradox, not least because the Renaissance saw an increased, not a decreased, interest and belief in astrology, alchemy, and demonology. These fields of exploration are now called "pseudo-sciences," but the observations they entailed and the technology they encouraged, futile though the sciences themselves turned out to be, contributed to what we would call real science. Even the great Isaac Newton believed in the occult. Did Renaissance humanism play a part? Humanist fascination with ancient texts doubtless aided in the recovery or fresh understanding of scientific works by such classical authorities as Aristotle, Euclid, Hippocrates, and Galen (the latter two edited by Rabelais). Even more important was the increased use of Arabic numerals and that mathematically crucial concept, zero (realized in India and perfected by the Arabs).

Although he failed to understand the necessity of mathematics to his dreams of scientific progress, Sir Francis Bacon (1561–1626) was a key figure in formulating new approaches. As his essays demonstrate, Bacon's interests were wide. His Novum Organum (1620) was a plan to base scientific endeavor and an understanding of the cosmos more on objective observation and less on armchair theory or the consensus of the past. As Bacon put it, "man, custodian and interpreter of Nature, performs and understands so much as he has collected concerning the order of nature by observation or reason; nor do his powers or his knowledge extend farther." Among those who put into practice the inductive approach advocated by Bacon was William Harvey (1578–1657), an English physician who, through experiment and observation, determined how blood circulates in the human body. As Harvey observed in his De Motu Cordis et Sanguinis,¹ On the Motions of the Heart and Blood (1628):

Almost all anatomists, physicians, and philosophers, up to the present time, have supposed with Galen that the object of the pulse was the same as that of respiration. . . . But as the structure and movements of the heart differ from those of the lungs, and the motions of the arteries from those of the chest, so seems it likely . . . that the pulsations and uses of the heart, likewise of the arteries, will differ in many respects from the heavings and uses of the chest and lungs.

What Harvey did for the human body, the astronomers Copernicus, Galileo, and Kepler did for the universe. Galileo provided further proof of the Copernican theory that the cosmos does not revolve around the earth, and Kepler showed that the earth's path is an ellipse (although he continued to believe that the planets make beautiful harmony and tried to work out the musical notation involved). As the poet John Donne put it in his Anatomy of the World, if with some exaggeration, the "new philosophy," by which he meant the new natural science, "calls all in doubt":

The sun is lost, and the earth, and no man's wit,
Can well direct him where to look for it.

The lines are often quoted, but in truth some welcomed the new astronomy: in the older system, the Earth was at the center of the universe, but that center was a dark, dirty, and unmusical place, unlike the fiery and harmonious planets and stars.

Much as discoveries such as those of Harvey and Galileo affected the intellectual constructs through which people viewed each other and the world, some things remained unchanged from the late-medieval to the Renaissance period. One of these, challenged but persistent, was the habit of thought according to which the macrocosm was made up of four elements—earth, water, air, and fire—and the microcosm of the individual human was made up of four "humors," each with a physical association. Thus a sanguine humor or temperament was associated with blood, a choleric or angry temperament was associated with one sort of bile, a melancholic temperament was associated with a different sort of bile, and a phlegmatic temperament was associated with water. (Melancholia, which often meant what we would call neurosis and which was often thought to be linked to high intelligence and creativity, came in for particular attention in the Jacobean era: Jaques in Shakespeare's As You Like It is a paradigm of the type. And, in a different genre, Robert Burton's The Anatomy of Melancholy [1621] is a full and entertaining treatise on the subject.) Ideally, all four humors would be balanced. The domination of one humor could be the subject of a medical diagnosis—or of literary satire. Ben Jonson in such plays as Everyman in His Humour and Everyman out of His Humour was the most notable among many Elizabethan and Jacobean writers to make the "humors" of human individuals the subject of comedy. Such ways of thinking persisted into the late seventeenth century. As so often with scientific or technological developments, there was a lag between a discovery and its general acceptance.

THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND

The Protestant Reformation was in part about power: would the Roman Catholic Church retain power to act as an intermediary between Christians and God, power to define the nature of God, power to control all aspects of worship, power over the legitimacy of marriage and of children, and in many cases vast power over lands and financial resources, including the power to impose tithes and taxes? For centuries the Church of Rome had exerted supreme authority in all these areas.

The spark that set off the Reformation was a challenge put forward by Martin Luther on 31 October 1517 to the long-standing Church practice of selling “indulgences”—certificates granting absolution for sins. Luther saw the practice as a flagrant abuse of Church authority that discouraged people from confessing their sins in a spirit of true repentance. According to tradition, Luther nailed his Ninety-Five Theses—a substantial document in which he set out his arguments—to the door of the castle church in Wittenberg. Thanks to the new printing technology, the Theses were translated and distributed throughout Europe within two months, and within a year Luther was condemned by the Pope as a heretic.

Before long, the controversy set off by Luther had widened as much conceptually as it had geographically. Luther’s protest broadened into a wide-ranging call for reforms in the Church, including the elimination of perceived abuses such as the sale of indulgences as well as a new emphasis on making the Word of God, the Bible—for Luther the one true authority—available directly to all in the vernacular, a new focus on faith alone as the key to salvation, and a denial that human beings have free will (only with grace, he said, and not from the exertion of will, can people choose the good). In 1529, the Diet (or Assembly) of Speyer passed a comprehensive condemnation of Luther and his followers, but a minority of delegates delivered a Protestatio—the origin of the term “Protestant” that has come to be applied to the various new churches that sprang up across Europe in opposition to the Church of Rome, and that assumed leading roles in Germany, Holland, and England.

In England, controversies over the use or abuse of power by the Catholic Church were substantially complicated by the fact that this power was exercised from afar, from Italy; even in the Middle Ages such power had been resented in England, and in the early sixteenth century an increased resentment against traditional doctrines and practices can be attributed in part to their origin in Rome (or so said Reformers, for Catholics claimed to have derived them from Scripture, from continued revelation, or from the broader consensus of Christendom). And once the Reformation in England was an established fact, national feeling sometimes played a significant role in fanning the flames of religious hatred. As early as the 1540s, some Protestants had advanced the claim that the Pope was the embodiment of Antichrist, and such sentiment grew when in 1580 Pope Pius V pronounced that assassinating Elizabeth I of England would not constitute a mortal sin. It should nevertheless be remembered, as a number of recent scholars have stressed, that of the large minority of English men and women who remained Catholic and did not move to the continent, most remained loyal to both their faith and their monarch.

In attempting to sort out the causes of the Reformation, what weight should we give to the issue that sparked Luther’s rebellion—what many perceived as corruption in the Church, and in particular the sale of indulgences? It is now generally accepted that the degree of corruption in the late-medieval church was exaggerated both at the time and by most later historians; its true extent is still debated. We do know that in the late-medieval period many, including many loyal Catholics, accused the institutional Roman Catholic Church of abandoning its own ideals of concern for the poor, chastity for priests, and Gospel simplicity. Simony—the practice of buying and selling spiritual offices for temporal benefits—was widespread, as other such abuses were said, not always unjustly, to be. But there were other questions being asked. Should the clergy act as intermediaries in interpreting the Bible for the laity? Or should everyone, even the humble, be allowed to read and interpret the Bible (perhaps even actively encouraged to do so)? Is administering the sacraments and presiding over other rites the most important function of the clergy? (And how many sacraments are there? Catholics said seven; Protestants said only two: baptism and holy communion.) Or is preaching and spreading the word of God the central obligation of a clergyman? Is the sacrament of Confession (the confessing of one's sins to a priest) essential to salvation? Or should confession, no longer a sacrament, be between an individual and God? Is the substance, although not the appearance (the "accidents"), of bread and wine literally transformed during the sacrament of the Eucharist into the body and the blood of Christ by a process called "transubstantiation" that re-enacts Christ's sacrifice? Or are Lutherans right to say that God is "really" but not physically present in the bread and wine? Calvinists (and the Church of England) called the sacrament of the Eucharist a "sign"—connecting signifier to signified so as to make it more than a mere reminder—of God's spiritual presence and His connection to the believer. Not true, said some more radical Protestants, Communion is merely a memorial. Others, even more radical, thought it best to dispense with the ceremony altogether.

There were yet more questions. Are church hierarchies necessary to the carrying out of God's will? Or do they exist only for convenience? Is salvation dependent on good works performed, on sins not committed, and on remaining in communion with God? Or is it dependent purely on one's faith in God, a faith that may in turn be acquired only at God's pleasure? Might the salvation of "the elect" even be predestined by God? Is it a sign of appropriate respect to honor the Virgin Mary and the saints as well as the divinity through splendid displays of devotion? Or does that risk idolatry? (Protestants accused Catholics of actually worshiping saints and of elevating Mary beyond her due as the mother of Christ.) Or does a plain style honor God most fittingly? (In which case elaborate or colorful decoration in churches, let alone beautiful images venerated in themselves, are properly seen as further expressions of idolatry.) Should realism and discretion be exercised in any consideration of measures to "enforce purity" outside the Church? Or is it one's duty as a Christian to pursue purity through restrictions on irresponsible or pleasure-seeking behavior? May we (as King James I was to urge) enjoy a range of traditional practices that probably have pagan roots (maypoles, hobbyhorses, bonfires, bells, Christmas revelry) or must we, as many "Puritans" said, condemn such enjoyments as wicked, even devilish? Divergent answers to such questions separated Catholic

Thomas Wolsey, a butcher's son who became a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church, and was for many years Lord Chancellor under Henry VIII. Wolsey was as controversial as he was powerful, and his legacy remains controversial today. Widely praised by some for his administrative abilities and his adroitness in foreign affairs, to others he exemplified the corruption of the Church and the dangers of mingling religious office with secular authority. Holding the highest religious position in the land, he was also the King's chief minister, shaping both domestic and foreign policy. He left a lasting legacy in building Hampton Court Palace and founding Cardinal College at Oxford University, but when Henry VIII petitioned the Pope for an annulment of his marriage, Wolsey became caught in the struggle between his two masters. Henry stripped him of his government offices and of most of his property. His servant George Cavendish reported that as he lay dying on his way to what would have doubtless been a trial and execution, he said "If I had served my God as diligently as I have done the King he would not have given me over in my gray hairs."

from Protestant, and accompanied a number of divisions within Protestantism.

The Reformation came to England through circuitous means. The rejection by Henry VIII of papal supremacy led to a Protestant English Reformation but did not constitute a Protestant Reformation of the Church in England; only under Henry's son, Edward VI, was a more explicit Protestantism, both theological and institutional, established in England, and for reasons quite different from those that had motivated Henry. (Likewise, although some in the England of the 1520s and 1530s shared the varieties of Protestantism that were bringing sweeping change in parts of Europe, such beliefs were not yet widespread or powerful enough to establish the Reformation in England. Even when Elizabeth first began her reign it is possible that a majority of her subjects were still loyal to Rome.) Most immediately, Henry's break with Rome was caused by his desire to end his marriage to Catherine of Aragon and obtain a male heir by marrying Anne Boleyn. There is little doubt that he was in love with Anne, but almost certainly he would not have gone to such lengths to marry her had he not become convinced that Catherine would never give him a son.¹

The key developments in the break from Rome are as follows. In 1533, after Henry had exerted intense pressure on the English clergy to support his course of action, the marriage of Henry and Catherine was annulled, his marriage to (a pregnant) Anne Boleyn was consecrated, and she became Queen. At that point Pope Clement VII, who had been trying diplomatically to placate Henry without doing any violence to Catholic doctrine (or offending Catherine's nephew, the Holy Roman Emperor), now excommunicated Henry: forbidden to receive Communion, Henry was thereby excluded from salvation. Henry's response was to pass an Act of Succession through Parliament, under which all adult males in England would have to swear that they supported the change in the King's marital arrangements. Henry also decreed that the Bible should be made available in English, and that church services should be in English rather than in Latin, a radical break with the practice of the Church of Rome. Later that year the English Church was formally made independent from Rome, and all adult males were additionally required to swear allegiance to the King in his new capacity as "Supreme Head of the Church in England." Among the few who refused so to swear were Sir Thomas More, author of Utopia and from 1528 to 1532 Henry's Lord Chancellor, and John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester. In 1535 both were convicted of treason for their refusals and executed. Both were canonized by the Catholic Church in 1935.

As so often with Henry, the personal was entangled with the political. In an effort to build support for the break with Rome, he gave preferment to Protestants who not long before had been labeled heretics. This move helped both to buttress his own authority and to undermine Catholic institutions, most significantly the monasteries, bastions of privilege and possessors of immense wealth. Protestants were fervent in their opposition to the monasteries. Whereas monks had originally been venerated as embodiments of the godly life, they had come to be widely suspected (sometimes rightly) of corrupt and immoral behavior; in some parts of the realm, moreover, they were widely unpopular as landlords despite the role of some monasteries and convents in providing basic schooling and medical aid. In 1535, two years after the break with Rome, Henry appointed commissioners to look into these allegations; as he had doubtless intended them to do, the commissioners confirmed the allegations of corruption, and beginning in 1536 Henry ordered the dissolution of monasteries throughout England and annexed the land to the Crown. He thus provided himself with a vast and ongoing source of additional revenue, as well as with the ability to extend his generosity more widely to friends and supporters. Through Thomas Cranmer (Archbishop of Canterbury and hence the Primate of the English Church), Henry also broke with Catholic tradition by arranging for the publication of the first English Bible authorized for public use, the 1539 “Great Bible” of Miles Coverdale. The “dissolution” of the monasteries typically entailed their physical destruction, often to provide stones for the Tudor great houses that the gentry and nobility were beginning to build. “Bare, ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang” became a common sight in sixteenth-century England.

It later became a favorite residence of Elizabeth I.

Roger Fenton, Rievaulx Abbey. Rievaulx (located in East Yorkshire), once one of the greatest of English monasteries, had subsequently dwindled in importance, and housed fewer than two dozen monks at the time of the Dissolution. In 1538 the remaining monks were forced to leave, and the abbey and surrounding lands were granted to Thomas Manners, who destroyed many of the buildings but left the shell of the early thirteenth-century church standing.

Throughout his reign, Henry, who probably did not consider himself a “Protestant” in any profound or theological sense, attempted to steer a middle course between Protestant demands for further reform and residual Catholic tradition and theology. But for Henry, steering a middle way did not mean conciliation or consensus; it meant veering between censoring, imprisoning, and even executing greater numbers of one side or of the other. Even in the mid-1530s, as he was counting on Protestant support in building a campaign against the monasteries, Henry was also restricting licenses to preach and curtailing other forms of free religious expression that he thought extremist but which the Protestants demanded.

This picture, in which Hell-mouth appears at lower right, is one of a series of wall paintings in the Chapel that were whitewashed over in the later sixteenth century to remove Catholic imagery. Scholars continue to debate both the manner in which the Reformation came to England and the speed with which it did. Was the Reformation pushed forward primarily by pressure from above—by administrators such as Cranmer? Or was it driven more by pressure from below by a population dissatisfied with the old Church? Was England already Protestant at heart when Mary Tudor began her reign? Or did the Reformation in England remain a work in progress until the 1570s? Just how large was the Catholic minority—and when did it become a minority? Over such issues there is little consensus, although the recent tendency has been to affirm the vitality of the Roman Catholic Church on the eve of Henry's reforms and the continued presence of large numbers of Catholics in officially Protestant England. In any case, the broad outlines of the narrative are clear. For most English people in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, matters of faith were intensely felt realities, not abstract theological questions—even if they could be those too. Although educated lay Christians had long practiced versions of piety that included reciting parts of the Bible, we can get some sense of the freshness and the fervency of the feelings aroused by the increased stress on Bible reading through the words of Queen Elizabeth herself:

I walk many times into the pleasant fields of the Holy Scriptures, where I pluck up the goodly green herbs of sentences, eat them by reading, chew them up musing, and lay them up at length in the seat of memory ... so I may less perceive the bitterness of this miserable life.

It is not difficult to appreciate the aesthetic and cultural importance of religious issues in an age in which everyone was a church-goer (Elizabethan law required it, in part to determine who might be Catholic), in which crucifixes, rosaries, and so on—if now frowned upon by strict Protestants—had long figured in daily life as reminders of Christian doctrine, but in which the practice of reading the Bible had only recently become available to the population at large (if only by hearing it read out loud). The sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries were robustly secular, but they were also passionately religious. Cultures can be both, and it is important not to forget the strength of the religious ferment that extended throughout this period—or the fact that for many of those involved in it, religious matters defined the age and set it off in bold relief from earlier times. Such was the vision of the Protestant reformer John Foxe, whose Acts and Monuments (popularly known as the Book of Martyrs) was one of the most influential and widely read books of the age. Far from seeing the Middle Ages as a lost Age of Faith, Foxe regarded the thousand years before the Reformation as the millennium of Satan's rule prophesied by the Biblical Book of Daniel.

WALES, SCOTLAND, IRELAND

Henry VIII was an international figure beyond his support of Renaissance humanism; he was also a colonizing monarch, if largely confining his efforts to what is now the United Kingdom and northeast France. A continual thread that runs through the history of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is the recurrence of struggles by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh to remain independent—and, in the other direction, the struggle of the English to control them. English power reached an early peak around 1300, when the English were able to exert at least loose control over the greater part of Ireland as well as over Scotland and Wales. In all three areas the English faced continuing resistance, however. Scotland was able to re-establish its position as an independent kingdom; in Ireland, the English control diminished to a relatively small area surrounding Dublin known as "the Pale"; and in Wales, though the Normans had managed to install "English" settlers in many of the more fertile lowland areas, the mountainous regions remained very largely a traditional society that was effectively independent of English rule. When a Welshman, Henry VII, became King of England in 1485, however, administrative control of Wales from London began to harden. The process culminated under Henry VIII with the Acts of Union of 1536–43: the old Welsh areas of lordships were converted into shires on the English model, and the Welsh code of law was brought into conformity with its English counterpart. The traditional Welsh kinship system, under which equal inheritance among all male children was the norm, was replaced by a system of primogeniture, with John Speed, "Map of Ireland Divided into Several Provinces, and then again divided into counties, newly described," from the first atlas of the British Isles, Speed's Theatre of the Empire of Great Britain (1612). The division of Ireland into counties by the English that Speed references in the map's title had begun after the Anglo-Norman invasion centuries earlier, but was not completed until the early seventeenth century.

In most respects the map is, by the standards of the day, reasonably accurate; interestingly, however, the islands are represented as being closer together than is actually the case, with the strait separating north-eastern Ireland from Scotland and the rest of the British Isles represented as being less than half as wide as it is in reality.

land typically held on a freehold basis. Interestingly, though, the Welsh language does not seem to have been threatened during this period, despite English incursions into Welsh custom and culture.

Under Thomas Cromwell, Henry VIII's chief minister in the 1530s, the English attempted the same sort of "reforms" in Ireland that had been imposed in Wales—with much less success. Along with changes to traditional kinship systems, the English attempted to bring about the same religious changes in Ireland that were occurring in England: royal rather than papal supremacy over the Church, the Bible to be read in the vernacular, and the dissolution of the monasteries. These English efforts met with only sporadic success, and Henry did not push the point; it was not until the 1570s, when Elizabeth I's government found itself increasingly threatened by the aggressively expansionist Catholic regime of Philip II in Spain, that a more determined approach was taken toward "stubbornly" Catholic Ireland. Several revolts that had been encouraged by Spain were suppressed, and England resumed its efforts to colonize Irish territories (particularly in the north) that had been abandoned in the early fourteenth century. Ireland continued to be a thorn in the side of the English government, however. In one notable episode, Elizabeth's favorite courtier, Robert Devereux, the Earl of Essex, pressed the Queen for permission to lead an army against an Irish rebellion in 1599 led by the Earl of Tyrone. As had many before him, Essex found Irish resistance stronger than he had expected, was forced to make peace with Tyrone (against the Queen's orders), and returned to London in disgrace. (When he responded to his banishment from court by attempting a coup against the Queen, she suppressed his revolt far more successfully than he had managed to suppress that of Tyrone: Essex was beheaded in 1601.)

The English poet Edmund Spenser spent most of the last twenty years of his life in Ireland, where he had gone in 1580 to take up a position as secretary and aide to the Lord Deputy of Ireland. A View of the Present State of Ireland, published posthumously as well as anonymously but generally attributed to Spenser, gives a sense of the brutal force to which the English often resorted in their efforts to break Irish resistance and colonize the land: relocation of entire communities to make way for English settlers, acts of wanton destruction aimed at intimidating the population, and even the destruction of crops were common. Things did not improve in the seventeenth century. When Irish forces revolted in the early 1640s against English brutality and the expropriation of the best land for newly arrived English colonists, a considerable number of English settlers were killed. In response, Oliver Cromwell led an army into Ireland that more than matched the killing spree of the rebels, who were completely defeated by 1650. (For selections from Spenser's View and also for documents relating to Cromwell's suppression of the Irish, see the website component of the anthology.) The 1652 Act of Settlement decreed that expropriations be continued until two-thirds of all Ireland was owned by Englishmen, and that the majority of the Irish population be settled in a single county. These terms were never fully enacted, but enough was done to ensure that Irish resentment of and resistance to English colonial policies would continue far into the future.

In the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries English and Scottish forces had fought a series of battles, perhaps the most important of which was the English victory at Flodden in 1513, a slaughter that put an end to an early Scottish Renaissance. Despite such defeats Scotland remained an independent kingdom. But as the sixteenth century went on, it was more and more a kingdom with significant internal divisions. Throughout these turbulent times, much of the Highlands of Scotland remained out of the fray: it was a world largely separate from the culture of Edinburgh, but unlike Edinburgh's, a traditional and far less literate clan-based culture. In the Lowland areas (most importantly, the east-west stretch of Lowland in which both Glasgow and Edinburgh are located), English had long been the preferred language, a market economy had taken root, and after 1560 John Knox and his Scottish Presbyterian reformers had assumed a dominant position in society. At this point, as a result of royal marriages, Scotland was technically a province of France; Mary Stuart, Queen of Scotland and Queen Consort of France, had assumed the throne in Scotland and was advancing a claim to be Queen of England too. (Mary resided in France, and—somewhat confusingly for the modern student—was represented in Scotland by her mother, Mary of Guise, who acted as regent.) With French troops entering Scotland it indeed seemed that the English throne might be under threat, but with the assistance of English soldiers and English financing, Knox and the Scots Protestant faction won the day; under the terms of the 1560 Treaty of Edinburgh, French troops left Scotland and Knox's Protestants were left in effective control. Mary, Queen of Scots was allowed to hold the throne in Scotland, but only on the condition that she renounce all claims to that of England. (Mary, a Catholic and cousin to Elizabeth I, in fact never renounced that claim, and remained a thorn in Elizabeth's side until England executed Mary for treason.)

When Mary's son came to the throne as James VI of Scotland, however, and particularly when he also assumed the English throne in 1603 as James I of England, relations between Scotland and England assumed a different footing. James began to press for a full union between the two, but his proposals met with a good deal of resistance (the politics of which are, indirectly, the subject of much of the action of Shakespeare's King Lear [1606]). It was not until 1707 that the process begun by James culminated in the Act of Union joining England and Scotland under one parliament as well as one monarch.

EDWARD VI, MARY I, AND ELIZABETH I

Henry VIII was succeeded in 1547 by his 10-year-old son, Edward (the third of Henry's wives, Jane Seymour, had finally provided him with a male heir). The boy's uncle, Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, acted as Lord Protector. Though Edward's reign was short, it was not uneventful. Edward, his uncle, and other important figures of the time (such as Thomas Cranmer, the Archbishop of Canterbury) were more Protestant than Henry VIII had been, and more influenced by John Calvin. They accelerated the move away from Catholic practices and doctrines that had begun late in Henry's reign.

Edward died in 1553, however, and the move toward Protestantism was thrown into reverse with the accession to the throne of Mary I (not to be confused with the two Marys discussed above, Mary, Queen of Scots and Mary of Guise). Mary, daughter of Henry VIII by Catherine of Aragon, had remained a Roman Catholic and in 1554 married Philip of Spain (later to become Philip II). Among the many controversial measures Mary put into effect were the restoration of the Catholic Mass in Latin, the banning of the newly produced Book of Common Prayer, and the reaffirmation of the authority of the Pope over the Church of England. She earned the grim nickname "Bloody Mary" when she authorized the execution of various Protestant leaders, including Thomas Cranmer at Smithfield, from 1555 to 1558. In all, some 300 men and women were burned at the stake during Mary's reign.¹

Yet the long-term effect of Mary's rule was to strengthen English Protestantism, and English nationalism as well. The image of the martyrs burnt at Smithfield was etched in the English consciousness through the accounts in John Foxe's Book of Martyrs as a lasting image of the evils of Catholic rule, and when in 1558 Mary managed to lose Calais, England's last remaining possession on the continent, in an ill-judged attempt to defend some of her husband's interests on the other side of the English Channel, the loss united the country against her. She died in November of that same year; as the Elizabethan historian Raphael Holinshed put it shortly thereafter, she had neither "the favor of God, nor the hearts of her subjects, nor the love of her husband." After 25 years of religious turmoil and violence the stage was set for the religious settlement of 1559 and for the long, stable, relatively consistent, and relatively tolerant Protestant reign of Elizabeth I. The stage was set as well for the English to feel an unprecedented sense of confidence and indeed arrogance as to their place in the world; this, said Foxe in his Book of Martyrs, was an "elect nation."

ELIZABETH I AND GENDER

Perhaps the best known gender-related comment of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries is John Knox's 1557 outburst against "this monstrous regiment of women” (“regiment” here means rule). Knox, the Scottish Protestant leader, was at odds not only with Mary, Queen of Scots, and her regent, Mary of Guise (Mary’s French mother), but also with Mary I, Queen of England: all of them Catholic, all of them opposed to most of the reforms for which Knox was pressing. (Ironically, Knox was one of the very few to advocate universal education for females as well as for males.) He found the Protestant regime of Elizabeth I, who came to the English throne the next year, considerably less monstrous, but his phrase has retained currency as a memorable expression of the almost universal feeling among men in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that it was far more appropriate for men to rule over women than for a woman to “reign and have empire above men” (in Knox’s words). To the extent that a woman was perceived by men to have intelligence or good judgment in matters of state, men tended also to think of her as manly.

Elizabeth I was a figure who both exemplified conventional notions of gender and stood as the great exception. From the moment she came to the throne in 1558 she ruled with diplomacy, but also with sure-handed authority. Against a background of the violent upheavals of Mary’s reign, of many Catholics continuing to hold positions of influence (including control of the House of Lords), of militant Protestants pressing to establish a “perfect school of Christ” throughout the land and controlling the House of Commons, and against threats from abroad (particularly from the powerful Catholic monarchy in Spain), Elizabeth dexterously negotiated a religious settlement that established a stable, relatively moderate Protestant state. She negotiated compromises with Parliament that resulted in the Supremacy Bill of 1559, which established her as “Supreme Governor” of the Church of England (not “Supreme Head,” a more controversial title) and reintroduced the Book of Common Prayer. In 1563 she set out the Thirty-nine Articles, the theological foundation of the Church of England, further establishing religious uniformity. It was mandated that there were to be 9,000 parishes (in theory, enabling everyone in England to walk to church), and that a hierarchy would be maintained in the Church so that the world of faith would continue to mirror the world of politics. The Church of England was established as a national church, and attendance was far from voluntary. By the standards of the time, however, Elizabeth was no extremist: while some “heretics” were executed, the relative religious calm of her reign is set in stark relief by comparison to the continent, where over the same period invasion, slaughter, and religious turmoil remained the norm.

It should not be imagined that the Elizabethan Settlement satisfied everyone. Many, often called “Recusants,” felt varying degrees of loyalty to Rome, a loyalty that led some to flee to the continent and others to risk their lives by committing such crimes as hiding Catholic priests or encouraging the Catholic underground press. Many others, on the other hand, felt strongly that the new Church, with its retention of the old hierarchy of bishops and lower clergy, with a liturgy still closely modeled on that of the Catholic Mass, and with many other trappings of the old Church, had been insufficiently purged of Catholic elements. In such feelings were sown the seeds of Puritanism, the movement for greater "purity" of religion that would form one side of the religious debate that reached its zenith under Oliver Cromwell during the civil wars and led some to leave England for the Americas. Under Elizabeth, though, the tenor of such opposition was as yet one of resentment rather than revolution.

If diplomacy on Elizabeth's part was essential to reach a religious settlement, a willingness to exercise power ruthlessly was sometimes necessary to maintain it. As Elizabeth repeatedly demonstrated (perhaps most dramatically in her reluctant decision to sign the death warrant of her cousin, Mary, Queen of Scots, when evidence seemed to suggest that Mary had been involved in a Catholic plot against her), she was prepared to do whatever was necessary to remain in power and maintain the peace. And when war with Spain became inevitable, she marshaled sufficient financial and military resources to enable her commanders to stave off the threat. After some wavering, she sent troops to France to help Henri IV battle his Catholic enemies, and other troops to help the Netherlands in their revolt against Spain.

Yet for all her sure-handedness in exercising power, Elizabeth contrived to remain throughout her reign an icon of female virtues—although of course stressing the virginal ideal, not the maternal, as Elizabeth never married or had children. In part this was possible through a sleight-of-hand accomplished by lawyers and other advisors who, exploiting the old concept of the "king's two bodies," theorized that the Queen embodied an immortal "body politic" that was without gender and without defect, together with a "body natural" that was entirely human in character. Yet despite some grumbings over her refusal to marry and some evidence of exasperation with her tendency to delay, Elizabeth was for the most part admired, even worshiped, as both a woman and a monarch. She built up around her a glittering court and a culture of courtesy, grace, performance, and display that fostered an extraordinarily productive cultural outpouring, and that glorified (if sometimes with subtle reservations) her own person as the center around which all else revolved. Elizabeth,

Edmund Spenser explained in the letter to Sir Walter Raleigh that accompanied The Faerie Queene, was both Belphoebe, a beautiful maiden who represented the Queen as a woman, and Gloriana, who represented the "most excellent and glorious person of our sovereign the queene and her kingdome in Faery land." Elizabeth was thus both a woman and a queen, a virgin queen. Much as she had ample romantic and political opportunity to marry, and much as her advisors pressed her to remember the importance of producing an heir, Elizabeth must have realized that marriage would entail a loss of power, and a loss too of the special aura that had grown up around her. For most women in English society, marriage brought a loss of power: whereas a single woman could act as a legal entity in owning property or being a party to legal agreements, all such rights passed over on marriage to the husband. Elizabeth's situation as monarch was of course different, but even for her, marriage would have brought with it an expectation of submission to male authority.

Nor was it only marriage that would have brought a diminution of authority: for Elizabeth to have openly acknowledged her sexuality in any way other than the virginal would have badly damaged her mystique.

Why did "virgin" resonate so differently in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries than it does today? Some have suggested that the bifurcation in many male minds of opinions concerning woman—a bifurcation that had taken strong hold in the late-medieval period—may have deepened in the sixteenth century. Certainly that was a dichotomy with wide-ranging roots, some of which may be found in Christian traditions of ambivalence toward sex. Along with the growth in the exaltation of the Virgin Mary in the late-medieval period had grown a widespread (albeit far from universal) habit of venerating woman only if in a "pure" or asexual state. Alongside that paradigm had grown its polar opposite, one in which womanhood was associated with temptation, impure sexuality, and fleshly sin. Too often, perhaps, little lay in between. Yet the issue is resistant to easy explanation; the dangers of oversimplification in this area cannot be too strongly stressed. The Reformation in general led to an increased emphasis on the virtues of marriage, and Protestant England in particular vigorously privileged marriage. Throughout the period the Church accepted the reality a marriage could be annulled if a wife refused to have sexual relations with her husband; indeed, outright rejection of the flesh would have been heretical. That said, disgust with the flesh did certainly remain widespread—and some found it easy to project upon the female objects of their lust the disgust or anxiety that their culture had encouraged them to feel not so much about woman per se, but about sexual desire. Such misogynistic projections, all too common in other forms around the globe, remained a staple of English culture in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (and are of course not dead yet). When poets thought of “false love” as Walter Raleigh did, for example, in terms of “a gilded hook that holds a poisoned bait,” many found it hard to resist locating the source of the poison in women rather than in their male speakers.¹ Seventeenth-century male writers also not infrequently sexualized religious controversy by reading the religious other as problematically female; Ben Jonson parodies such rhetoric when he has his Puritan character, Tribulation, speak of standing up “against the menstruous cloth and rag of Rome,” referring to the deep red vestments worn by the clergy in the Roman Catholic Church. And early seventeenth-century popular pamphlets such as Joseph Swetnam’s An Arraignment of Lewd, Idol, Froward, and Unconstant Women (1615) excited considerable controversy over their attacks on women.

What did women think of all this? The literature of the period is overwhelmingly male-authored, but a few female voices found their way into print. Aemilia Lanyer (1569–1645), for example, one of the first women in England to publish her own poems (and to have obtained patronage in the way that was conventional for male poets), put forward in her Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum a bold and cogent denial that Eve was chiefly to blame for the Fall of Man: “Your fault being greater,” she asked, “why should you disdain our being your equals, free from tyranny?” Swetnam was also answered directly by Rachel Speght and others, and even figured in a play devoted to his discomfiture. It is probably as unwise to read the texts in this “querelle des femmes” with utter seriousness (some are riotous and hyperbolic in the way of much Renaissance satire) as it would be to dismiss the reality of the issues and the subtle thought that the (often female) defenders of women writers put into their arguments.

In sum, expressions of misogyny in Renaissance England were not always utterly serious and were countered by other voices, both male and female—but misogyny was nevertheless a daily reality. Women, even rich and well-born women, lived with what by modern standards were severe restrictions, legally and socially, on what they could do or be. That so many middle- and upper-class women did manage to write, to learn, to influence political, religious, and cultural life is both a testament to their determination and a reminder that social status was often just as important as gender in determining what a person could or could not do.²

² The restrictions imposed upon the poor, indeed, were more severe than were gender-based restrictions.

Modern scholarship has extensively explored these issues; in recent years it has also recognized more fully the ways in which sexuality and gender are not entirely essential, but are mediated by the larger culture. For example, recent studies have explored the frequent sixteenth- and seventeenth-century assumption, derived from ancient medical theories, that women are the same as men but, so to speak, inside out and born without enough vital heat to “perfect” them into maleness. And scholars have explored a number of aspects of the history of sexual behavior during the period. It appears, for example, that although sodomy as such was illegal (and loosely defined), the laws against it were not rigorously enforced. Research suggests too that the early modern period was much less anxious than were the next several centuries about the auto-erotic. Thomas Nashe’s notorious “Choice of Valentines”—also known as “Nashe’s Dildo”—is an important literary example here. (Though Nashe’s work was not published at the time, early modern curiosity about masturbation, particularly that by women, is also evident in other literature of the period, both in England and on the continent.)

HOMOEROTICISM AND CROSS-DRESSING

Research of the past generation has also increased our appreciation of the ways in which same-sex desire is mediated by history and by culture, and our awareness of the complexity of the issues involved. In any historical or cultural context it is important to distinguish between homosexuality (a term that did not exist until the late nineteenth century), and homoeroticism, which takes a wide variety of historically and culturally determined forms that might or might not involve the adoption of a specific sexual identity. In reading back into history it is far from easy for the modern reader always to keep in mind the ways in which same-sex desire differs from era to era in its meaning and modes of expression.¹

¹ For example, the late fourteenth-century expressions of love by the famous theologian Anselm of Bec, while making no explicit sexual references, are as fervent when addressed to men as they are when addressed to women; these expressions of love may well have been written without sexual intent, but are likely to seem to modern readers highly charged with eroticism.

That said, one of the most striking developments of English literature of the early modern period is the widespread appearance of same-sex eroticism. Not surprisingly, given the transgressive nature of such love at the time, it does so in an often conflicted or ambiguous fashion, frequently adopting as a model the conventions of male-female love. In Shakespeare’s twentieth sonnet, for example—one of the sonnets that first indicates his speaker’s love of another man as a central theme—the poet exploits some of the tropes of Petrarchan poetry in contrasting this love with that of “false” women:

A woman’s face with Nature’s own hand painted
Hast thou, the master-mistress of my passion;
A woman’s gentle heart, but not acquainted
With shifting change, as is false women’s fashion;
An eye more bright than theirs, less false in rolling.

The poem is perhaps the most famous expression of ambiguity in Shakespeare’s sonnets, one that both admits and denies simultaneously. The lover imagines his beloved, the “master-mistress of my passion” as once a woman (though less false than women are), but now remade by Nature into a man. Since, says the speaker, Nature has “added one thing [i.e., a penis] to my purpose nothing” and “pricked him out” to be male, women can have the use of his body and the speaker can have his love. At first this seems like a denial that the love in question is homosexual or even homoerotic, but as recent critics have been quick to point out, the puns on “nothing” (slang for vagina) and “prick” (slang for a penis) make the denial look far less certain.

The nature of homoeroticism in literature was not always openly acknowledged by the writers of the time even when it was openly expressed. Of some of his clearly homoerotic sonnets, for example, Richard Barnfield offered utterly implausible denials of the clear sense of his verse, saying that he had merely been trying to write like Virgil. (Imitating the classics proved to be useful in giving homoerotic verse a good cover story, so to speak; by taking as his model Virgil’s second eclogue, for instance, Marlowe could make his shepherd’s invitation to “Come Live with Me” less certainly addressed to a female “nymph.”) But the groundbreaking literary expressions are quite real. In this as in so many other respects, Shakespeare and Marlowe (in this case along with Barnfield, a much lesser poet) were pioneers; they are the first literary figures we know of in the 1590s to write openly and unequivocally homoerotic literature.¹ Marlowe imagines Neptune making a pass at the naked young Leander as he swims the Hellespont in the poem Hero and Leander, and in his play Edward II depicts the King's alienation from his kingdom and his wife in direct consequence of being "love sick for this minion," Lord Gaveston. (In the end Edward is reduced to a despairing hope that he may have "some nook or corner left / To frolic with" his "dearest Gaveston.") Barnfield is more explicit, whatever his odd denials in his prefatory material, about the transgressive nature of the desires being expressed: "If it be sin to love a lovely lad / Oh then sin I."

We have only minimal evidence as to whether the homoerotic expressions of feeling by any of these poets extended beyond the literary. In the case of Shakespeare, at least, we know that such expressions did not preclude marriage and children. More generally, we know that "cross-over" activity of several sorts was characteristic of the age. When Marlowe's Gaveston paints an idyllic picture of the world he desires, for example, it is one featuring "men like satyrs grazing on the lawns" but also young men resembling women:

Sometime a lovely boy in Diane's shape,
With hair that guilds the water as it glides,
Crownets of pearl about his naked arms
And in his sportful hands an olive tree,
To hide those parts which men delight to see ...

The place of female homoeroticism, let alone lesbianism, in sixteenth-century England is largely unclear. What we call "lesbianism" was certainly recognized in the early modern period, although the vocabulary differed from our own (a woman involved with another woman was more often called a "tribade" than "lesbian" or "Sapphic"). In general such love seems to have aroused much less anxiety than did male same-sex love. It did arouse curiosity, but there remained a good deal of ignorance as to the realities of same-sex love; it seems to have been a widespread assumption, for example, that same-sex love amongst women would inevitably entail such sex aids as dildos.

Despite some vague flirtations with the topic by Spenser (in Book III of The Faerie Queene, for example, a woman falls in love with a female knight whose gender is apparently concealed by her armor) and by Shakespeare (in whose plays the matter of gender and sexuality is complicated by the fact that boy actors took the roles of women, with effects that are not entirely clear from this historical distance), female-female eroticism is much less evident in the literature of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries than is its male counterpart. One of the few extant literary expressions of such feeling is an elegy by John Donne, that perhaps takes as a model some French poems, in which Sappho expresses her homoerotic longing for her friend "Philaenis." Somewhat later in the seventeenth century, however, representations of such desire begin to appear in some profusion, particularly in the visual arts. In literature the most widely discussed seventeenth-century representations of such desire, more ambiguously expressed, appear in Katherine Philips's poems to her "dearest Lucasia." Philips writes that "there's a religion in our love"; it remains uncertain whether such love is homosexual, homoerotic, or the expression of intense female bonding, a celebration of friendship that may seem more sexual to a modern eye than it seemed at the time. (It is wise to remember that powerful declarations of friendship were less likely to be read as homoerotic in early modern times than they are now, whatever the actual psychodynamics involved.)

¹ The importance of this aspect of Shakespeare's writing has only relatively recently begun to be fully and openly acknowledged. The 1609 publication of the sonnets excited no comment that has come down to us. Though some eighteenth-century editions of Shakespeare included the sonnets, others omitted them on clearly homophobic grounds. George Stevens, for example, the editor of a multi-volume edition of Shakespeare's works published in 1793, declared that it was "impossible to read this fulsome panegyric, addressed to a male object, without an equal measure of disgust and indignation." In the nineteenth century some (such as Robert Browning) regarded Shakespeare as representing a pinnacle in the history of sonnet writing in English, but others were distressed. Henry Hallam, for example, found it "impossible not to wish that Shakespeare had never written" the sonnets. And as late as 1930 published comments continued to allude with discomfort to the poems' homoeroticism: as Herbert Thurston wrote in that year, "regretfully as we must say it, the sonnets in their plain and obvious meaning point to a plague spot." It is only relatively recently, then, that the homoeroticism of the sonnets has ceased to be regarded as a taint—and that the poems themselves have been accepted unequivocally and universally as central to the Shakespearian canon. Some in the general public, though, are still taken aback to discover that, for example, the sonnet "Let me not to the marriage of true minds admit impediment" does not refer to heterosexual marriage.

A common literary motif throughout the period is the assumption by a protagonist of a cross-gendered disguise. One of the male heroes of Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, for example, assumes a female disguise as an "Amazon" and is even identified as "she" for the greater part of that work. Shakespeare, too, imagines strong and resourceful female figures (played of course by boys) who at some point pretend to be men, such as Viola in Twelfth Night, Rosalind in As You Like It, Portia in The Merchant of Venice, and Helena in All's Well That Ends Well. Evidently such behavior existed occasionally in real life as well, although not so much among the well-born: Moll Cutpurse, the lead character of The Roaring Girl, a popular 1611 comedy by Thomas Dekker and Thomas Middleton, seems to have been modeled on Mary Frith, a woman notorious for (among other things) dressing as a man.

ECONOMY AND SOCIETY IN THE SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES

Economic life in Britain over this period was as paradoxical as it was two centuries later during what we now call the Industrial Revolution. Although there was nothing like the explosion of technology in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, there were revolutionary changes in the economy and in industry—"industry" in the sense of how people worked, at what they worked, how much they worked, and what they received in exchange for their labor. The roots of these changes extend back into the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The Black Death in 1348–49 wiped out at least a third and perhaps as much as half of the population; the best guess is that the population of Britain did not recover to its pre-1348 levels until the seventeenth century. That catastrophic drop in population led to a surplus of grain (or, to be more precise, a surplus in grain-growing capacity) in the rural areas, and to a labor shortage in the towns as well as on the land. Inevitably, many young people were lured to the towns by the prospect of work in one or another of a variety of trades, and despite the best efforts of the authorities, real wages for such work increased significantly through the later Middle Ages. Whereas in the mid-fourteenth century the economy of England had still been overwhelmingly agricultural, with most rents paid "in kind" (in the form of grain or other agricultural goods) rather than in money, by the end of the sixteenth century approximately half the English population relied entirely on money wages.

If some were lured to the towns, others were driven there by a process usually referred to as "enclosure." Under the feudal system, those who worked the land did not own it. As large land holders decided that their fields could be put to use more profitably as grazing land for cattle or, especially, sheep, those lands that had typically been without hedges, fences, or other means of enclosure, and farmed on a largely communal basis by the peasantry, were enclosed, thereby depriving many of their livelihood.¹ John Rous, chaplain to the Earl of Warwick in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, described what happened in such circumstances with chilling concision: "all the inhabitants were expelled." To Rous, the plagues of former times were now being succeeded by a "plague of avarice," and he was far from alone in his outrage; indeed, enclosure was condemned by a chorus of voices in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. When a character in More's Utopia says that nowadays sheep eat men, he captures in one comic and yet horrifying expression the full effect of enclosures. The pace of enclosures in fact slowed considerably in the first half of the sixteenth century (with the exception of a period following the dissolution of the monasteries and the distribution by Henry VIII of many of their lands to his allies among the gentry and nobility). But the growth in population now meant that there was often a surplus of labor in the towns. Real wages for the majority were in decline through most of the sixteenth century, reaching their nadir in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.

¹ Economic matters were of course the primary issues of concern here, but they were not the only ones: in 1514, for example, London apprentices protested the enclosure of open fields outside the city, which they had traditionally used for sports and games, by tearing up the newly planted hedges.

Claes Jansz Visscher, detail from a panoramic view of London (1616). "The Bear Garden" and the Rose Theatre (mislabeled as "The Globe") both appear on the south bank of the Thames.

The practice of enclosure was particularly common in the south of England; a large proportion of the wool from sheep raised on the enclosed pastureland was exported to Flanders, and in particular to Antwerp, center of the cloth industry. By the early sixteenth century the English economy had become to a large degree based on the trade of raw materials—lead, iron, tin, and coal as well as wool and livestock. That pattern now began to change, with considerable growth, particularly in the textile industry. (Many weavers from Flanders had immigrated to England in pursuit of cheaper wool.) Many finished goods were still imported, but towns in both England and Scotland were diversifying and acquiring new economic capabilities. This tendency toward specialization and division of labor often involved entire towns as well as individuals. Thus Newcastle became known for coal production, Coventry and Norwich for textile production, Northampton for leather goods, Glasgow and Perth for various sorts of manufacturing, and Edinburgh for silverware and jewelry. By far the greatest diversification (and the greatest growth) occurred in London, which grew from a population of about 50,000 in 1500, to about 100,000 in 1570, to about 200,000 in 1600, and to 500,000 in 1650, becoming what was probably the largest city in the world.¹ Such growth was a mixed blessing. Despite the “bill of sewers” put forward under the auspices of Thomas More and passed by Parliament in 1531, sanitation could not keep up with population growth, and much of London had a foul smell most of the time. It also became a city largely blackened by soot; the introduction of chimneys in the mid-sixteenth century enabled households and businesses alike to switch from wood fires to coal—a more efficient heat source, but also more polluting.

By comparison, other urban centers, despite their growth, were tiny. In the late sixteenth century Norwich had a population of approximately 13,000; Edinburgh, Dublin, Bristol, and Newcastle each had approximately 10,000; and Glasgow, Exeter, York, Coventry, and Limerick all had about 5,000. The population of England as a whole seems to have risen from something over 2,000,000 in the early sixteenth century, to about 4,000,000 by 1600, to over 5,000,000 in the mid-seventeenth century. Over the same period, the population of Scotland rose from about 600,000 to perhaps 900,000 by 1600; that of Wales went from just under 250,000 to over 400,000; and that of Ireland from around 1,000,000 to around 1,500,000. In England the percentage of the population living in urban areas thus increased from something like 5 percent in 1500 to between 10 and 15 percent in the mid-seventeenth century.

This 1762 watercolor by Richard Greene, one of the earliest representations of the house in Stratford-upon-Avon where Shakespeare was born, provides a clear image of the half-timbered style of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century urban architecture in England.

For city dwellers, even more than for rural folk, life was a perilous business. Roughly half of all those born did not reach adulthood. If one were lucky enough to get through one's teens, one might expect to live until “old age”—but “old age” was typically regarded as beginning at 50. Overall life expectancy with infant mortality taken into account was about 30. As a result of poor sanitation, mortality rates—particularly for infants—were higher in London. And so too was the risk of violence; though the level of violent crime has sometimes been exaggerated, its threat was a real presence, particularly during periods when the population had been swollen even more than usual by impoverished new arrivals, or when a larger than normal number of unemployed apprentices were roaming the streets.

¹ The populations of London and of England as a whole were of course still modest by modern standards, and it is unsurprising that so many of the leading figures of the day were acquainted with one another.

Map of London, from "Orbis Terrarum," c. 1574.

If a shift of people, of economic activity, and of wealth to the cities was one trend throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a similar shift from the north to the south of England was another. The Wars of the Roses in the fifteenth century had drained the resources of a substantial proportion of the nobility of northern and western England, and the dissolution of the monasteries (which had been widely distributed throughout the realm) in the 1530s further depleted concentrations of wealth in the North and the Midlands. The southern concentration of the wool and textile industries then had the effect of increasing the shift of wealth from north to south. The merchant traders of Kingston upon Hull voiced a complaint of a sort common throughout the north when they blamed London for the decline of their own business:

Item, by means of the said companies (the government whereof is ruled only in the city of London) all the whole trade of merchandise is in a manner brought to the city of London; whereby all the wealthy chapmen and the best clothiers are drawn to London, and other ports have in a manner no traffic, but falleth to a great decay, the smart where we feel in our port of Kingston upon Hull.

There was likewise a disparity between social and economic developments in England and those in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. In the Lowlands of Scotland (and in particular the towns of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Perth) the pattern of development was not dissimilar to that of southern England, but in the Scottish Highlands small-scale agriculture continued to be the dominant mode of production, and the families of the nobility were often consumed in blood feuds. In Ireland there was a similar dichotomy, with economic growth and diversification in towns such as Cork, Waterford, and Limerick as well as in Dublin (and in the Pale generally), while other areas remained far less prosperous. During some periods, indeed, the Irish peasantry in the early modern period endured hardships comparable to those of the great famine of the 1840s. In 1582 to 1583 in Munster and again in 1602 to 1603 in Ulster, the English employed starvation as a means of subduing the Irish populace, with tens of thousands of deaths resulting in each case. In the wars of 1641–53 the toll was far worse, particularly following Cromwell's invasion of Ireland in 1649; several hundred thousand of the peasantry were either killed or displaced during this period.

In England, by contrast—much as the lot of the dispossessed and of wage laborers was often desperately unhappy, the economic turmoil of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries also brought to many others a level of prosperity that by the mid-seventeenth century was unprecedented; per capita, England in 1650 was the wealthiest nation in the world. How to explain this extraordinary economic growth? Part of the answer, some have argued, is Protestantism. At the heart of Calvinist belief in predestination and the “community of the elect” lies a widely noted paradox: for all of Luther's and especially Calvin's emphasis on the inherent sinfulness of humanity, the doctrines of predestination and of salvation through faith alone can in practice encourage self-confidence and a focus on the pursuit of prosperity. Not surprisingly, most people preferred to see themselves as elect and, despite warnings of Calvin and others, to read prosperity as a sign of God's approval. As the sociologist Max Weber put it a century ago in his famous analysis of this effect, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, Calvinist theology “in practice means God helps those who help themselves.” (To be sure, primarily Catholic lands such as France and Italy also witnessed an increased accumulation and manipulation of capital; one did not need to be a Calvinist to be a smart merchant or a canny investor.)

The impact of Protestantism—especially in its Calvinist and Puritan strains—on economic life was no less powerful as a result of being indirect in its operation. Protestant cultures often showed an aversion to “sloth,” and while many did not share a “Puritan” disapproval of traditional sports, games, the theater, and other pastimes, the period saw a substantial reduction in leisure time. Though “vacations” in the modern sense were unknown, it had become customary by the end of the Middle Ages not only to observe Sunday as a day of rest but also to celebrate a very large number of religious holidays (many of them in honor of saints that Protestants rejected)—so much so that some economic historians have calculated that a third of the year's 365 days may for most people have been leisure time in the early sixteenth century. Such was not the case by the late seventeenth century.

A further indirect but powerful influence on economic life was the Protestant emphasis on literacy. The initial motivation here was religious; in this respect Luther and Calvin (and many later Protestants) followed the evangelical (if also humanist) hopes of scholars such as Erasmus, who had declared that he wished that “even the weakest woman should read the Gospel ... and I wish that [the books of the New Testament] were translated into all the languages so that they might be read and understood, not only by Scots and Irishmen, but also by Turks and Saracens. ... I long that the husbandman should sing portions to himself as he follows the plough, that the weaver should hum them to the tune of his shuttle.” But the literacy that was useful to a clearer understanding of the faith was also useful at work—for women as well as for men. Erasmus’s dream of the rural husbandman who could read did not become a reality in this period; most of the rural population in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries remained illiterate. But in the towns there was a steady increase in the percentage of the population that could read and write. Thomas More’s estimate in the 1530s that half the population could do so was probably high, but by the mid-sixteenth century almost all the aristocracy and landed gentry were literate, and by the early seventeenth century it is likely that more than half the adult population in the towns could read and write, certainly including a high percentage of merchants, shopkeepers, and their wives, who would often assist with bookkeeping. (Significantly, it was through merchant subsidy that the first municipal libraries in England were started, early in the seventeenth century.)

Religious change may have helped to create a climate conducive to economic transformation, but on its own it could neither create nor maintain the actual engines of capitalism. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in England saw these engines—at once exhilarating and appalling in the ferocity of their operation—being forged. At the most fundamental level, capitalism is a series of means of transferring financial resources from those unable or unwilling to use it productively to those who can exploit such resources to create a financial return. Until well into the sixteenth century, the wealthy (like the monarch) tended to store whatever wealth they were not planning to spend in the form of gold in the Tower of London. An important exception was the large stock of gold and silver valuables in the possession of the monasteries. The dissolution of the monasteries in the 1530s—and the distribution of their wealth to various of the nobility and the gentry—substantially increased the available supply of gold and silver, and with it demand for goldsmiths and silversmiths to fashion or refashion precious metal into a variety of forms. Sometime in the early seventeenth century many goldsmiths began as a service to offer to keep supplies of gold in whatever form in their vaults. They soon realized that only a very small percentage of the amounts they were holding for safe keeping would be removed by the owners over the course of any given period; with that in mind they began to lend out the “unused” gold themselves (or, as time went by, use promissory notes in lieu of the gold itself). The precedent for this sort of activity had been set on the continent: the first public bank is thought to have been founded in Venice in 1587, and the Bank of Amsterdam was founded in 1609. The development of banking in England was accelerated by the actions of Charles I in the 1630s. Adamantly refusing to summon Parliament, Charles was thus unable to raise funds to carry on the activities of the government (or of warfare) through what was by then the usual means, by passage of an Act of Parliament. One means to which he resorted in his desperation was simply to appropriate for the Crown gold belonging to others that had been stored in the Tower of London. Not surprisingly, the practice of keeping one’s gold in the Tower became much less common thereafter, and the amounts stored with the goldsmiths of London (and thus available to be loaned out) greatly increased. Though the Bank of England itself would not be founded until 1694, in practice something resembling modern banking had by then been present in England for close to a century. Ben Jonson’s Volpone (1607), set in Venice but informed very largely by the economic realities of the time in England, gives some sense of the workings of the English economic world, or at least of how they could be satirically imagined, and of the importance of credit to their operation. Early in the play Volpone declares that he rejects the “common way” of earning a living:

... I use no trade, no venture;
 I ruin no earth with plowshares, Fat no beasts
 To feed the shambles [slaughterhouse]; have no
 mills for iron,
 Oil, corn, or men, to grind them into powder;
 I blow no subtle glass, expose no ships
 To threat'nings of the furrow-faced sea;
 I turn no monies in the public bank,
 Nor usurer private. ...

That "usurer private" was a well-known practice in the early seventeenth century is evident from a variety of literary sources. In The Warring Girl, for example, Sir Davy Dapper is described as "damned a usurer as ever was among Jews: if he were sure his father's skin would yield him any money, he would, when he dies, flea it off, and sell it to cover drums for children at Bartholomew Fair." Almost always spoken of in derogatory terms, and almost always associated with Jews,¹ moneylending was nevertheless becoming a more and more common practice throughout Christian society—and was thereby facilitating the very substantial economic growth of the seventeenth century.

Economic transformation brought with it massive change to England's class structure, if not always in legal definition then in social reality (to be a gentleman with a right to bear a coat of arms was a legal matter, and only the Crown could create a nobleman no matter what a person's fortune or fame). Much as the physical mobility of the labor force was wrenching and economically unfulfilling for many, for a considerable number of others the turmoil opened possibilities for real if usually limited social mobility. A 1508 legal document gives something of the flavor of what was possible, describing one Thomas Spring of the town of Lavenham in Suffolk as "cloth worker alias yeoman alias gentleman alias merchant." Spring had been accepted into the gentry (with the rank of Esquire) by the time he died, and his son was knighted. Perhaps the fullest literary expression in the late sixteenth century of such aspirations is to be found in the prose fiction of Thomas Deloney. Unlike most of the prose fiction writers from early in the century, Deloney had the benefit neither of a privileged background nor a university education; he was a silk weaver from Norwich who became well known in the early 1590s as a writer of ballads. Between 1596 and 1600 he produced four short works of prose fiction, all of which were extraordinarily popular. Deloney referred to aristocrats as "idle butterflies" and, whereas the norm for aspiring writers was to dedicate works to prominent members of the nobility in the hope of obtaining patronage from them, Deloney dedicated Jack of Newbury "to all famous cloth workers in England":

Among all manual arts used in this land, none is more famous for desert or more beneficial to the commonwealth than is the most necessary art of clothing; and therefore as the benefit thereof is great, so are the professors of the same to be both loved and maintained.

[... This] excellent commodity ... half being and yet is the nourishing of many thousands of poor people. Wherefore to you, most worthy clothiers, do I dedicate this my rude work, which hath raised out of the dust of forgetfulness a most famous and worthy man, whose name was John Winchcomb, alias Jack of Newbury, of whose life and love I have briefly written, and in a plain and humble manner that it may be the better understood of those for whose sake I take pains to compile it. That is, for the well minded clothiers, that herein they may behold the great worship and credit which men of this trade have in former time come unto.

As the dedication suggests, Deloney challenges both literary convention and the significance of social class not by emphasizing the degree to which a wage worker is downtrodden, but by imagining the possibility that he may rise to become like Jack of Newbury who, although no gentleman born (or even a gentleman made), nevertheless "set continually 500 poor people at work to the great benefit of the commonwealth" through his success as a clothier, and who "had the choice of many wives—men's daughters of good credit and widows of great wealth." To his credit, Newbury chooses none of those but rather "one of his own servants, ... knowing her careful in her business, faithful in her dealing and an

From a proclamation by Elizabeth I concerning apparel, 12 February 1580. For each rank separate restrictions on apparel are given, specifying who is allowed to wear particular colors or forms of decorative clothing ("furre of sables," material "imbrodered with any Gold or Silver," "Ruffes made or wrought out of England," etc.).

excellent good housewife." It is telling from a number of angles that Jack of Newbury continued to be enormously popular throughout the seventeenth century.

Much of the social fluidity and economic and social mobility that developed through the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries came despite efforts by the government to control it. The 1563 statutes of artificers (i.e., concerning apprentices) declared the obligation of everyone to "toil" and declared as well the importance of "degree, priority, and place" as part of the natural order laid down by God. Through the second half of the sixteenth and the first half of the seventeenth centuries, however, it no longer seemed natural that dedication to work would act to support the existing system of "degree, priority, and place."

If the aspiring middle class threatened the old social order, so, too, did the increasing number of landless poor. In the face of the substantial increase in "vagrants and beggars" in the towns in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, authorities began to license beggars and to accept some formal responsibility for the poorest members of society. The culmination of this process came in the 1590s, a decade of extraordinary literary achievement, one that saw some of Shakespeare's greatest plays and his sonnets, the plays and poetry of Marlowe, the early plays of Ben Jonson, much of the secular poetry of John Donne, Spenser's The Faerie Queene, and the printing of Philip Sidney's Arcadia, Atrophil and Stella, and The Defense of Poesy. It was also a decade in which the court of Elizabeth I reached its glittering zenith and in which England, fresh from its defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588, experienced the early stages of its growth into a world power. Elizabeth herself was, wrote John Davies in 1596, "our glorious English court's divine image, / As it should be in this our Golden Age." But this decade was also one of the most economically depressed in English history, with poor harvests causing increased prices and further depressing already-low wages for many of the poor; by one calculation living costs in the late 1590s were in the range of five times as high as they had been at the start of the century, and real wages in 1597 less than a third of what they had been a century earlier. Nor were matters helped by the recurrent visitations of plague, by underemployment souring the temper of some university graduates, and by widespread anger among the well-to-do at Elizabeth's seemingly unfair allotment of economic monopolies. In 1598 the Poor Law Act set out provisions for collecting and distributing a "poor rate" to individual parishes so as to alleviate the worst of the suffering, but improvements in the lot of the poor were at best very gradual over the succeeding decades.

To a considerable degree poverty was structural, relating not only to the substantial degree of control exercised by the authorities over wages and prices, but also to the system of apprenticeship. Unlike modern apprentices, apprentices in the guild system as it had grown up through the later Middle Ages and the sixteenth century were not free to leave the work into which their parents had bound them (typically, by paying a fee of several pounds). They were obligated to serve a master for at least seven years and sometimes many more, in exchange for which they received training and very basic room and board, but no payment beyond that. In 1595 apprentices in London rebelled, with crowds taking large quantities of the food they could not afford to buy and destroying the Cheapside Pillories at which many of them had previously been punished for petty offenses.

From about 1600 onwards, however, the old apprenticeship system—and indeed the guild system generally—began to go into decline. The newer (and usually faster-growing) trades tended to be established outside the city boundaries and outside the control of the guilds; apprentices, who made up approximately 15 percent of the London population in 1600, made up no more than 5 percent of its much larger population a century later. Apprentices still made their presence felt through much of the seventeenth century (most notably in the turmoil of the 1640s), but by century's end were no longer a significant force; the age of wage labor for all, however young, was by then well underway.

The spread of forward-looking thought was both a cause and a consequence of the economic dynamism of the seventeenth century. Despite the persistence of old prejudices against moneylending and against Jews (witness Shakespeare's Shylock in The Merchant of Venice or Marlowe's more satirically imagined Barabas in The Jew of Malta), both the lending of money outright and the extension of credit increased fairly steadily through this period, thereby greatly facilitating the expansion of trade and of industry. This expansion of moneylending and credit, it should perhaps be noted, came almost entirely within mainstream Christian society. (Jews had been expelled from England by Edward I in the late thirteenth century, but small numbers returned in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, and in the mid-seventeenth century they were given official sanction to live in England, albeit without all of the rights and privileges enjoyed by Christians.) More and more, habits of thinking into the future were based on calculations of probability rather than on expressions of hope or fear or prophecy. An important indicator of this change was the development in the mid-sixteenth century of insurance. Not until the late seventeenth century, however, were future probabilities calculated for the purpose of insurance in anything like the way they are today; initially, insurance on ships and their cargos (the earliest form of insurance in England) would never be contemplated until a ship was already overdue. Premiums would then be set according to how long overdue the ship was, how dangerous the route was considered to be, and so on.

Although economic change together with higher levels of education and literacy encouraged the spread of rationalist thought, belief in magic and the supernatural barely diminished and in some areas increased (as evidenced, for example, by the proliferation in the seventeenth century of texts on alchemy and astrology). Rationalism and a reliance on supernatural explanations coexisted within most individual minds as well as within society at large. Elizabeth I turned to John Dee for astrological advice, and when the alchemist Cornelius Lannoy could not deliver on his promise to create gold, she made him suffer for his failure. The intellectually lively James I was the author of a treatise on witches (and responsible as well for executing considerable numbers of women alleged to be witches in Scotland). Most people still interpreted unusual occurrences in the heavens as does Gloucester in Shakespeare's King Lear: "these late eclipses in the sun and moon portend no good to us." Modern audiences may find it difficult to take seriously the predictions of the witches in Shakespeare's Macbeth or the doctor's faith in "demonstrations magical" in Marlowe's Doctor Faustus; the skepticism found in Jonson's The Alchemist and the disbelieving scoffs that enliven Reginald Scot's Discoveries of Witchcraft are more in line with modern sensibilities. But most late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century people saw such things differently. Indeed, the power to draw simultaneously on rationalist ways of connecting cause and effect and on traditional supernatural thought is one reason for the remarkable resonance of much Renaissance drama.

"THE ROUND EARTH'S IMAGINED CORNERS"

Recent scholarship has done much to broaden and to destabilize older notions of Britain and her place in the world. Until the late twentieth century, most accounts of the Renaissance and seventeenth century in England were Anglocentric and, whatever the personal convictions of the historian, apt to ignore English Catholicism and to read the English Reformation as a narrative of obvious progress. Such a perspective, moreover, often accompanied a certain triumphalism in which English history—political, economic, or cultural—was a story of steady movement from one high point to another as the influence of various triumphs radiated outward from their London epicenter. It is now more often recognized that England was then—and as part of the United Kingdom is still—a historical and geographical point connected to a myriad of other points around the globe. At the beginning of the period covered by this chapter, England was a small, modestly significant nation on the edge of Europe; by its end, England was Great Britain and a significant world power. But scholars increasingly connect this rise to developments in other countries as much as to developments within Britain itself: in terms of religious, economic, political, and intellectual as well as literary and cultural history, changes in early modern Britain interacted with those in Italy, Holland, France, Germany, and Spain. In addition, Britain in this period began more significantly to interact with the world beyond Europe.

Throughout this period, the government regulated international trade and settlement with the same care as it regulated wages, prices, or religion. It was often only with the blessing or even sponsorship of the Crown that the great sea voyages of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries could take place, whatever the disappointment on the part of some would-be colonizers with sometimes less than enthusiastic royal support for their overseas projects. Despite the moral qualms Elizabeth is reported to have expressed regarding John Hawkins's pioneering ventures in the slave trade beginning in the 1560s, she became an investor in his ventures. For the most part she supported Sir Walter Raleigh's famous voyages of exploration and sometimes of colonization to Virginia, the West Indies, and South America. She also supported the voyages of plunder carried out against the Spaniards by Sir Francis Drake and others and knighted Drake when he returned to England after voyaging around the world from 1577 to 1580. Unlike the Spanish, English adventurers did not manage to claim any colonies rich with gold. But their failure in this respect was surely a blessing in disguise: Spain's preoccupation with adding to its hoard of precious metals almost certainly contributed to the eventual stagnation of its economy and society.

In the seventeenth century, British arrangements for worldwide trade began to be formalized, largely through the creation of state-sanctioned monopolies. The East India Company was granted its charter in 1600, the Hudson's Bay Company in 1670, and the Royal African Company in 1672; these corporations were to play a vital role not only in establishing trade but also in colonizing India and much of northern North America. Arguably, though, the voyage in this period with the greatest impact on world history was one launched in reaction to the religious policies of the Crown—that of the 102 Protestant sectaries (the "Pilgrims") who, despairing at their religious and political prospects in Jacobean England, left first for the religiously tolerant Netherlands and then, in 1620, set sail on the Mayflower for the New World, founding a colony at Plymouth, Massachusetts. From the 1620s onwards, the literature of England should not be considered to be an entity entirely separate from the literature of England's overseas colonies—the inhabitants of which continued for the most part to think of themselves as English throughout the period covered by this introduction.

Given this developing engagement with the peoples of the New World, India, and Africa, what of attitudes toward race at this time? From passages such as the following exchange in Ben Jonson's comedy Volpone

(1607), we may infer that black Africans were commonly regarded with as much derision as other groups against which there was strong prejudice:

CORVINO. Has he children?

MOSCA. Bastards,
Some dozen or more, that he begot on beggars,
Gypsies, and Jews, and black-moors, when he was drunk.

Knew you not that, sir? 'Tis the common fable.

Yet we have no evidence to suggest that there was discomfort with Shakespeare's portrayal of the "black-moor" Othello as a tragic hero. (In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries there was a considerable reaction against any suggestion that such a hero could be black, but we have no record of such a response in the early seventeenth century.) We have noted that Elizabeth invested in John Hawkins's slaving voyages, but she also is said to have described such activity as "detestable" and prophesied it would prompt the "vengeance of Heaven" upon those who participated in it.

The problem of determining early modern racial attitudes in Britain is further complicated by shifts in the meaning of the word "race" and the use of the word "black" to mean what we would call "brunette" or "dark." In any case, there was to many minds something of the exotic about almost any dark skin: Henry VIII, Elizabeth I, and James I all included a few African servants in their entourages, and a good portion of the nobility seems to have followed their lead in the late sixteenth century. Even if its nature and assumptions were evolving, though, there can be no question that racial prejudice existed during this period. In some cases distinctions appear to have been made based on gradations of color. Some, for example, distinguished "black-moor" from the "white-moor," or drew a tripartite division of black-moor, tawny-moor, and white-moor. Others, however, seem to have used "moor" as synonymous with "black-moor" and, indeed, to have seen all dark skins in very much the same light. Even the native peoples of North America are sometimes described as "black creatures."

THE STUARTS AND THE CIVIL WARS

Elizabeth's decision to remain unmarried helped her negotiate delicate political and religious balances throughout her reign. But her lack of a direct heir meant that at her death in 1603 the crown passed to her distant cousin, James VI of Scotland, now also James I of England, son of the executed Mary, Queen of Scots. Elizabeth was the last of the Tudors, the royal family that had ruled England since 1485. James was a Stuart, the royal family that would rule through direct succession until the early eighteenth century, and whose descendants wear the English crown today. The accession of James united the crowns of England and Scotland. With Wales already annexed officially to England under Henry VIII, this union with Scotland was celebrated by some as the revival of the ancient, undivided island realm of Britain (though the country did not officially become "Great Britain" until 1707). The shift from England to Britain marked a new phase of the English Renaissance in the early seventeenth century. But this "British factor" also introduced a new set of political, religious, and social tensions that would in a few decades help tear the country apart in civil wars, wars that would eventually usher in the changed political and cultural world of the Restoration and eighteenth century.

James came to the English throne an experienced king: monarch of Scotland in name from the age of one, he had been educated for the role since childhood and had in his own right successfully ruled his fractious northern kingdom since the mid-1580s. His ascent to the throne was in consequence widely welcomed. While the later 1590s had been a period of astonishing cultural accomplishment in England, these years had also been marked by deep frustration with an aging queen increasingly reluctant to make decisions: most members of the English political class looked optimistically to James for a renewal of energy and action. James, however, would not always live up to these expectations. To begin with, any change in monarchs meant a change in the respective political fortunes of the ruling elite. One observer of the London court commented dryly that as soon as James was named King, would-be courtiers began to race north toward Edinburgh, "as if it were nothing else but first come first served, or that preferment were a goal to be got by footmanship." Some members of the Elizabethan court would keep their positions: Robert Cecil, Secretary of State from 1596, continued to hold the same office under James. Some individuals (like Sir Francis Bacon) and families who had not thrived politically under Elizabeth found great success under James. Others saw their power decline or disappear into the hands of Scottish favorites who happily left their estates in impoverished Scotland and descended hungrily on London. James generously shared his good fortune. While the parsimonious Elizabeth had been served by 18 "gentlemen of the privy chamber," James provided for 48, and appointed as well 200 "gentlemen extraordinary." Many had little to offer the country except charm and beauty, good legs and skilled dancing—qualities that could take a courtier far in the Jacobean court. As funds started to dwindle, new money-making schemes flourished, with James in effect selling aristocratic titles (including a new one, the baronetcy) by the score, and knighthoods by the hundreds. The figure of the newly jumped-up knight or minor aristocrat soon appeared as a satirical target on the London stage.

Religious reformers—Presbyterians and Separatists, collectively known as "Puritans" despite their widely differing ideas about church government—were another disappointed constituency. The Scottish Reformation of 1560 had been a Presbyterian Reformation, producing a church government that, officially at least, did not recognize the authority of bishops. While the Scottish episcopate never quite disappeared, its existence from 1560 to about 1610 was always precarious. English Presbyterians consequently hoped that James, up to that point the monarch of a "reformed" national church, would move the Church of England in a more strongly Protestant direction. But when they petitioned James in 1604, he flatly rejected their request for a church with an egalitarian structure along the lines of the Presbyterian Kirk. "No bishop, no king," he replied, voicing the analogical thinking so characteristic of the period: a challenge to hierarchy in the religious sphere threatened the idea of political hierarchy. Within a few decades, he would be proved right: Scottish revolutionaries in the late 1630s and English revolutionaries in the 1640s both abolished episcopacy as soon as they had the power to do so, as a prelude to their attacks on the authority of the Crown.

James did agree to sponsor a new translation of the Bible, a project that resulted in what surely must be one of very few masterpieces ever produced by committee. The King James (or "Authorized") version of 1611 for the most part retained the language of Tyndale's version from the 1530s, but in terms of religious politics it represented an important step forward: it was the product of years of collective negotiation over controversial phrases. This translation would shape literary language for centuries to follow, and retain (with some

Though the proportion of Catholics in early seventeenth-century Britain is thought to have been low, some Catholics still hoped for an overthrow of Protestant rule and a re-establishing of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1605 extremist Catholics, among them one Guy Fawkes, were reported to have been discovered to be plotting acts of terrorism; bombs, officials claimed, had been discovered beneath the House of Lords. Though James at first noted that not "all professing the Romish religion were guilty of the same," he soon made clear that he had no more tolerance for Catholic dissent than he did for the Puritan variety. Many priests suspected of Catholic leanings were stripped of their posts and/or imprisoned. As for Guy Fawkes, James authorized his torture (he confessed after two days on the rack) and his subsequent execution. To this day November 5, the anniversary of the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot, is celebrated with bonfires and merrymaking through much of England. Some scholars claim that evidence for this conspiracy was exaggerated, perhaps even planted, by officials who sought to fan the flames of anti-Catholic sentiment.

revisions) its primacy in the Church of England through to the second half of the twentieth century. But James did not succeed in mollifying the more extreme Puritans, and indeed had no intention of trying to do so. Within a few years, some Separatists (i.e., those calling for a separation of Church and state; Separatists—who were later often called Independents or Congregationalists—denied the legitimacy of any state church) left for the toleration of Amsterdam and Leiden, and in 1620 sailed to the New World to found their colony in Massachusetts. But on the whole the English church was less divided and contentious under James than under Elizabeth, and scholars refer to a broad “Calvinist consensus” in his reign. It was probably not until the 1630s that debates between “Anglican” and “Puritan” once again became a central component of national debates about the powers of church and state.

James’s relationship with his House of Commons was complex, and scholars continue to disagree over how to characterize the politics of his reign. In principle, James was an absolutist, and his reign saw the popularization in England of theories of “divine right” monarchy. But in practice, James was a canny negotiator, and seemed to have good instincts for when to push his theoretical claims for absolute power and when to make concessions to Parliament. Some scholars read this period as marking the beginnings of parliamentary and democratic rebellion that would lead to civil war; others argue that James was on the whole a politically successful monarch, and that the real political challenges developed in reaction to the far less flexible absolutism of his son, Charles I. Certainly, many members of Parliament and the population were exasperated by James’s financial extravagances. But they were also exasperated by his refusal to incur the further expense of intervening in the religious wars that devastated Europe after 1618—a decision many saw as particularly irresponsible since James’s own daughter, Elizabeth, was Queen of Bohemia and had been compelled to abandon her throne when Bohemia was invaded by a Catholic army. But whatever his motives, James, much like Elizabeth, managed largely to keep Britain out of wars during a period in which warfare consumed Europe. As far as internal politics are concerned, James kept the affairs of his English and Scottish kingdoms quite separate: he had originally favored union between England and Scotland but came to accept that this would be impracticable. But he sowed the seeds of future trouble by his attempts to impose rule on Scotland from afar, and by encouraging mass emigration by English and particularly by Scots (later called the “Scots-Irish”) to Ireland, where he authorized them to dispossess local inhabitants of their lands.

With the death of James and the accession of his son Charles I in 1625, cracks began to appear in the political and religious consensus that James had managed to maintain. Charles’s court was far more refined than that of his father, and was artistically brilliant: Charles amassed one of the greatest art collections in Europe. But he lacked his father’s willingness to compromise. What Charles looked for in his advisors and his people was primarily obedience, and he believed more firmly than his father in the divine right of kings. When Parliament challenged royal prerogatives with the “Petition of Right” (1628), a declaration of the “rights and liberties of the subject,” Charles eventually assented—but within a year he in effect shut down Parliament and ruled without it for the next decade. Since Parliament traditionally voted the funds that supported the monarchy, throughout the 1630s Charles was compelled to rely on increasingly resented alternative means of raising money, such as legally dubious taxes. When he was forced by an invading Scottish army to recall Parliament in 1640, he found himself facing a body interested in little but confronting him with the grievances that had accumulated in the previous decade.

Religious reformers who remained discontented with the Elizabethan Settlement and James’s “Calvinist consensus” were outraged—and radicalized—by changes in the Church under Charles and William Laud, named Archbishop of Canterbury in 1633. Many were suspicious (possibly legitimately) of Charles’s own religious beliefs: his Queen, Henrietta Maria, was a French Catholic, and her personal priests were widely thought to have too much power in the court. While Laud was not looking to reimpose Catholicism on the Church of England, as his enemies maintained, he was very concerned to introduce a greater degree of ritual, ceremony, and uniformity in Church practice, and many people in England saw Laud’s “High Church” innovations as at Manuscript illustration of the presentation of a book to a king from The Vaux Passional (early sixteenth century). This recently rediscovered image depicts an enthroned king, assumed to be Henry VII, receiving a manuscript emblazoned with the royal arms of England. The two girls to the left of the throne, probably 13-year-old Princess Margaret and 7-year-old Princess Mary, are kneeling beside the fireplace wearing black headdresses. Behind the girls, a young boy can be seen with his head down on an empty bed. The figure is thought to be 11-year-old Prince Henry (future King Henry VIII) mourning the loss of his mother, Elizabeth of York; both he and his father grieved very intensely after Elizabeth died suddenly in 1503. It is likely that the manuscript, which contains an account of Christ's passion and a poem titled "The Mirror of Death," was presented in connection with the death of the queen. In this watercolor drawing the king is seated below the royal coat of arms, wearing his crown and holding the scepter, his feet resting on a cushion. To his right (i.e., to the left of the picture) are Archbishop Warham of Canterbury and Cardinal Wolsey. Before him two earls hold the cap of maintenance and the sword of state. Dukes wear coronets; other peers of the realm wear hats; to the left nine bishops (in red) and seventeen black abbots wear their miters.

Anonymous, Edward VI and the Pope: An Allegory of the Reformation, c. 1569. In this painting, the dying Henry VIII gestures toward his heir, the young Edward VI. The weight of Edward's throne presses on the neck of a pope, who wears ribbons reading "IDOLATRY" and "SUPERSTITION" and is labeled with the words "FEYNED HOLINE[SS]" and "POPS" (i.e., "popes"); on his chest is written "ALL FLESHE IS GRASSE" (a phrase from Isaiah 40.6, alluding to the impermanence of the physical body). On top of the pope's head, an open book reads "THE WORDE OF THE LORD ENDURETH FOREVER." Next to the pope, a pair of monks stride toward the edge of the image, each pulling a chain attached to the bottom of the platform Edward sits upon. On the opposite side of the work is a small scene depicting the demolition of religious idols. Under it, several members of the Regency Council that governed on Edward's behalf sit at the table. Standing next to the child king is Edward Seymour, 1st Duke of Somerset, who was first to lead the council as Lord Protector of the Realm. The painting is not entirely finished; there are several blank squares that were likely intended to contain smaller anti-Catholic scenes similar to that depicting the destruction of the idols.

This painting was long assumed to date from the time of Edward VI; it is now more widely believed to have been painted more than a decade later, during the reign of Elizabeth I, as a reassertion of English Protestantism following Mary I's brief Catholic reign.

Isaac Oliver, Portrait of a Young Man, c. 1590–95. This miniature portrait of an unidentified man is one of the most famous Renaissance paintings. The full length miniature, first developed by Oliver in the 1580s, allowed the artist to depict a background to the figure and to hint at narrative elements. Here, for example, we see the young man's melancholy expression, his one discarded glove, and his isolated position on a rock overlooking an unidentified garden background, where two figures are walking. Horace Walpole suggested in the eighteenth century that the young man depicted here could be statesman and poet Sir Philip Sidney; however, no evidence has been found to support this theory.

Marcus Gheerarts the Younger, portrait of Barbara Gamage Sidney, Countess of Leicester, and her children (1596). Barbara Gamage Sidney, sister-in-law to the poet Sir Philip Sidney, is depicted here with her two sons and four daughters. Robert Sidney, Barbara's husband, is absent from the family portrait. Each of the mother's hands touches one of her young sons, and her daughters appear in pairs on either side of the painting; the eldest, Mary Sidney, grew up to achieve fame as the poet and prose writer Lady Mary Wroth.

In a poem dedicated to Penshurst, the Sidneys' estate, Ben Jonson commends Barbara Sidney as "noble, fruitful, [and] chaste" and praises the education of her children: "Each morn and even they are taught to pray / With the whole household, and may every day / Read in their virtuous parents' noble parts / The mysteries of manners, arms, and arts."

Anthony Van Dyck, Charles I on Horseback with Seigneur de St. Antoine, 1633. De St. Antoine was the king's riding master. This portrait was widely admired in its time; one contemporary commented that, "if our eyes alone were to be believed they would boldly assert that the king himself is alive in the portrait."

least Catholicizing. When John Milton wrote that he had been prevented from entering the ministry because he was “church-outed by prelates,” he was referring to the Laudian Church and its increased emphasis on obedience to hierarchy: to Milton and many others, bishops had become worldly, powerful prelates. Laud himself had been a member of the King’s Privy Council since 1628, and many disapproved of this intermingling of religious and secular power.

In the summer of 1637, Charles I and Laud attempted to introduce a revised (Anglican) prayer book for use in Presbyterian Scotland. Many Scots, however, failed to see why an English desire for uniformity of worship meant that they were the ones who needed to change. The new liturgy consequently became a focus of discontent with decades of royal policy. Well-planned riots greeted readings of the new service, followed over the next two years by a chain of events often termed the Scottish Revolution. In 1638, Scots drafted the National Covenant, vowing to withstand innovations and maintain the Presbyterian cause. Charles raised an army to subdue the “Covenanters” by force, but a series of compromises and humiliations for the English culminated in the Scottish occupation of Newcastle in the summer of 1640. These “Bishops’ Wars” of 1639–40, named for the perception that they were the result of Laud’s Church policies, played a significant role in the buildup to the civil wars that followed.

Charles called Parliament back into session, but found himself compelled to make humiliating concessions: the Scots were not his only subjects with grievances. The King eventually agreed to hand over to Parliament the two men most closely identified with his political and religious policies: his chief advisor, Sir Thomas Wentworth, was tried and executed in 1641, and Archbishop William Laud was imprisoned in 1641 and executed four years later. A 1641 rebellion in Ireland, the third country Charles ruled, further weakened his position. The Irish who had been dispossessed in the wave of emigration begun under James rose against the Protestant usurpers, and killed considerable numbers (though not nearly as many as people in England believed at the time). When Charles asked Parliament for funds to invade Ireland, they feared he in fact planned to form an alliance with Irish Catholics, invade England, and re-establish absolute rule. Mobs of apprentices (who began to be referred to derogatively as “roundheads” in reference to their shorn heads) began to demonstrate for the overthrow of episcopacy. Debates in 1641 over the “Grand Remonstrance,” a Parliamentary manifesto, hardened divisions between those loyal to Parliament and those loyal to the King, now beginning to be called “cavaliers” (originally a term for an armed horseman, but by this time a word with implications of roistering, swaggering gallantry). An attempt by Charles to arrest five members of Parliament in January 1642 backfired, uniting members of both parliamentary Houses, Lords and Commons, against the King. In the turmoil that followed, Charles fled to the north of England, Parliament began to raise its own army. War officially broke out when Charles raised his standard at Nottingham in August 1642.

The causes of the civil wars of the 1640s continue to be one of the most heatedly debated subjects in British history. Some scholars have argued that the wars were primarily about religion, and that the 1640s were a “puritan” revolution; many contemporaries certainly saw religion as a central issue in the conflict. Others have seen the wars as the inevitable outgrowth of political tensions between king and parliament, or of long-term social or economic factors such as a declining aristocracy or a rising middle class. Other historians have pointed out that the conflict divided families (John Milton's younger brother, Christopher Milton, was a Royalist), a complication for broad social or economic theories. These historians have often focused on shorter-term explanations—the disastrous decisions made by Charles himself, or the sequence of events created by the inherent tensions of having one king ruling three quite different countries. Yet other scholars have seen some combination of ideological and circumstantial factors at work.

The idea that a civil war might break out in their lifetimes, resulting in the execution of the monarch by his own subjects, would probably have been dismissed as ridiculous by most people in England even just a few years earlier. Yet somehow it happened, and over the next decade about 100,000 people died as a result of the war, with many more wounded, in a country with a population of about 5 million. When Milton described the destruction and violence of even heavenly warfare in Paradise Lost, he expected that almost all his readers would have had their lives touched in some way by war.

The “first” civil war raged from 1642 to 1646, ended with the defeat of the Royalist armies and left Parliament, dominated by Presbyterians, in charge. They were supported by the victorious New Model Army, formed in 1645, commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax, and led in battle by a brilliant general named Oliver Cromwell. Many of the more radicalized members of the population resisted the rule of newly empowered Presbyterians, finding them to be as authoritarian as the Laudian bishops they had fought to overthrow. By 1647, the Army had managed to become the dominant power in the country. The Army, Parliament, and King, each distrusting the other two, attempted to negotiate a political and religious settlement. More radical voices began to join the conversation, expressing ideas created by the intellectual hothouse of the previous half-decade, a period in which the most fundamental political and social certainties seemed suddenly open to debate. Groups such as the Levellers argued for universal manhood suffrage, a written constitution, freedom of worship, and equality before the law; soon enough groups such as the Diggers were arguing that property is theft. When the Leveller Colonel Thomas Rainsborough argued that “every man that is to live under a government ought first by his own consent to put himself under that government,” he was articulating an idea that would have been almost unthinkable before 1640. The Levellers are widely regarded as founding voices in the development of modern democracy. But they were not allowed to speak for long: a Leveller mutiny in the Army was crushed by Cromwell, the captured king soon afterward escaped, and a “second” civil war (in effect, a series of Royalist uprisings) broke out in 1648, culminating with the recapture, trial, and execution of King Charles in January 1649 by a Parliament purged by the Army of all but its own supporters. In May 1649, England officially became a Commonwealth, though open hostilities only ended after Cromwell, now commander-in-chief, won bloody campaigns in Ireland (1649–50) and against Scottish Royalists (1650–51). (For more on this see the Contexts: Levellers, Diggers, Ranters, and Covenanters section on pages 1113–33.)

Oliver Cromwell was now the most powerful man in Britain and effectively ruler (though in theory the “Rump” Parliament held political control). But “the inglorious arts of peace” (as Andrew Marvell termed them) were not always his strength. Cromwell responded to widespread discontent with the Rump Parliament by forcibly dissolving it and replacing it with one nominated by religious congregations; this Parliament proving a failure, Cromwell gave himself the title of “Lord Protector” in late 1653 and over the next few years ruled increasingly by decree. Had he lived, Cromwell might have retained a strong grip on power for many years. While he can be described as a kind of benevolent despot, he was not a tyrant in the way that he governed England. (His treatment of the Irish is another matter.) He attempted to demilitarize the government, and he introduced a great degree of religious freedom, including the readmission of Jews to England. In 1657 he refused Parliament's offer to make him king, and he died in 1658. Oliver Cromwell continues to be an ambivalent figure in the British cultural imagination: he is both admired and condemned, and his character, his motives, and many of his actions remain surrounded by controversy.

Cromwell's regime could not survive without him: his son Richard assumed power on his father's death, and proved unable to hold the nation together. A period of chaos was finally ended with the restoration of the monarchy in 1660. Charles II was proclaimed king by a new Parliament called by General George Monck, a man who had fought for Charles I in the first civil war, but for Cromwell in Ireland, and who was commander-in-chief of the Cromwellian army in Scotland. But Monck returned to his Royalist beginnings, marched south from Scotland, and took control in London. On May 25th Charles landed at Dover, and four days later he received a tumultuous welcome in the capital. The restored monarchy, however, was a very different thing from that which had operated under Charles I. Never again would Parliament be trifled with: Britain was now a parliamentary monarchy. For a brief period following the death of Charles II in 1685 there was again a crisis of power and religion, as Charles had died with no heir and his brother, the Catholic James II, came to the throne. Anti-Catholic sentiment, however, made it impossible for James to rule long, and the bloodless "Glorious Revolution" of 1688 forced James into exile and restored Protestant rule in the person of the Dutch Protestant William of Orange and his wife Mary (daughter of James II).

LITERARY GENRES

The course of British literature over the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries is marked by the transformation of a number of literary genres, by the creation of others, and by massive changes in the relationships among authors, texts, and readers and audiences. This overview is intended to provide a broad outline of some of the more important changes, and some sense as well of the range of writing within the various genres.

LITERATURE IN PROSE AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF PRINT CULTURE

Arguably the development most important to the literature of this period occurred not in the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries but in the 1450s, with the invention of moveable type and of the printing press by the German craftsman and entrepreneur Johann Gutenberg. In 1476, William Caxton became the first to print books in England, and Caxton was instrumental in the publication of a number of important works of English literature (including Malory's Morte Darthur) using the new technology. But in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries a great deal of writing in England retained an "un-English" character. The most important prose work in this period, Sir Thomas More's Utopia (1516), was first printed not in England but in Flanders (where More had lived and worked for some time the previous year), and was written not in English but in Latin. In this respect at least, Utopia was representative: in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries the majority of books were published in Latin. Even in the late fifteenth century, however, publication in English was more common than is often supposed: of the 90 books printed by Caxton between 1477 and his death in 1491, 74 were in English. And by the second half of the sixteenth century, the movement away from Latin had become much stronger. The Latin edition of Utopia lost currency in England upon the publication of an English translation (by Ralph Robinson) in 1551. John Foxe published an early version of his Book of Martyrs in Latin in 1559; from 1563 onward editions were published only in English. The market for books in Latin diminished over the course of the seventeenth century, aided by the appearance of English translations of most of the important classical and continental texts. The lone category in which a majority of works continued to be written in Latin was that of scientific writing—ironically, as a result of their authors' belief that they would be more accessible to serious readers in centuries to come if they were written in Latin rather than in English.

More's Utopia resonates widely as an expression of the interests of its age. Its tone, at once playful and deeply serious, parallels that of the great work of the northern Renaissance in continental Europe, Erasmus's In Praise of Folly. More's focus on the fundamental nature of government follows on important work by writers of the Italian Renaissance (Niccolò Machiavelli most prominently), and foreshadows the considerable attention that would be paid to this issue in England in the later sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In addition, More's investigation of society on the level of first principles, and his imaginative curiosity about the possibilities offered by a wider world, are deeply characteristic of the Renaissance. Finally, and not least of all, Utopia anticipates the great growth in prose fiction that occurred later in the century.

Utopia gave its name to a new genre defined by subject matter: works presenting an imagined world in such a way as to prompt reflection upon the inadequacies and absurdities of the present world. In this period, works wholly or largely "utopian" in character include Francis Bacon's The New Atlantis and Margaret Cavendish's The Description of a New World, Called the Blazing World. In Bacon's work, European travelers discover Bensalem, an idealized community devoted to scientific pursuits and to enlarging "the bounds of Human Empire" over the natural world. In Cavendish's alternative fantasy, nature is presented in a more unstable fashion: the protagonist discovers a "Blazing World" of extraordinary light, in which the laws of space and time do not apply—a world that evidently cannot be contained by "human empire" or indeed within any system of human thought. In later eras the utopian (and "dystopian") tradition of imagined worlds extends through works such as Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels (1726), in which four separate worlds are imagined; to William Morris's late Victorian anti-capitalist utopia, News from Nowhere (1872); to twentieth-century works such as Aldous Huxley's Brave New World (1932) and George Orwell's 1984 (1949) that project the extension of some of the most disturbing social tendencies of their day into horrific imagined futures.

While utopian fiction is defined by its subject matter, the genre of prose fiction as a whole also came into its own in sixteenth-century British literature: a wide variety of prose fiction in English had appeared by the end of the century, aimed at the increasingly wide variety of audiences that the printing press had made possible. At one end of the spectrum are writers who consciously appealed to a popular audience—writers such as Thomas Deloney, whose commoner protagonists and dedication to "all famous cloth workers in England" have already been touched on. Another writer who appealed to a broad public in some of his work was

Thomas Nash, whose The Unfortunate Traveler is a work of prose fiction that has proven almost impossible to classify. At once an exuberant satire of the literary and court conventions of the time, it has been variously termed a tragicomedy, a picaresque novel, a pioneering work of travel literature, and a celebration of violence. It is also a work alive with the possibilities and tensions of the new print culture. The tensions between the old court culture and a nascent culture of broad-based literacy emerge in the book's wordplay as well as its storyline: pages are related to printing as well as to princes as Jack Wilton, a humble page, bequeaths to the "pages of the court" certain "pages of his misfortune."

If the popular fiction of Deloney and Nash stands at one end of the spectrum of late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century prose fiction, another is perhaps most clearly exemplified by John Lyly. Lyly had been a young man of fashion at university, and for a time his Euphues (1578) set a fashion too—a fashion that drew attention above all to highly refined and rhetorical prose style. Lyly sets the tone in his dedicatory epistle:

How so ever the case standeth, I look for no praise for my labor, but pardon for my goodwill; it is the greatest reward that I dare ask, and the least that they can offer. I desire no more, I deserve no less. Should the style nothing delight the dainty ear of the curious sifter, yet will the matter recreate the mind of the courteous reader.

The same style of ornamented sentences, with clauses precisely balanced in supporting or antithetical relationships, is carried through the narrative itself as it tells the story of "a young gentleman of great patrimony, and of so comely a personage, that it was doubted whether he were more bound to nature for the lineaments of his person, or through fortune for the increase of his possessions." This expansive style, which came to be called "Euphuism" after Lyly's title, was for a time very popular, especially among the women at court, where it was reported in 1632 that in the 1590s "the beauty in court who could not parley Euphuism was as little regarded as she which now there speaks not French." Within a few years the style had come to be widely parodied, including by Shakespeare, as for example when

Falstaff “elevates” his speech while pretending to be the King addressing Prince Hal in Henry IV, Part 1: “Harry, I do not only marvel where thou spendest thy time, but also how thy art accompanied, for though the chamomile, the more it is trodden on the faster it grows, yet youth, the more it is wasted, the sooner it wears.”

What was satirized by Shakespeare (as well as by Nash, Ben Jonson, and others) was not the use of balance or antithesis per se, but rather their excessive and repetitive use, and the habit of using a great many words to say very little. Shakespeare, Nash, Jonson, and virtually every other late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century writer of any significance also employed a great number of rhetorical figures, but aimed more for variety, concision, and pointedness than for abundance of expression. John Donne may command our attention with his colloquial directness of language in lines such as “For God’s sake hold your tongue, and let me love,” but his poems are filled with parallel structures (“My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,” “With wealth your state, your mind with arts improve”) that embody the dichotomies and paradoxes of which he speaks. Ben Jonson may begin his play The Alchemist with a crude verbal slanging match in which one character says to another “I fart at thee,” but in speeches throughout the play he also draws substantially on the Renaissance traditions of rhetorical figures (“Your fortunes may make me a man, / As mine have preserved you a woman”).

Like so many other sixteenth-century developments, the growth of prose fiction drew substantially on texts from ancient Greece and Rome, and from Renaissance Italy and France. Compilations of short fiction such as William Painter’s The Palace of Pleasure (1566) and George Pettie’s A Petite Palace of Pettie His Pleasure (1576) began to make translations and adaptations of French and Italian tales of romance and adventure much more widely available, and by the end of the century the genre of prose romance was becoming well established in English. Writers of prose romances often borrowed freely from earlier materials, and their works were in turn borrowed from freely, by dramatists and poets as well as by other writers of prose fiction. Thus, for example, Robert Greene’s Pandosto (1588), which drew on an Italian source, provided the story material for Shakespeare’s comedy The Winter’s Tale, and

Thomas Lodge’s Rosalinda (1590), a prose fiction that drew on a Middle English romance called Gamely for its story material, provided Shakespeare with material for his comedy As You Like It. There was no shame attached to such borrowing: aesthetic value was located in the way in which one told or retold a tale and combined different elements of story material into a pleasing whole, not in whether one had thought up the stories oneself.

In the 1590s, Greene and Nash, together with George Peele and a few others, constituted a group known as the “university wits.” Like Christopher Marlowe and Edmund Spenser, they had attended university on scholarships or with the financial assistance of others, and the three lived something of a precarious existence after leaving Oxford or Cambridge; these were among the earliest English writers to try to earn their living entirely through their writing. Such a goal was still impossible to achieve directly through payments made by printers or publishers; it remained necessary to seek the support of wealthy patrons. That such support was often anything but reliable is evidenced from the dedications to their works. Greene’s 17 different books are dedicated to a total of 16 different patrons; Nash’s dedication for the first edition of The Unfortunate Traveler to Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, is dropped in subsequent editions; and so on.

A very different writer of prose fiction was Sir Philip Sidney. Sidney’s Arcadia (1590, 1593), an engaging and elegantly written pastoral prose romance, drew substantially on continental and classical models, and was instrumental in popularizing in England the genre of heroic Hellenistic prose romance—stories of romance and adventure set in imagined and “timeless” locales, featuring shepherds, damsels, and noblemen in disguise. The work remained immensely popular through the seventeenth century both in England (where it was issued in ten authorized printings) and abroad (where it was translated into French, German, and Dutch). Works inspired by Sidney’s Arcadia include Lady Mary Wroth’s The Countess of Montgomery’s Urania (1621), the first published work of fiction by an Englishwoman, which mixes pastoral narrative with pointed political commentary, and Anna Weems’s sequel, A Continuation of Sir Philip Sidney’s Arcadia (1651), less of a hybrid than Wroth's work, but like hers a romance narrative with some political overtones.

Sidney was a central figure not only in the development of prose romance: he was also a pioneer in the use of the sonnet sequence (though not the first to compose a sonnet sequence in English—that distinction goes to Anne Lock, whose A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner appeared in 1560). As the author of The Defense of Poesy (written 1583), Sidney produced the first extended work of literary theory and criticism in English. Sidney's approach embraced both structural analysis from an aesthetic point of view and moral commentary—though that is to put his design very much in modern terms. In general, neither Sidney nor his contemporaries saw a clear boundary between the moral and the aesthetic: what was considered aesthetically good was considered so in large part for its perceived efficacy in conveying moral principles. The occasion for Sidney's Defense was a rambling and vituperative attack on the stage by Stephen Gosson entitled The School of Abuse (1579), and Sidney's focus is very largely on the drama. In the following decades, his Defense was followed by a number of works focused on other genres, among them George Puttenham's The Arte of English Poesie (1589), noteworthy in particular for its discussion of rhetorical figures, and Thomas Campion's Observations in the Art of English Poesie (1602), a groundbreaking work relating the prosody of classical Greece and Rome to that of English poetry.

Arguably the most important prose writings of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries were religious non-fiction works; certainly these were far and away the most popular. Aside from the Bible itself (first made available in the complete English-language printed edition in 1535 by Miles Coverdale) and such masterpieces of liturgical prose as the Book of Common Prayer, the most popular book in England through most of the sixteenth century was the English translation of The Golden Legend, by the thirteenth-century Italian scholar Jacobus de Voragine, a collection of narratives of the lives of Christian saints organized so as to be read in conjunction with the feast associated with each saint over the course of the year. In the first hundred years after the appearance of the printing press, more than 150 different editions of The Golden Legend appeared across Europe in various languages. William Caxton translated The Golden Legend himself and published it in 1483: "in likewise as gold is most noble above all other metals," he declared in his foreword to the book, "in likewise is this legend Holden most noble above all other works."

In the wake of the Protestant Reformation, the most widely read book aside from the Bible seems to have been for many decades John Foxe's Acts and Monuments, first published in English in 1563. There are significant parallels between this work and The Golden Legend. Whereas the earlier work provided in convenient form the lives of saints of the Roman Catholic Church, many of whom attained cult-like status, Foxe's book performed the same function for Protestant religious figures, especially those martyred at the stake by Henry VIII or by Mary I. By the late sixteenth century these figures had also attained cult-like status, and Foxe's book was repeatedly issued in new editions, each time in an expanded form. In addition to these biographical texts, the genre of the sermon was, in the hands of a John Donne or a Lancelot Andrewes, the site of some of the finest prose of the Renaissance; even works of theology and religious controversy could enter what we now consider the "literary" realm when written by Anglican divines such as Richard Hooker or Jeremy Taylor, or by nonconforming radicals such as the pseudonymous satirist Martin Marprelate.

Throughout this period substantial increases in literacy were accompanied by increases in the number of households that possessed books. In 1560 roughly one in ten English households possessed at least one book; by 1640 this figure had risen to approximately 50 per cent of all households. Not surprisingly, such figures were higher in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries in Protestant nations. In the late sixteenth century there was a higher percentage of households in Germany that possessed books than in any other part of Europe, but by 1640 that distinction belonged to England. If the printing press was one engine for the expansion of literacy, the expansion of formal education was another, and with the considerable increase in the number of schools over the course of the period came a demand for textbooks. Of these there were few, but one above all appears to have been almost universally studied—a Latin grammar text by William Lily (grandfather of John Lyly of Euphues fame). Indeed, it is possible that more copies were printed of this book than of any other during this period save the Bible.

Throughout this period there was also a growing readership for works that celebrated national accomplishment. Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1587) drew on many sources to present a compilation of stories of early Britain, some based on fact, some purely legendary. Holinshed is best known nowadays as the source on which Shakespeare drew for his history plays; in these dramatized versions as well as more directly, the portrait Holinshed sketched of earlier eras exerted a wide influence. Similarly, William Camden's Britannia (1586), a "description of the most flourishing kingdoms, England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the islands adjoining," was immensely popular in its English translation, entitled simply Britain (1610). Like the "Britain" of many Englishmen, that of Camden was overwhelmingly southern English in character; Camden in fact had little to say about Wales, Scotland, or Ireland, and for the purposes of his county-by-county survey did not travel north of Hadrian's Wall. But such works helped to feed a growing sense among the English that England could be more or less equated with "the British Isles" or "Britain." Popular too was Richard Hakluyt's Principal Navigations, Voyages and Discoveries of the English Nation (1589), a unique compilation of more or less accurate accounts of true voyages of English explorers and merchants, combined with accounts based purely on myth and imagination. Nationality was the key criterion for inclusion: "I meddle in this work with the navigations only of our own nation," Hakluyt declares in his preface to the first edition. Ironically enough, "Hakluyt's Voyages," the work's popular title, retained a place in history not so much for the historical accounts it presented but rather for the inspiration it gave Englishmen to embark on the sorts of voyages Hakluyt had only imagined—and in the inspiration it gave Shakespeare for some of the stories in his plays. Furthermore, the kind of writing exemplified by Hakluyt's mariners and merchants, with their straightforward "plain" prose, sustained narratives, and detailed descriptions of the places and people they encountered, would (some scholars argue) eventually contribute as much to the development of the narrative style and strategy of the English novel as the classically inspired romances of Sidney and Lyly.

More's extraordinary vision of human government in Utopia was followed in the sixteenth century by a number of influential non-fiction works on the nature of government—works of political theory, we would call them today. A recurrent focus of such work was the relationship of a monarch and his or her subjects to God and to the body of law. Sir Thomas Elyot's The Book of the Governor (1531) saw a universe ordered by nature in hierarchical fashion:

... undoubtedly the best governance is by one king or prince. ... For who can deny that all thing in heaven and earth is governed by one God, by one perpetual order, by one Providence? One sun ruleth over the day, one moon over the night. And to descend down to the earth ... the bees ... hath among them one principal bee for their governor, who excelleth all other in greatness.

The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity by Richard Hooker (1593–1614), which aimed in large part to justify the position of the monarch in England as head of the established Church, also appealed to nature, distinguishing between universal natural law ("nature herself teacheth laws and statutes to live by") and "positive" law (the written body of human law that varies from one jurisdiction to another). Hooker saw the position of monarch as consistent with natural law, but he also thought it highly desirable that the monarch should abide by "positive" law, rather than regarding himself as above the law: "where the king doth guide the state, and the law the king, that commonwealth is like a harp or melodious instrument."

The most important writer of non-fiction prose of the age was Francis Bacon, the writer renowned today both for introducing the essay form into English, and for the contribution he made to the development of research based on experimentation and inductive reasoning—popularly termed the "scientific method." Bacon wrote in both Latin and English. Ironically, the works by Bacon that continue to be widely read are the works in English that he considered less significant: his essays; his short work on the classification of knowledge, The Advancement of Learning; and his unfinished scientific utopian fantasy, The New Atlantis.

As the religious controversies of the age again became more heated during the Jacobean period and later Interregnum (the period "between kings," 1649–60), so too did the volume of political and religious writing increase. The collapse of censorship laws in the early 1640s led to the appearance of a vast volume of pamphlet literature that represented all points of view; much of this writing was addressed to a popular audience and remains readable for its interest as rhetorical prose as well for its historical influence. Some of the most interesting of these texts are the work of political and religious radicals such as the Levellers, Diggers, Ranters, and later Quakers, in particular writers such as William Wally and Richard Overton. But the era also brought forth a number of more substantial works of prose non-fiction. On the Royalist side perhaps the most influential of these was Eikon Basilica ("The Image of the King") (1649), a self-justifying overview of key events of the war from the point of view of Charles I. Supposedly written by Charles himself, the treatise was almost certainly ghostwritten by the clergyman John Garden, and John Milton would call attention to his own anti-monarchical credentials by responding with Eikonoklastes (1649; his Greek title means "Image Breaker"). Of far greater influence over the course of succeeding centuries was Thomas Hobbes's Leviathan (1651), now recognized as a central document of political philosophy in the Western tradition. Hobbes wrote Leviathan while acting as secretary to a Royalist family, the Cavendishes, who were in exile in Paris during the Interregnum; unsurprisingly in the circumstances, his arguments provide support to the claims of a monarch wishing to exercise absolute sovereignty. But whereas monarchs such as Charles I (and sixteenth-century political theorists such as Elyot and Hooker) had claimed that such power stemmed directly from God, Hobbes saw it as the embodiment of a social contract, under the terms of which the people agree to submit themselves to the authority of a ruler in order to obtain the benefits of social order. By shifting the ground on which arguments for the unfettered authority of rulers were founded, Hobbes's great work in the end had the effect of undermining all claims to a right of absolute rule: if power was ultimately derived from the people, then why should not the people have an ongoing say in how that power was to be exercised, and by whom?

Many of the most important works of prose non-fiction by writers on the Royalist side were not overtly political documents—yet even non-political works were almost inevitably tinged with the controversies of the age. Thomas Browne's 1642–43 work Religion Medici

("The Religion of a Doctor") endeavored to present religion from a personal rather than a polemical point of view, adopting a tolerant and sympathetic attitude toward those of all religious backgrounds, while maintaining a strong attachment to the formal structures and rituals of the Church of England. Izaak Walton's most lasting work of prose non-fiction, The Complete Angler (1653), might seem on the face of it to be even further from political or religious advocacy than Religion Medici. But this treatise on the art of fishing carries with it a running subtext that celebrates the wise, peaceful, open-hearted, and contemplative values of Picador (Latin: the fisher), representing the values of the Church of England, in which each member of the clergy acts as a fisher of souls.

Perhaps the most remarkable of all writers of non-fiction prose in the mid-seventeenth century was Margaret Cavendish, Duchess of Newcastle (of the same family to whom Hobbes acted as secretary)—called "Mad Madge" by some dismissive contemporaries. Cavendish's works are as remarkable for their breadth as they are for originality and for their accomplished writing: her works include scientific and philosophical essays, utopian fantasy, poetry, numerous plays, a biography of her husband, William Cavendish, and A True Relation of My Birth, Breeding and Life (1656), one of the most original and important works of a genre still in its infancy during the seventeenth century—autobiography. For most of the Middle Ages the practice of writing autobiographically (with the exception of some writing in a confessional vein) seems to have virtually disappeared, as indeed did biographical writing, with the exception of the lives of saints or martyrs. It is an important indicator of the increased emphasis on the individual in the Renaissance that the writing of such works, as well as the practice of writing diaries, appears to have grown steadily through the seventeenth century. One important element that contributed to this new focus on interiority and the self was the Protestant insistence on documenting the internal, spiritual life. But as so often in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the new practices were also justified by an appeal to classical models. Cavendish expressed the hope that "my readers will not think me vain for writing my life, since there have been many that have done the like, as Caesar, Ovid, and many more, both men and women, and I know no reason I may not do it as well as they." The confidence as well as the individualism of the age finds no fuller expression than it does in the writings of Margaret Cavendish.

Detail from the frontispiece to Margaret Cavendish's Philosophical and Physical Opinions (1655). According to the poem accompanying the likeness of Cavendish, "studious she is and all alone ... Her library on which she looks, it is her head, her thoughts, her books ... Her own flames do her inspire."

Other members of the nobility on the Royalist side (notably Anne Fanshaw and Anne Halkett) followed Cavendish in writing autobiographically during the Interregnum. And such writing appears to have flourished to some extent too among the revolutionaries; perhaps the most notable examples on that side are the writings of Lucy Hutchinson, who, like Cavendish, balanced a memoir recounting the life of her husband with a separate account of her own life. Anna Trapnel, perhaps best known for her extraordinary religious prophecies, also left a remarkable autobiographical account “of her journey from London into Cornwall” during which she was arrested and interrogated on suspicion of witchcraft. Much non-fiction prose writing among those on the revolutionary side tended to address directly the religious and political issues of the time. James Harrington’s The Commonwealth of Oceana (1656), for example, employs the structure of a utopian vision to address the pressing contemporary issue of how a republic may be founded so as to ensure the perpetuation of government that is both representative and fair.

The leading light of revolutionary writing is unquestionably John Milton, whose non-fiction prose includes not only a wide range of essays and tracts in defense of Parliamentary and Puritan causes, but also groundbreaking treatises in defense of divorce and, perhaps, most importantly, Areopagitica (1644), an extended argument for toleration and freedom of expression. It is sometimes difficult for those living in the present-day liberal democracies of the Western world to appreciate fully the degree to which societies such as that of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Britain may operate without any reference to any presumed right of free speech—or, indeed, any reference to any human “rights” at all. Censorship of texts is almost symbiotic in Europe with the invention of the printing press. In England, Henry VIII required that all book publications be approved by the Privy Council, and Elizabeth I instituted a system under which books could not be published without the approval of either the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London. The punishments for those who defied the rules were occasionally extreme: John Stubbs, for example, who had the temerity in 1579 to publish a work warning the Queen against marrying the brother of the King of France, was punished by having one of his hands cut off. King James I banned the publication of pamphlets of news, and these early forms of the newspaper would not appear again until the 1640s. For much of the period a system of registration through the Stationers’ Company was in essence a comprehensive system of censorship. Admittedly, enforcement of the rules governing printing had always been erratic, and there are not very many examples of actual censorship of books in this period; it has even been argued that many of the laws governing printing were not imposed upon printers but were in fact requested by them as a means of protecting their economic monopoly. But it was the idea of pre-publication licensing of books that was the particular focus of Milton’s arguments in Areopagitica, and his arguments have been turned to again and again over the intervening centuries by those endeavoring to defend freedom of expression.

POETRY

A comparison with medieval poetry reveals the remarkable changes the Renaissance brought to poetic form in English verse. Late-medieval poets used many different verse forms, ranging from alliterative accentual patterns with anywhere from three to six beats in each line, to complex rhyming stanzaic patterns in lyric poems with a dance-like variety of accentual rhythms, to Chaucer’s ten-syllable lines, sometimes more loosely organized around stress rather than a strict number of syllables. But strictly accentual-syllabic verse was rare in the medieval English period, whereas from the Renaissance to the early twentieth century it was the dominant poetic form in English.

The late fifteenth- and early sixteenth-century poetry of John Skelton still has one foot in the medieval period, at least as far as meter is concerned. Lines such as the following are written in accentual verse—that is to say, each contains a set number of accented syllables (in this case three), but has no set number of total syllables, and no regular arrangement of stressed and unstressed syllables:

Then will he rout;
Then sweetly together we lie,
As two pigs in a sty.

Only a decade or so after Skelton was writing, other poets—most notably Sir Thomas Wyatt and his contemporary Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey—began to draw on classical and Italian forms of a quite different nature, forms that would dominate English poetry for the next four centuries. Wyatt and Surrey are most often given credit for introducing to English literature the sonnet form that Petrarch and others had established in Italy. Of broader importance was the tradition they established of writing in accentual-syllabic meters. Of these, iambic pentameter was the most frequent choice, whether in sonnets (such as Wyatt's "I find no peace, and all my war is done"), in unrhymed (or "blank") verse of the sort that Surrey was the first to write in English, or in other forms. Iambic tetrameter (i.e., having four "feet" or groups of stressed and unstressed syllables in every line, rather than five) was also common: for example, Surrey's "My friend, the things that do attain." Where Wyatt and Surrey led, others followed; the great outpouring of poetry in the 1580s and 1590s by Sidney, Spenser, Marlowe, Shakespeare, and the rest was entirely an outpouring of accentual-syllabic verse.

Accentual-syllabic meters were structured according to classical principles, with regular patternings of syllables forming poetic "feet," and a set number of feet in every line. But along the way the classical principles were transformed in one crucial respect. Unlike English, classical Greek and Latin are not characterized by large variations in the degree of stress placed on different syllables: there are no distinctions between accented (or stressed) syllables and unaccented (or unstressed) syllables. Distinctions between syllables for the purposes of their arrangement in poetic meter were in ancient times based on duration of sound—some syllables taking a shorter time to say, others a longer time—rather than on degrees of stress. In English, however, where the alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables is fundamental to the natural spoken rhythms of the language, the Greek framework and terminology came to be applied to alternations between stressed and unstressed (or "accented" and "unaccented") syllables rather than long or short syllables. Whereas the Greeks had used the term "iambic" to describe verse in which a syllable that took a short time to say was followed by a syllable that took a long time to say, English verse took an iamb to consist of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable. And so on for trochees (one long syllable followed by one short became one stressed syllable followed by one unstressed); dactyls (one long syllable followed by two short became one stressed syllable followed by two unstressed); anapests (two short followed by one long syllable became two unstressed followed by one stressed syllable); and spondees (two long syllables became two stressed syllables). Regular patterning of what the late sixteenth-century poet, musician, and poetic theorist Thomas Campion referred to as "the heaviness of the syllables" became the ruling principle of English poetic meter.

Borrowing from—and transforming—classical poetic models was a central feature of English poetry throughout the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. From Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender to Milton's "Lucida" and beyond, the pastoral poem, with its conventions of musical shepherds singing songs of love and of sorrow, was a poetic staple. Classical poetic models for satires, for wedding songs (as with Spenser's Epithalamion), for elegies, and for love poetry in lyric form were also widely imitated and adapted. And the two great long poems of the period—Spenser's The Faerie Queene, and Milton's Paradise Lost—so different in some respects, are alike in drawing substantially on classical models.

Just as romance narratives were an important sub-genre of late sixteenth-century prose, so too was verse romance important to the poetry of the late sixteenth century. The 1590s opened with the publication of the greatest of all verse romances in English, The Faerie Queene, which Spenser had begun in 1580. No other verse romance of the period attempted anything so ambitious, but a remarkable succession of shorter verse romances appeared over the course of a few years in the late 1580s and early 1590s: Marlowe's Hero and Leander (1598); Lodge's Scylla's Metamorphosis (1589); Daniel's The Complaint of Rosamond (1592); Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis (1593); and Drayton's Endymion and Phoebe (1595). These poems draw heavily on the mythological stories recounted by the Roman poet Ovid in his Metamorphoses, Heroides, and Amores, though in form and tone they all bear a decidedly Elizabethan stamp. They all bear the stamp of the court, as well: these were poems intended for the aristocracy and, indeed, for the monarch herself.

The Renaissance was an age of artifice ("artificial" was during this period used exclusively as a term of praise), and much of the poetry of the 1580s and 1590s is given to imagery that is extravagant in its inventiveness. Some of the extravagance is tongue-in-cheek, as is surely the case with Shakespeare's evident lampooning in his early comedy Love's Labor's Lost of the verbal excess of the character Holofernes, whose "gift" is "a foolish extravagant spirit, full of forms, figures, shapes, objects, ideas, apprehensions, motions, revolutions: these are begot in the ventricle of memory, nourished in the womb of pia mater, and delivered upon the mellowing of occasion." In his poetry of the later 1590s and of the early seventeenth century, Shakespeare tamed his earlier tendency toward extravagant cleverness, though he never abandoned artifice. Much the same may be said of Ben Jonson, who advocated "plain language" and told poets to take care of their style in writing: "Be not winding, or wanton with far-fetched descriptions," he advised.

Many of the most important poets of the early seventeenth century, however, aspired to new heights of inventiveness. Chief among these was John Donne. Donne's early verse in particular often plays in elaborate fashion with extraordinary comparisons. It also twists and turns syntactically, mirroring in its form the surprising paradoxes or contradictions conveyed in the sense of the lines. These sorts of images, drawing extreme comparisons, have come to be known as "conceits." In some cases a conceit may be extended over several lines, or indeed a full poem. So, for example, Donne compares a tear to the globe, and his mistress's body to his "America," his "new-found land." The seventeenth-century poets who have been most often associated with these poetic tendencies—Donne and Abraham Cowley chief among them, with the devotional poets George Herbert, Richard Crashaw, and Henry Vaughan rather more loosely associated—have since the time of Samuel Johnson in the eighteenth century been referred to as "the metaphysical poets." Johnson's unfavorable assessment of such poetry has been rejected by most critics and scholars for the past century or more; T.S. Eliot, in particular, famously praised the metaphysical poets for uniting feeling and intellect in their verse. Yet Johnson captured something of the truth in his description of metaphysical poets as endeavoring "to be singular in their thoughts," and of the ideas produced through the intellectual gymnastics of many metaphysical poems as "often new, but seldom natural." Eventually Donne turned away from extravagance, abandoning much of the sensual content as well as the extreme conceits of his early verse as he turned to religion and to religious poetry, and Herbert made his efforts to suppress his own skills in rhetorical ornamentation a subject of his poetry:

My thoughts began to burnish, sprout, and swell,
Curling with metaphors a plain intention,
Decking the sense, as if it were to sell.

Yet the audacity of the metaphysical poets has left a lasting mark on English literature: the ways of talking about religious faith and about love of God in the language of human physical love and vice versa; the ways of talking to God that Herbert developed; and the extremity of the conceits themselves have all found imitators as well as admirers in subsequent eras.

Lively debates have taken place over the past generation about whether or not the term "metaphysical poetry" in fact conveys something meaningful about a diverse body of work; it is often argued in particular that grouping Herbert with "the metaphysical" brings us no closer to what is unique and interesting about his poetry. So too has it been debated whether the term "cavalier poetry" as an umbrella term to identify a group of poets from later in the seventeenth century conveys much that is meaningful. Certainly there is a common tendency among poets such as Thomas Carew (pronounced "Carey"), Sir John Denham, Robert Herrick, Richard Lovelace, James Shirley, Sir John Suckling, and Edmund Waller toward smooth rhythms and mellifluous sounds. And they are inevitably associated with one another simply by having been on the Royalist side—though only some were given to infusing verse with a strong political or religious content. (The strongest poetic statement on a Royalist theme may well be Katherine Philips's "Upon the Double Murder of King Charles," in which she poses the following question: "He broke God's laws, and therefore he must die, / And what shall then become of thee and I?") The cavalier poets all tend to write frequently of the good life and of love—but there the similarities largely end. Interestingly, though, the love poetry of the cavalier poets—whether the highly charged eroticism of poets such as Carew and Suckling or the more chaste and chivalrous variety of Lovelace—is unequivocally heterosexual. The homoeroticism that infuses so much of the finest poetry of the 1590s, and that was a significant presence in the court of James I in the early seventeenth century, is nowhere evident in the verse of these later poets.

Few seventeenth-century poets, even the most courtly and cavalier, failed to produce at least some devotional poems. In literature as in life, the seventeenth century mixes devotional and secular responses to the world, inextricably intertwining the language of religion with the language of social life and politics. An increasingly important reference point in devotional poetry as the century wore on became the attitude one held toward prelapsarian existence—humankind before the Fall. Whereas Aemilia Lanier, writing in 1611, took the Fall as an occasion for weighing the relative merits of man and woman, Lovelace paints an idyllic version of love before the fall of Adam and Eve:

No serpent kiss poisoned the taste,
Each touch was naturally chaste,
And their mere sense a miracle.

Henry Vaughan, a Royalist who saw himself as a “son of George Herbert,” took a more gloomy view, and one that partook only of a male perspective. For Vaughan, writing in 1650, it is impossible to conceive of the prelapsarian state in a tone other than that of melancholy: “He sighed for Eden, and would often say, / ‘Ah! what bright days were those!’”

There are fewer Puritan or Parliamentary poets of note than there are Royalist ones, but among them are the two pre-eminent poets of the age: Andrew Marvell and John Milton. Milton, indeed, has often been regarded as towering above not only his contemporaries but also over all other English poets, with the sole exception of Shakespeare. Milton is the supremely paradoxical figure of English literature. He was a devout Christian who more or less abandoned institutionalized religion in favor of a “church of one”; he wrote what remains the great Christian epic poem in English, Paradise Lost—but gave Satan the leading role; he was a

Puritan who eschewed plain style for Latinate inversions and epic grandeur. Milton managed to convey perhaps more fully than any other writer in English both prelapsarian innocence in the “heav’n on earth” of Eden and the “guilty shame, dishonest shame” of humans after their Fall.

Like Milton, Marvell supported the “Good Old Cause” of Cromwell and political Republicanism. To the extent that we can be sure about Marvell’s thoughts on any subject, however, Marvell appears to have seen Cromwell more as the embodiment of a pure force of nature than as a representative of pure moral and religious values: his “An Oration Ode upon Cromwell’s Return from Ireland” is among the most subtly balanced pieces of English political verse of any era. Even more than Milton, however, Marvell was a poet of the garden—a garden in which a sense of the Fall was never far away, but yet one of surpassing beauty and innocence. To the contemplation of such scenes Marvell brought his own unique perspective; rather than focus on prelapsarian pleasure, Marvell imagined the supreme joys to be those of solitary contemplation of the beauties of nature:

Two Paradises ’twere in one
To live in Paradise alone.

THE DRAMA

The flowering of drama in England from the late 1580s to the 1620s is widely accepted as the greatest cultural achievement in the history of English literature. The list of important dramatists who flourished during this period includes not only Marlowe, Shakespeare, and Jonson but also Thomas Kyd, John Lyly, George Peele, John Webster, Cyril Tourneur, Francis Beaumont, John Fletcher, Thomas Middleton, John Ford, James Shirley, John Marston, Thomas Dekker, Thomas Heywood, and Philip Massinger. It is an outpouring the more remarkable for there being so few advance signs of its coming. In the middle years of the sixteenth century, the main forms of medieval drama were very much alive: audiences were still watching guild-sponsored biblical plays, allegorical dramas such as Everyman, and various kinds of (generally crude) secular comedy performed by traveling troupes of players or local inhabitants as part of feast-day celebrations. As the forces behind the Protestant Reformation gathered steam, however, a substantial body of opinion became convinced that neither the popular secular drama nor the often irreverent representations of religious material in the biblical plays were proper to be played at all: a key factor in the demise of the biblical plays is thought to have been hostility from those sympathetic to the Protestant Reformation.

As the biblical plays were dying out, the revival of classical literature ushered in by humanism helped give birth to new forms of English drama. The first phase in the introduction of these new models was the translation of classical plays, particularly Roman tragedies by Seneca and Roman comedies by Plautus and Terence. Of the two, it was Roman comedy that first had an impact in England, with English schools and colleges presenting comedies by Plautus or Terence to school audiences (or occasionally to aristocratic ones, by invitation). The earliest known adaptation into English of one of these comedies is Nicholas Udall's Ralph Roister Doister, probably written by Udall during the years when he was the headmaster of Eton, 1534 to 1541. Such performances typically involved scenery painted on canvas stretched out behind the acting area, the canvas often painted so as to represent a street in perspective according to what was believed to be "the manner of the ancients." The play itself is lively, but adds little to its Roman model; it lacks any of the depth that characterizes so much of the drama of the late 1580s to the 1620s.

Of classical models for tragedy the most highly esteemed were the tragedies of Seneca; these began to be performed in Latin on the Italian stage very early in the sixteenth century, and by 1551 are known to have been performed in England at Trinity College, Cambridge. Seneca's tragedies began to be translated into English by Jasper Haywood in the late 1550s, and within 20 years all of Seneca's plays had been translated into English. Ironically, these plays had almost certainly not been acted out fully on the Roman stage: they are filled with set-piece speeches, and are believed by classical scholars to have been recited by a single actor. The Elizabethans, however, took Seneca's plays as a model for lively action, borrowing not only their five-act structure but also their preponderance of long set-piece speeches. Such borrowings were at first very much an upper-class phenomenon: English Senecan plays such as Gorboduc, Jokester, Tancred, and Gismunda were performed in the houses of the nobility or at the Inns of Court on special occasions. To Sir Philip Sidney, endeavoring to apply as a matter of literary theory the rules of classical drama to the English stage, Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville's Gorboduc was particularly deserving of praise. Only the fact of its being "very defections in the circumstances"—in other words, of its not conforming closely enough to the classical ideal of the "unities," in which a play's action occurred in one setting and over a length of time not exceeding one day—prevented Gorboduc from being taken "as an exact model of all tragedies." To later ages, by contrast, it is almost unimaginable that Gorboduc could be a model for anything dramatic. Its long speeches seem static; extraordinary and violent actions are reported but never displayed before the audience; and the play is never structured so as to arouse audience expectations.

How did the most dynamic and open period of theater in the history of the English stage develop so quickly out of such a static and restrictive background? A key moment in this extraordinary development was the decision by a London business person, James Burbage, to build a playhouse northeast of London—outside the city limits, so as to be outside the regulatory authority of the city, but close enough to enable Londoners to attend performances. But in 1576, "The Theatre," as Burbage rather unimaginatively called the new playhouse, became a model for other theaters such as the Globe and the Swan, the latter two both constructed in Southwark, just across the Thames from London—again, outside the London city limits. Before this time such "professional" actors as there had been belonged to troupes that traveled from town to town, typically performing old plays again and again in different venues. The establishment of permanent theaters in the London area reflected the demographic shifts of the time—not only the rapid growth of population, but also its increasing concentration in and around London. But the presence of these playing spaces had a number of important effects. Perhaps most obviously, they suddenly created a steady and ongoing demand for new plays: if Londoners were to be enticed to the new playhouses, the theater companies could not simply keep playing nothing but old standards. And London audiences were the most literate and the most diverse of any in Britain; though the monarch never deigned to attend performances in such venues, audiences certainly included all other elements of the population. Apprentices and others of scant means would pay a penny to stand on the ground in front of and on both sides of the stage (the members of the audience Hamlet calls "groundlings"). Levels of seating, protected from the elements, rose around on all sides; a covered seat for a performance typically cost two pence. Or a performance could be observed from the privacy of a "lord's room" for sixpence. (In Renaissance London, as in London or New York today, the most expensive seats in the theater were sold for the equivalent of a day's wage for a common laborer.)

A theater soon grew up that differed substantially from both the performances of the traveling troupes and the academic theater that had been imitating Roman models. For this "theater in the round," little or no attempt was made to provide realistic sets or backdrops: most props were handheld. There was a good deal of rapid movement and rapid dialogue, and long set speeches became a rarity. Comic characters and comic scenes were introduced into tragedies (a practice strictly forbidden according to Sidney or the classical theorists). And plays began more and more to depict all strata of society, and to depict women as well as men in leading roles. (Throughout this period, it was considered unseemly for women to appear on the public stage, though they did perform in court masques. In public theaters in England, female roles were played by adolescent boy actors, a practice that provided for multiple opportunities for complex layering in storylines such as those of Shakespeare's Twelfth Night and The Merchant of Venice involving females pretending to be males.)

Playwrights, for their part, were paid a flat fee for their work, typically six pounds per play. Popular plays were performed again and again over many years, but the playwright would receive no additional income from these performances; the incentive for playwrights was thus to produce new work. And produce they did: the 37 plays that Shakespeare is known to have written over the course of approximately 25 years may seem extraordinary by modern standards, but it pales by comparison with the productivity of Thomas Heywood, now best known as the author of the domestic tragedy A Woman Killed with Kindness (1603) and of a defense of the theater, An Apology for Actors (1612). In an address to the reader prefacing The English Traveler (1633), Heywood refers to the "two hundred and twenty plays in which I have had either an entire hand or at least the main finger" (of these, only about 20 survive). In the press to complete more work, collaboration of the sort that Heywood alludes to was frequent. Shakespeare collaborated with other playwrights on at least two projects; Ben Jonson collaborated with Thomas Dekker; Dekker collaborated with Thomas Middleton; Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher usually wrote in collaboration with each other; Philip Massinger collaborated with Dekker and with Nathaniel Field; and so on. In its modes of composition as much as in other respects, then, the Elizabethan drama was fluid and dynamic.

It should not be supposed that classical models were altogether abandoned in this flurry of creative activity; far from it. Comedies of the late 1580s and early 1590s (such as Shakespeare's The Comedy of Errors) were in many ways closely modeled on the comedies of Plautus, and tragedies from the same period (such as Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy, Marlowe's Tamburlaine, and Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus) borrowed extensively from Senecan tragedy. But Shakespeare and other comic dramatists quickly left behind the more formulaic aspects of Plautine comedy. They changed the shape of Senecan tragedy, too; a certain amount of static speechifying was still featured, but now the violence that in Seneca was typically reported as having occurred offstage began to be performed before the eyes of the audience. Audiences remained rapt: The Spanish Tragedy, Tamburlaine, and Titus Andronicus were all enormously popular.

For ten years or more following the establishment of the first permanent theater outside London, most of the plays produced seem to have been fairly crude in their construction. (Since few plays from this period have survived, generalizations must be advanced with caution.) Certainly plays such as those by George Peele from the 1580s and early 1590s, the anonymous

Mucedorus (c. 1590)—and for that matter Tamburlaine and Titus Andronicus—are loosely constructed on episodic principles, with nothing to facilitate any sense of awareness in the audience of a concatenation of events unfolding. But by the early 1590s, Marlowe and Shakespeare in particular had refined the craft of playwriting so as to create through their plotting an ongoing sense of the future action as well as of the present. When a character such as Richard III (in the opening scene of Shakespeare's Richard III) expresses his intentions to the audience ("Plots I have laid, inductions dangerous ..."), the speech itself is not dissimilar to the set-piece speeches in Gorboduc. But here the intentions of Richard III are woven into the plot so as to become a driving force behind the play—a play that was performed more frequently than any other on the Elizabethan and Jacobean stage.

The theaters "in the round" outside the city limits were not the only venues for drama in London during this period. Notably, the old monastery at Blackfriars in London had begun as early as the 1550s to be used as a venue for the production of plays, and by the early seventeenth century it was a leading London theater. As a former monastic area it enjoyed, through a legal loophole, the same immunity from regulation and taxation by the city of London that the theaters outside the city limits enjoyed. The Blackfriars stage, though, was indoors, not outdoors like the public theaters; the stage itself was not surrounded by members of the audience on three sides as were the stages in the other theaters; and the audiences themselves were less diverse: there were no groundlings in the audience at private theaters such as Blackfriars and the Royal Court.

Even when outside the jurisdiction of the city, dramatic performances in the Elizabethan and Jacobean age entailed considerable risk. When in 1605 James I was apprised of the satirical treatment accorded the Scottish court in a play by Ben Jonson, John Marston, and George Chapman (Eastward Ho!), he disbanded the company that had mounted the production—even though his wife, Queen Anne, was its patron. Because of the potentially transgressive content of many Elizabethan and Jacobean plays, few were given a local and contemporary setting; even if one wished to convey pointed messages about contemporary politics, it was safer to do so elliptically, by setting the action of a play in Italy and in a vaguely defined past rather than in London in the present.

The range of the drama in the early years of the seventeenth century is, if anything, even broader than that of the 1590s. This is the era of Shakespeare's great tragedies and of his dark comedies as well as his late romances; of many of Ben Jonson's finest comedies; of a group of violent "revenge tragedies" by Webster and Tourneur; and of a group of "city comedies" concerning London society by Dekker, Middleton, and others. Overall, the tone of the Jacobean drama is darker than that of the Elizabethan stage—the satire more biting, the tragedy more bleak. This is also the era of the masque, a form of court drama that stands in marked contrast to that of "theater in the round." Masques were as much spectacle as drama. They were astonishingly expensive productions performed for the aristocracy by a mixture of professionals and members of the court itself; they typically drew on pastoral or mythological themes; they often involved interaction between performers and spectators; they usually featured elaborate costumes, painted scenery, special effects, and set-piece displays; and they always included a good deal of song, music, and dance.

As the seventeenth century wore on, the theater came more and more frequently under attack by Puritans. Since the late 1580s dramatists had walked a fine line, desiring always to give to those elements of the crowd that were entertained by displays of bawdiness and violence a good deal of what they were looking for, while still insisting that such displays fulfilled a didactic purpose. The description of the action of the domestic tragedy Arden of Faversham (c. 1585–90) gives something of the flavor:

The lamentable and true tragedy of M. Arden of Faversham of Kent. Who was most wickedly murdered by the means of his disloyal and wanton wife. ... Where-in is showed the great malice and dissimulation of a wicked woman, the unsatiable desire of filthy lust and the shameful end of all murderers.

Wickedness, in other words, is shown to be punished, but along the way a good deal of titillation for the audience is provided. The theaters managed to resist the criticisms from the Puritans for more than five decades. But when Charles I was forced from London and the Puritans took control at the onset of the civil war in 1642, the theaters were closed by city officials—at the time, probably for political as much as moral reasons (the first thing all authorities traditionally do in a time of revolution is close the sites where large groups of people can meet together). They remained closed for almost two decades, until the Restoration in 1660. The most remarkable era in the history of the English stage was at an end.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE IN THE SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES

If the rediscovery of Greek and Latin literature was a central element of the Renaissance in England, the increased currency of the Greek and Latin languages—and of Latin especially—was central to the changes that occurred in the English language in this period. Of the thousands of new English words imported from Greek and Latin, many were words that named new concepts or things for which no English equivalent existed (from area and equilibrium to vacuum). Such words enlarged the expressive capacity of the English language in several directions, increasing the stock of scientific, mathematical, rhetorical, and philosophical terms, and more broadly increasing the capacity of the language to express abstract concepts. (The word “abstraction” itself is first recorded as having been used in 1547.) Many Latin words remained intact as they entered the English language, including antenna, apparatus, cerebellum, militia, and tedium. Others became reshaped, often losing their original suffixes, as with, for example, the Latin words complexus and desperatus. On the other hand, Latin prefixes (among the most common of which are ob-, from; post-, after; pre-, before; and sub-, under) tended more often than not to be retained without alteration. In some cases words with Latin roots that had originally entered the English language in an altered form from the French now had a form closer to the Latin original “restored” in English.

There were also extensive borrowings during this period from the French (e.g., bayonet, muscle), from the Italian (e.g., argosy, squadron), from the Spanish (e.g., cargo, sherry), and from the Dutch (e.g., deck, dock, and yacht). In these borrowings one can see something of the pattern of interaction between Britons and these other nationalities, with borrowings from the Spanish often concerned with warfare, and from the Dutch often concerned with commerce, the sea, and painting (e.g., easel, sketch, and landscape).

Among the educated classes there were always those who resisted or mocked aspects of this “invasion” of foreign words. Thomas Wilson, for example, lamented in his Art of Rhetoric (1553) the use of “inkhorn terms” that were regarded as signs of scholarly affectation. Ralph Lever, responding to the wholesale importation of Latin terms, suggested in 1573 that the existing resources of native English could be adapted in ways that would be preferable to the Latin terms—that endsay, for example, should be preferred to conclusion, saywhat should be preferred to definition, and so on. And Ben Jonson in his play Poetaster mocked the excessive use of real or presumptive foreign imports such as defunct, fatuate, furibund, inflate, prorumped (“What a noise it made!” comments one character at the mention of this word), strenuous, turgidious, and ventositous. “O terrible windy words,” laments one character. “A sign of a windy brain,” agrees another. We may safely infer that such satire (like that by Shakespeare in Love’s Labour’s Lost) had a recognizable referent in real life—that some did indeed use the new coinages in an affected or pompous fashion. But some of the resistance appears to have represented no more than the prejudice that seems inevitable in any age against linguistic change. Just as William Strunk and E.B. White fulminated in the 1950s against the new word finalize, unable to recognize how it might fulfill a useful linguistic function, so Jonson and the others made fun of words such as defunct and strenuous that have ended up taking a permanent (and permanently useful) place in the English language.

The fact that more new words appear in the works of Shakespeare than in those of any other writer from this period has prompted the unjustified assumption that Shakespeare “introduced” more new words to the English language than anyone else. That claim may well be true, but we can of course speak with certainty only of first written occurrences of words and phrases; it is in almost every case entirely possible that a word or phrase had been in common currency for some time before it appears in a piece of writing that has survived. At the very least, however, we may confidently say that Shakespeare was extraordinarily receptive to new coinages, and that his works played a role in helping to shape the changing language during this period. It is noteworthy that among the many words that first appear in English in Shakespeare there are not only a great many borrowings from Latin (e.g., abstemious, arose, assignation) but also a number of words formed by inventive re-combinations of English words, or through part of speech conversions (e.g., gloomy, leapfrog, lonely). In his place in the history of the language as in other respects, Shakespeare stands pre-eminent.

It is worth noting here that many phrases or expressions that we now think of as proverbial also originated in Shakespeare’s works. The phrase “vanish into thin air,” for example, is used on a daily basis, so much so that it is difficult to recapture a fresh sense of the aptness of the image. Other expressions that make their first appearance in Shakespeare include come full circle, eaten out of house and home, has seen better days, the live-long day, and there’s method in his madness.

Though the printing press had been introduced in 1476, the regularization of spelling that one might have expected to follow as a natural consequence of the spread of printing began to happen only very slowly over the course of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Certainly through to the early seventeenth century it remained common for writers to spell the same word in different ways in the same document, and even for individuals to spell their name in different ways at different times. Pronunciation also began to move toward a common standard as London became more and more dominant in English life, but these changes too, occurred slowly; there remained several distinct dialects of English in the mid-seventeenth century. The great vowel shift was virtually complete by the early sixteenth century, as was the change in habits of pronunciation of the final e in many English words; by the end of the fifteenth century that practice had almost entirely died out.

The Renaissance brought several changes in English grammar and syntax. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the -eth third person singular verb ending (e.g., followeth, thinketh) began to die out, though some common contractions of these forms (e.g., hath for haveth, doth for doeth) persisted into the late seventeenth century. There were changes, too, in the formation of pronouns. In the third person plural, the forms they / them / their replaced the old they / hem / hire that we find in Chaucerian English. And the second person you replaced the old ye during this period. With second person pronouns, however, the situation is complicated by changes in usage involving the second person pronoun thou (and its object form thee). These forms were used when one was addressing another in a more familiar or less respectful fashion, whether because of the circumstances or because of the relative social standing of the individuals in conversation. (A child or an animal would also typically be addressed as thou.) In less familiar and more respectful contexts you would be used. (The distinction here resembles that still existing in languages such as French, in which one may choose when addressing an individual between the more familiar tu and the more formal vous, which also serves as the second person plural form.) The use of the familiar thou and thee began to die out early in the sixteenth century, and by the seventeenth century you was used almost universally as the second person pronoun in all circumstances.

Finally, there were significant changes during the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries in the formation of negatives and interrogatives, and in the use of do as an auxiliary verb. Instead of saying we went not or asking know you her? it became common to say we did not go and to ask do you know her? The use of do as an auxiliary spread quickly, and indeed for much of the early modern period came to be used in ways that have since died out; in the sixteenth century the forms I think and I do think were used interchangeably where now (unless we wish to add emphasis) we would use only the former.

1494? – 1536

The English phrases that we now think of when we hear the term “Biblical language” are very largely the product of the work of one individual: William Tyndale. Tyndale met constant opposition from church and government officials throughout the course of his adult life. The work of translating the scriptures into the vernacular—English—was so dangerous that he went into hiding in continental Europe while trying to complete it. He was finally executed for his work, but within a few years of his death, his Bible was becoming widely read throughout England.

Tyndale was born in the mid-1490s, most likely in Stinchcombe, Gloucestershire, near the Welsh border. Not much is known about his early life and parentage. We do know that he attended Magdalen Hall, Oxford, was awarded a B.A. in 1512 and was incepted as M.A. in 1515, and was ordained a priest in London that same year. While at Oxford he was greatly influenced by the work of the Dutch philosopher Desiderius Erasmus—particularly by the venerable scholar’s study of the Septuagint, the original Greek version of the books that Christians now refer to as the New Testament.

After graduation Tyndale returned to Gloucestershire, serving as household chaplain to Sir John and Lady Anne Walsh and as tutor to their children. During this period he began studying Erasmus’s Greek New Testament and considered attempting his own English translation, which he hoped would enable local lay people to read the Scriptures for themselves. His translation of Erasmus’s Enchiridion militis Christiani (Manual of the Christian Knight), which encourages the study the New Testament, helped gain the Walshs’ support of his position. At this time Tyndale was also in demand as a preacher, but his sermons offended the local clergy, and he was brought before the Bishop’s Chancellor on charges of heresy.

Tyndale left the area in 1523 and headed for London, hoping to find support for his translation work. He approached Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall, Erasmus’s friend and Bishop of London, hoping he would serve as patron for the project. The Bishop not only refused his request, but became a vocal opponent of any plan to translate the Bible into the vernacular. Tyndale was forced to leave London in May 1524. With the sponsorship of Sir Humphrey Monmouth, a London merchant, he went to Germany, which at the time was more open to the ideas of the Protestant Reformation. He never returned to England.

The details of Tyndale’s life in Germany are sketchy. His status as intellectual outlaw meant that he moved around considerably. He stayed in Hamburg for a while and then went to Wittenberg, where it is likely that he met with the famous Reformation leader Martin Luther. Eventually he settled in Cologne, where he set about having his translation of the New Testament published. Before it was finished, however, city magistrates caught wind of the project and ordered the printing house raided. Tyndale was able to escape with a portion of his printed New Testament, and this “Cologne Fragment” (which included most of the first Gospel, that of Matthew) circulated throughout England, accompanied by a prologue and marginal notes by Luther. Tyndale fled to Worms, a German town that had demonstrated more openness to the Reformation, where he was able to have the complete New Testament printed in 1526. The pocket-sized books (without Luther's preface or notes) were smuggled by boat into England and Scotland, where they circulated quickly. In January 1530, Tyndale completed a translation of the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Hebrew scriptures. Although he never managed to translate all of what Christians refer to as the Old Testament, his translation of the Pentateuch also became very widely read in England. Tyndale was the first to create an English language translation from Hebrew and Greek, the original languages in which the scriptures were written. Earlier English translations existed (created by Bede, John Wycliffe, and others), but they used the Vulgate, the church's official Latin translation, as their base text. But it is not only for removing this Latin "filter" that Tyndale is remembered. His elegant and powerful phrases were instrumental in establishing the Bible in English as both a literary and a religious text. And because his translation appeared at a time when it could be distributed widely through the use of the recently invented printing press, he had considerable influence in shaping the patterns of English speech. Tyndale introduced into the language phrases such as "the signs of the times," "fight the good fight," "the powers that be," and "a law unto themselves," which remain common currency today.

After his translations were in print, Tyndale turned to writing theological treatises and commentaries on the Bible. While his translations had angered the clergy, his treatises infuriated the government of England. In The Practice of the Prelates (1530) Tyndale harshly criticized King Henry VIII for divorcing his wife. The king responded by ordering Tyndale captured and returned to England. In 1534 Tyndale moved to Antwerp, then part of the Netherlands, thinking that there a new measure of openness to the Reformation would give him a greater measure of security. In 1535, however, he was betrayed by Henry Phillips, an English spy working in the Netherlands. He was arrested and held for 18 months in Vilvorde Castle prison near Brussels, where he was convicted of heresy. On 6 October 1536 he was scheduled to be burned at the stake, but as a mark of his distinction as a scholar, he was strangled to death and then his body was burnt.

Ironically, within a year of his death the English government approved Tyndale's translation. His Old Testament was completed by Miles Coverdale and was published with his New Testament in 1539; to avoid embarrassment, however, the English government did not allow Tyndale's name to appear. With Mary's accession to the throne in 1553, there was an abrupt change in policy, and Bibles in English were again banned. In the face of this censorship, a group of exiles in Geneva prepared a more scholarly translation, accompanied by substantial (and often tendentious) marginal notes. That version, known as the Geneva Bible, became widely available in England once Elizabeth I had replaced Mary as monarch. In response, Catholics in the Elizabethan era (many of them now in exile, as many Protestants had been under Mary) prepared a translation of their own, the Douay-Rheims version, also accompanied by interpretive notes. As the excerpts below demonstrate, other versions drew heavily on Tyndale's pioneering work of translation.

In 1611, a new authorized version of the Bible (now known as the King James Version) was released in England. The story of the creation of the authorized version is a complex and interesting one. It was a vast collaborative venture of considerable significance in English religious history. The result, however, was a text very much based on Tyndale's. For the books that Tyndale had translated, more than eighty percent of the text of the authorized version was taken word for word from his translation. Indeed, as the excerpts below illustrate, the phrasing (and the rhythm) of the King James version is typically closer to that of Tyndale than it is to any of the "intermediate" versions.

GENESIS: CHAPTER I

In the beginning God created heaven and earth. The earth was void and empty, and darkness was upon the deep, and the spirit of God moved upon the water.

Then God said: let there be light and there was light. And God saw the light that it was good: and divided the light from the darkness, and called the light day, and the darkness night: and so of the evening and morning was made the first day.

And God said: let there be a firmament between the waters, and let it divide the waters asunder. Then God made the firmament and parted the waters which were under the firmament, from the waters that were above the firmament: And it was so. And God called the firmament heaven. And so of the evening and morning was made the second day.

And God said, let the waters that are under heaven gather themselves unto one place, that the dry land may appear: And it came so to pass. And God called the dry land the earth and the gathering together of waters called he the sea. And God saw that it was good.

And God said: let the earth bring forth herb and grass that sow seed, and fruitful trees that bear fruit every one in his kind, having their seed in themselves upon the earth. And it came so to pass: and the earth brought forth herb and grass sowing seed every one in his kind and trees bearing fruit and having their seed in themselves every one in his kind. And God saw that it was good: and then of the evening and morning was made the third day.

GENESIS: CHAPTER I

In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

And God said, Let there be light: and there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.

And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament Heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day.

And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas: and God saw that it was good.

And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth: and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind: and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day.

GENESIS: CHAPTER I

In the beginning God created heaven, and earth. And the earth was void and empty, and darkness was upon the face of the deep; and the spirit of God moved over the waters.

And God said: Be light made. And light was made. And God saw the light that it was good; and He divided the light from the darkness. And He called the light Day, and the darkness Night; and there was evening and morning one day.

And God said: Let there be a firmament made amidst the waters: and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made a firmament, and divided the waters that were under the firmament, from those that were above the firmament, and it was so. And God called the firmament, Heaven; and the evening and morning were the second day.

God also said: Let the waters that are under the heaven, be gathered together into one place: and let the dry land appear. And it was so done. And God called the dry land, Earth; and the gathering together of the waters, He called Seas. And God saw that it was good.

And He said: let the earth bring forth the green herb, and such as may seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after its kind, which may have seed in itself upon the earth. And it was so done.

And the earth brought forth the green herb, and such as yieldeth seed according to its kind, and the tree that beareth fruit, having seed each one according to its kind. And God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day.

Tyndale's English Bible

Then said God: let there be lights in the firmament of heaven to divide the day from the night, that they may be unto signs, seasons, days and years. And let them be lights in the firmament of heaven, to shine upon the earth. And so it was. And God made two great lights: A greater light to rule the day, and a less light to rule the night, and he made stars also. And God put them in the firmament of heaven to shine upon the earth, and to rule the day and the night, and to divide the light from darkness. And God saw that it was good: and so of the evening and morning was made the fourth day.

And God said, let the water bring forth creatures that move and have life, and fowls for to fly over the earth under the firmament of heaven. And God created great whales and all manner of creatures that live and move, which the waters brought forth in their kinds, and all manner of feathered fowls in their kinds. And God saw that it was good: and God blessed them saying: Grow and multiply and fill the waters of the seas, and let the fowls multiply upon the earth. And so of the evening and morning was made the fifth day.

And God said: let the earth bring forth living creatures in their kinds: cattle and worms and beasts of the earth in their kinds, and so it came to pass. And God made the beasts of the earth in their kinds and cattle in their kinds, and all manner worms of the earth in their kinds: and God saw that it was good.

And God said: let us make man in our similitude and after our likeness: that he may have rule over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over cattle, and over all the earth, and over all worms that creep on the earth. And God created man after His likeness, after the likeness of God created He Him: male and female created He them.

King James Bible

And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so. And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: He made the stars also. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth, and to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness: and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.

And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven. And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind: and God saw that it was good. And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth. And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind: and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good.

And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in His own image, in the image of God created He him; male and female created He them.

Geneva Bible

And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, to separate the day from the night, and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so. Afterward God said, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing that hath life: and let the fowl fly upon the earth in the open firmament of the heaven. Then God created the great whales, and every thing living and moving, which the waters brought forth in abundance, according to their kind, and every feathered fowl according to his kind: and God saw that it was good. Then God blessed them, saying, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let the fowl multiply in the earth. So the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

Moreover God said, Let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, cattle, and that which creepeth, and the beast of the earth, according to his kind: and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth according to his kind, and the cattle according to his kind, and every creeping thing of the earth according to his kind: and God saw that it was good.

Furthermore God said, Let us make man in our image according to our likeness, and let them rule over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the heaven, and over the beasts, and over all the earth, and over every thing that creepeth and moveth on the earth. Thus God created the man in his image: in the image of God created He him: He created them male and female.

And God blessed them, and God said unto them: Grow and multiply and fill the earth and subdue it, and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over all the beasts that move on the earth.

And God said: see, I have given you all herbs that sow seed which are on all the earth, and all manner trees that have fruit in them and sow seed: to be meat for you and for all beasts of the earth, and unto all fowls of the air, and unto all that creepeth on the earth wherein is life, that they may have all manner herbs and grass for to eat, and even so it was. And God beheld all that he had made, and lo they were exceeding good: and so of the evening and morning was made the sixth day.

MATTHEW: CHAPTER 5

When He saw the people He went up into a mountain, and when He was set, His disciples came to him, and He opened His mouth, and taught them saying: Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which hunger and thirst for righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men revile you, and persecute you, and shall falsely say all manner of evil sayings against you for my sake. Rejoice, and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven. For so persecuted they the Prophets which were before your days.

And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so. And God saw every thing that He had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day.

Tyndale's English Bible

Ye are the salt of the earth: but and if the salt have lost her saltiness, what can be salted therewith? It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men. Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill, cannot be hid, neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it lighteth all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.

Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the Prophets: no I am not come to destroy them, but to fulfil them. For truly I say unto you, till heaven and earth perish, one jot or one tittle¹ of the law shall not escape, till all be fulfilled.

Whosoever breaketh one of these least commandments, and teacheth men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven. But whosoever observeth and teacheth, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.

For I say unto you, except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees,² ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven.

Ye have heard how it was said unto them of the old time: Thou shalt not kill. For whosoever killeth, shall be in danger of judgment. ¹ one jot or one tittle Not a whit; from "jot": the smallest particle or least letter of an alphabet, and "tittle": tiny mark or dot used for punctuation, e.g., the dot on the letter i.

² Scribes Ancient interpreters of religious law; Pharisees Members of an ancient orthodox Jewish sect.

³ Racha Admonishment (sometimes spelled "Raca"), possibly meaning "fool" or "weakling."

He therefore that shall break one of these least commandments, and shall so teach men, shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven. But he that shall do and teach, he shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.

For I tell you, that unless your justice abound more than that of the scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.

You have heard that it was said to them of old: Thou shalt not kill. And whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment. But I say to you, that whosoever is angry with his brother, shall be in danger of the judgment. And whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council. And whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

Tyndale's English Bible

Therefore when thou offerest thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee: leave there thine offering before the altar, and go thy way first and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.

Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way with him, lest that adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the minister, and then thou be cast into prison. I say unto thee verily: thou shalt not come out thence till thou have paid the utmost farthing.¹

Ye have heard how it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery. But I say unto you, that whosoever looketh on a wife, lusting after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. ...

Ye have heard how it is said, an eye for an eye: a tooth for a tooth. But I say to you, that ye resist not wrong. But whosoever give thee a blow on thy right cheek, turn to him the other. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever will compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.² Give to him that asketh, and from him that would borrow turn not away.

Ye have heard how it is said: thou shalt love thine neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, love your enemies. Bless them that curse you. Do good to them that hate you. Pray for them which do you wrong and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your father that is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to arise on the evil, and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and unjust. For if ye love them, which love you: what reward shall ye have? Do not the Publicans³ even so? And if ye be friendly to your brethren only: what singular thing do ye? Do not the Publicans likewise? Ye shall therefore be perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven, is perfect.

SIR THOMAS WYATT

c. 1503 – 1542

During Thomas Wyatt's brief, 39-year lifespan, English men and women served two kings; three lord chancellors were executed; England waged war in four other lands (Scotland, Wales, Ireland, and France); and Henry VIII married five of his six wives, most of whom met sorry ends. Wyatt lived his entire adult life in service to the court, amidst the political intrigue and turmoil that accompanied the reign of King Henry VIII, and was twice imprisoned in the Tower of London. A few of his poems portray an idyllic life in the countryside away from the machinations of the king and his courtiers, yet they can carry a subtext about the ambient political disorder or the court's political dramas. One of his most famous poems, "Whoso list to hunt," based on a sonnet written by Petrarch (1304–74), is thought to express longing for Anne Boleyn, Henry's future second wife. Wyatt wrote in many poetic forms, but he is best known for the artistry of his satires and songs and, along with Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (1517–47), for introducing the Italian sonnet to England.

Son of Anne Skinner and Sir Henry Wyatt, Thomas Wyatt was born in 1503 into wealth and status at Allington Castle in Kent, England. His later career as a statesman followed that of his father, as did his political trials and tribulations. Henry Wyatt had been imprisoned and tortured for over two years by the court of King Richard III for his loyalty to the Tudors. When Henry Tudor became King Henry VII, the elder Wyatt was made a Privy Councillor, and he was later knighted by Henry VIII.

Although it is not certain, it appears that Thomas Wyatt entered St. John's College, Cambridge at age twelve, and that he may have graduated by the age of sixteen. He was a man of many accomplishments, adept at music and poetry as well as politics, and he soon became a valued member of King Henry's court. After serving in various minor positions, Wyatt began his diplomatic career in 1526 with missions to France, Rome, and Venice, where, we may surmise, he acquired his knowledge of Italian sonnets. (At about this time Wyatt became estranged from his wife, Elizabeth Brooke, daughter of Lord Cobham, whom he had married at a young age.) He was knighted in 1536 but soon afterward had his first falling out with King Henry and was imprisoned in the Tower of London. Wyatt might have been under suspicion of having had an affair with Anne Boleyn when she was still unmarried; Henry VIII had divorced Catherine of Aragon for Boleyn and thereby provoked England's break with the Roman Catholic Church. Although Anne and five (almost certainly wrongly accused) lovers were all executed, Wyatt was released after a month.

Most of Wyatt's work to this point had been love poems, often containing themes of disappointment or unrequited love but rarely dark in tone. By contrast, poems written after his imprisonments can express bitterness.

Wyatt eventually regained both the king's favor and his diplomatic status. Unfortunately, though, he lost a great ally upon the fall and execution of the statesman Thomas Cromwell, in 1540, and in 1541 he was imprisoned again, this time on trumped-up charges of treason. Once again he was spared and was briefly in favor with the king. Wyatt succumbed to fever the next year, however, and died in Dorset in 1542.

Few of Wyatt's poems were printed in his lifetime, but many appeared in Richard Tottel's 1557 volume Songes and Sonettes (later to become known as Tottel's Miscellany); a third of the volume is made up of Wyatt's work. Some years later, the Elizabethan critic George Puttenham summarized Sir Thomas Wyatt's importance to the English literary tradition in terms that remain broadly accepted today: "[Wyatt and Surrey] travailed into Italie, and there tasted the sweet and stately measures and stile of the Italian Poesie as novices newly crept out of the schooles of Dante, Arioste and Petrarch. They greatly polished our rude & homely maner of vulgar Poesie, from that it had been before, and for that cause may justly be said the first reformers of our English meetre and stile."

[Please note that additional poems by Sir Thomas Wyatt appear in the Elizabethan Sonnet and Lyric section elsewhere in the volume.]

SONNETS¹10²

The long love that in my thought doth harbour
And in mine heart doth keep his residence
Into my face presseth with bold pretence
And therein campeth, spreading his banner.
5 She that me learneth^o to love and suffer
And will^o that my trust and lust's negligence
Be reined by reason, shame,^o and reverence,
With his hardiness^o taketh displeasure.
Wherewithal unto the heart's forest he fleeth,
10 Leaving his enterprise with pain and cry,
And there him hideth and not appeareth.
What may I do when my master feareth,
But in the field with him to live and die?
For good is the life ending faithfully.

The pillar perished is whereto I leant,
The strongest stay of mine unquiet mind;
The like of it no man again can find—
From east to west still seeking though he went—

² 10 This poem is an adaptation of sonnet 140 from Petrarch's Rime sparse (Scattered Rhymes), also translated by Wyatt's friend Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey.

³ 29 An imitation of Petrarch's Rime 269. There has been some speculation that Wyatt here laments the execution of Thomas Cromwell, Wyatt's former patron.

5 To mine unhap,^o for hap^o away hath rent misfortune / chance
Of all my joy the very bark and rind,
And I, alas, by chance am thus assigned
Dearly to mourn till death do it relent.^o abate
But since that thus it is by destiny,
10 What can I more but have a woeful heart,
My pen in plaint,^o my voice in woeful cry, complaint, lament
My mind in woe, my body full of smart,^o pain
And I myself, myself always to hate
Till dreadful death do cease my doleful state?

Farewell, Love, and all thy laws forever.
Thy baited hooks shall tangle me no more.
Senec⁴ and Plato call me from thy lore

5 In blind error when I did persevere,
Thy sharp repulse, that pricketh ay so sore,
Hath taught me to set in trifles no store
And 'scape forth, since liberty is lever.^o dearer
Therefore, farewell. Go trouble younger hearts

EPIGRAMS

A las, madam, for stealing of a kiss
 Have I so much your mind there offended?
 Have I then done so grievously amiss
 That by no means it may be amended?
 5 Then revenge you, and the next¹ way is this:
 Another kiss shall have my life ended.
 For to my mouth the first my heart did suck;
 The next shall clean out of my breast it pluck.

Vulcan³ begat me; Minerva⁴ me taught.
 Nature my mother; craft nourished me year by year.⁵
 Three bodies⁶ are my food. My strength is in naught.⁷
 Slaughter, wrath, waste, and noise are my children dear.
 5 Guess, friend, what I am and how I am wrought:
 Monster of sea or of land or of elsewhere?
 Know me and use me, and I may thee defend
 And, if I be thine enemy, I may thy life end.

² 48 This riddle was titled "Description of a gun" when it was first published in Tottel's Miscellany. The poem's first six lines are a translation of a Latin riddle found in Bombarda, by Pandolfo Collinutio.

³ Vulcan The Roman god of fire and metal working.

⁴ Minerva The Roman goddess of war, as well as wisdom.

⁵ Nature ... year I.e., the materials come from nature, but are formed through craft.

⁶ Three bodies The ingredients of gunpowder.

⁷ is in naught I.e., the "O" of the gun's mouth.

⁸ Tagus River in Spain, where Wyatt spent several months as a diplomat. The Tagus is known for its gold colored sand.

⁹ Gainward ... pride Unlike the Tagus, which flows westward, the Thames flows "against" the sun's path, or eastward.

BALLADS

They flee from me that sometime did me seek
 With naked foot stalking^o in my treading softly
 my chamber.
 I have seen them gentle, tame, and meek
 That now are wild and do not remember
 5 That sometime they put themself in danger
 To take bread at my hand; and now they range,
 Busily seeking with a continual change.
 Thanked be fortune it hath been otherwise
 Twenty times better; but once in special,
 10 In thin array after^o a pleasant guise,^o in accordance with / style
 When her loose gown from her shoulders did fall
 And she me caught in her arms long and small,
 Therewithal sweetly did me kiss
 And softly said, "Dear heart, how like you this?"
 15 It was no dream; I lay broad waking.^o wide awake
 But all is turned, through my gentleness,
 Into a strange fashion of forsaking.
 And I have leave to go of her goodness,¹¹
 And she also to use newfangledness.^o inconstancy
 20 But since that I so kindly¹² am served,
 I would fain^o know what she hath deserved. gladly
 —1557

¹⁰ the town ... dreams London. According to Geoffrey of Monmouth, Brutus, a Trojan hero and descendant of Aeneas, was visited in a dream by the goddess Diana and told to sail to the cliffs of Albion, where he could build another Troy. When he landed, he proceeded inland and founded the city that became London.

¹¹ I have ... goodness I have her permission to go from her.

¹² kindly Naturally, according to natural laws (i.e., that women are fickle). The word also ironically suggests the modern "with kindness." Tottel amends this to "unkindly," removing the irony.

The high mountains are blasted oft
 When the low valley is mild and soft.

¹ May chance It may chance that.

² V. Innocentia ... mei This is a rebus, a puzzle in which Wyatt has arranged words to suggest a phrase. Translated from Latin, the rebus reads:

W[yatt] Innocence
 Truth Wyatt Faith
 My enemies surround me.

It is believed that Wyatt wrote this poem in 1536, while he was imprisoned in the Bell Tower. In May of that year, Wyatt may have witnessed Anne Boleyn's execution from his cell.

³ Where ... disdain From which your forced exit will be disdained.

⁴ circa Regna tonat Latin: [He] thunders around thrones. This line, referring to Jupiter, is taken from Seneca's Phaedra. The first two stanzas of Wyatt's poem are imitations of lines from that play.

Fortune with Health^o stands at debate.^o well-being / odds

⁵ For all ... might Regardless of one's favor, glory, or might.

⁶ Wit ... prate Intellect does not help one to earn a defense, or to plead or prattle of one's innocence.

⁷ Bear low Keep yourself in a humble position. Also a nautical term meaning "sail with the wind."

⁸ 149 This poem is an imitation of Satira 10 (1532), by Luigi Alamanni.

⁹ John Poyns A fellow member of the court of Henry VIII and a friend of Wyatt's.

10 But true it is that I have always meant
 Less to esteem them than the common sort,
 Of outward things that judge in their intent¹
 Without regard what doth inward resort.^o reside
 I grant sometime that of glory the fire
 15 Doth touch my heart; me list not to report

 My Poyns, I cannot frame my tune to feign,
 20 To cloak the truth for praise, without desert,⁴
 Of them that list all vice for to retain.
 I cannot honour them that sets their part
 With Venus and Bacchus⁵ all their life long,
 Nor hold my peace of them although I smart.
 25 I cannot crouch nor kneel to do such wrong
 To worship them like God on earth alone
 That are like wolves these silly⁶ lambs among.

 Of high Caesar and damn Cato⁷ to die,
 That with his death did 'scape out of the gate

40 From Caesar's hands, if Livy doth not lie,
 And would not live where liberty was lost,
 So did his heart the common wealth⁸ apply.^o serve
 I am not he such eloquence to boast
 To make the crow singing as the swan,
 45 Nor call the lion of coward beasts the most,⁹
 That cannot take a mouse as the cat can;
 And he that dieth for hunger of the gold,
 Call him Alexander,¹⁰ and say that Pan
 Passeth Apollo in music many fold;¹¹
 50 Praise Sir Thopas for a noble tale
 And scorn the story that the knight told;¹²
 Praise him for counsel that is drunk of ale;
 Grin when he laugheth that beareth all the sway,¹³
 Frown when he frowneth and groan when he is pale,
 55 On other's lust to hang both night and day.
 None of these points would ever frame^o in me. fit, prosper
 My wit is naught. I cannot learn the way.
 And much the less of things that greater be,
 That asken help of colours of device
 60 To join the mean with each extremity:
 With the nearest virtue to cloak alway the vice
 And, as to purpose, likewise it shall fall,¹⁴
 To press the virtue,¹⁵ that it may not rise.
 As^o drunkenness good fellowship to call; for example,
 65 The friendly foe with his double face
 Say he is gentle and courteous therewithal;
 And say that Favel^o hath a goodly grace flattery

² me list ... desire I do wish to cast blame on honor, or attack honor, while at the same time desiring it.

³ cannot dye ... liar Cannot see black as anything but black.

⁴ without desert Without its being worthy or deserving.

⁵ Venus and Bacchus Goddess of love and god of drink, here representing lust and debauchery.

⁶ silly Simple, helpless, pitiable.

⁷ Cato Marcus Porcius Cato, the uncle of Brutus and an opponent of Caesar's who, after Caesar's victory, died by suicide rather than submit to his tyrannical authority. The story is recorded by the historian Titus Livius (Livy), mentioned on line 40.

⁸ common wealth Public welfare, the common good, or the state.

⁹ of coward beasts the most King of the (cowardly) beasts.

¹⁰ he that ... Alexander Alexander the Great conquered the known world. Wyatt says he will not call such a man "Alexander," a name that means "defender or protector of mankind."

¹¹ Pan ... many fold Pan, half man, half goat, was the Greek god of shepherds and flocks. He played simple music on his "Pan's pipes," or "shepherd's pipes." Apollo was the great god of, among other things, poetry, music, and the sun.

 This is the cause that I could never yet
 Hang on their sleeves that weigh, as thou mayst see,
 A chip of chance^o more than a pound of wit. good fortune
 80 This maketh me at home to hunt and to hawk
 And in foul weather at my book to sit;

 90 With savoury sauce the delicates to feel;^o smell and taste
 Nor yet in Spain where one must him incline,
 Rather than to be, outwardly to seem.
 I meddle not with wits that be so fine.
 Nor Flanders' cheer⁵ letteth not my sight to deem⁶
 95 Of black and white, nor taketh my wit away
 With beastliness they, beasts,⁷ do so esteem.
 Nor I am not where Christ is given in prey
 For money, poison, and treason at Rome—
 A common practice used night and day.
 100 But here I am in Kent and Christendom
 Among the muses, where I read and rhyme,
 Where if thou list,^o my Poynts, for to come, desire
 Thou shalt be judge how I do spend my time.

Epistolary Advice

Below is a letter from Thomas Wyatt to his son, who had recently married (at age fifteen). The letter was sent from Paris on 15 April 1537. Although a personal letter that mentions Wyatt's failed marriage, this exhortation also draws on a long tradition of epistolary advice to the young; William Cecil and Walter Raleigh contributed to the genre and Shakespeare parodies its sententiousness in Hamlet when Polonius gives fatherly counsel to Laertes.

In as much as now you are come to some years of understanding, and that you should gather within yourself some frame of honesty, I thought that I should not lose my labor wholly if now I did something advertise⁸ to you to take the sure foundations and established opinions

¹ change in time and place I.e., the time and place in which the law was made differ from those of the crime.

² suffereth ... blame Allows offences against those who are innocent.

³ clog Heavy block of wood, attached to impede motion.

⁴ No force for that No matter.

⁵ Flanders' cheer The Flemish were known for their love of drinking.

⁶ letteth not Prevents; deem Distinguish.

⁷ beastliness Drunkenness; beasts Drunks.

⁸ advertise Advise, counsel, explain.

that leadeth to honesty. And here I call not “honesty” what men commonly call honesty, as reputation for riches, for authority, or some like thing, but that honesty that I dare well say your grandfather (whose soul God pardon) had rather left to me than all the lands he did leave me—that was wisdom, gentleness, soberness, desire to do good, friendliness to get the love of many, and truth¹ above all the rest. A great part to have all these things is to desire to have them: and although glory and honest name are not the very ends wherefore these things are to be followed, yet surely they must needs follow them, as light followeth fire, though it were kindled for warmth. Out of these things the chiefest and infallible ground is the dread and reverence of God, whereupon shall ensue the eschewing of the contraries of these said virtues—that is to say, ignorance, unkindness, rashness, desire of harm, unquiet enmity, hatred, many and crafty falsehood, the very root of all shame and dishonesty.

I say the only dread and reverence of God that seeth all things is the defense of the creeping in of all these mischiefs into you. As for my part, although I do not say there is no man that would his son better than I,² yet on my faith I had rather have you lifeless than subject to these vices. Think and imagine always that you are in [the] presence of some honest man that you know, as Sir John Russell, your father-in-law, your uncle, parson, or some other such, and you shall, if at any time you find a pleasure in naughty touches, remember what shame it were before these men to do naughtily. And sure this imagination shall cause you remember that the pleasure of a naughty deed is soon past, and that rebuke, shame, and the note³ thereof shall remain ever. Then, if these things you take for vain imaginations, yet remember that it is certain and no imagination that you are always in the presence and sight of God: and though you see Him not, so much is the reverence the more to be had, for that He seeth and is not seen. Men punish with shame as [the] greatest punishment on earth, yea greater than death, but His punishment is first the withdrawing of His favour and grace, and in leaving His hand to rule the stern,⁴ to let the ship run without guide to your own destruction, and suffereth⁵ so the man that He forsaketh to run headlong, as subject to all mishaps, and at last with shameful end to everlasting shame and death. You may see continual examples both of one sort and th’other, and the better if you mark them well that yourself are come of.⁶ And consider well your good grandfather what things that were in him, and his end; and they that knew him noted him thus: first and chiefly to have a great reverence of God and good opinion of Godly things, next that there was no man more pitiful,⁷ no man more true of his word, no man faster to his friend, no man diligenter nor more circumspect, which thing both the kings his masters noted in him greatly. And if these things, and especially the grace of God that the fear of God always kept with him, had not been, the chances of this troublesome world that he was in had long ago overwhelmed him. This preserved him in prison from the hands of the tyrant⁸ that could find in his heart to see him racked, from two years and more imprisonment in Scotland,

¹ truth Wyatt’s word is “trough,” which suggests both “truth” and “troth”—i.e., a trustworthy integrity.

² that ... than I That is, would wish better for his son.

³ rebuke ... note Notice, reputation.

⁴ His ... stern In withdrawing his hand from (the ship’s) steering wheel, the tiller.

⁵ suffereth Allows.

⁶ better ... of If you observe well those from whom you derive—your family.

⁷ pitiful Full of pity, merciful.

in irons and stocks, from the danger of sudden changes and commotions diverse, until that well beloved of many, hated of none, in his fair age and good reputation, Godly and Christianly he went to Him that loved him for that he always had Him in reverence. And of myself I may be a mere example unto you of my folly and unthriftiness¹ that hath as I well deserved brought me into a thousand dangers and hazards, enmities, hatreds, imprisonments, despites² and indignations: but that God hath of His goodness chastised me and not cast me clean out of His favour, which thing I can impute to nothing but to the goodness of my good father, that I dare well say purchased with continual request of God His grace towards me more than I regarded or considered myself, and a little part to the small fear that I had of God in the most of my rage³ and the little delight that I had in mischief. You therefore, if you be sure and have God in your sleeve, to call you to His grace at last, venture not hardly⁴ by mine example upon naughty unthriftiness in trust of His goodness; and, besides the shame, I dare lay ten to one you shall perish in the adventure: for trust not that my wish or desire of God for you shall stand you in as much effect as I think my father's did for me: we are not all accepted of Him. Begin therefore betimes, make God and goodness your foundations. Make your examples of wise and honest me; shoot at the mark; be no mocker—mocks follow them that delight therein. He shall be sure of shame that feeleth no grief in other men's shames. Have your friends in a reverence and think unkindness to be the greatest offence, and least punished amongst men, but so much the more to be dreaded, for God is Justiser⁵ upon that alone. Love well and agree with your wife, for where is noise and debate in the house, there is unquiet dwelling. And much more where it is in one bed. Frame well yourself to love, and rule well and honestly your wife as your fellow, and she shall love and reverence you as her head. Such as you are unto her, such shall she be unto you. Obey and reverence your father-in-law as you would me; and remember that long life followeth them that reverence their fathers and elders. And the blessing of God for good agreement between the wife and husband is fruit of many children, which I for the like thing do lack, and the fault is both in your mother and me, but chiefly in her.

Read oft this my letter and it shall be as though I had often written unto you. And think that I have herein printed a fatherly affection to you. If I may see that I have not lost my pain(s), mine shall be the contentation⁶ and yours the profit. And upon condition that you follow my advertisement I send you God's blessing and mine, and as well to come to honesty as to increase of years.

At Paris the 15th of April, your loving father, Thomas Wyatt.

² despites Scorn.

³ rage Irrationality, madness.

⁴ hardily Boldly, incautiously.

⁵ Justiser Judge, justice-maker.

⁶ contentation Payment, satisfaction, contentment.

HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF SURREY

1517 – 1547

Like a number of other aristocrats, Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, largely confined his literary writings to manuscript circulation among his friends and fellow members of Henry VIII's court; it was the posthumous appearance of his works in the printer Richard Tottel's Miscellany (1557) that won him widespread readership. His work is a landmark in the development of English literature, for he was among the first in England to import the Petrarchan sonnet, and, in his translation of Books II and IV of Virgil's Aeneid, the first to deploy blank verse. As a writer, Surrey was innovative; as a courtier, he was imprudent, and paid the price when the king had him beheaded.

Surrey was born in Hunsdon, Hertfordshire in 1517, eldest son of Lord Thomas Howard, third duke of Norfolk, and Lady Elizabeth Stafford. Surrey's ancestors on both sides of his family included royalty, and as a boy this talented member of one of England's greatest families spent some time at Windsor Castle with Henry VIII's illegitimate son, Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond, and in 1524 was granted the title of earl. He received a sound humanist education and had early experience living abroad when his father served as Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. One of his cousins was Anne Boleyn, second of Henry VIII's six wives, who managed to prevent a proposed marriage between Surrey and the king's daughter, Mary Tudor. Instead, in 1533, Surrey married Lady Frances de Vere, the earl of Oxford's daughter, by whom he had five children. As an adult, Surrey served as a courtier and soldier; his travels in France on diplomatic or military ventures doubtless had an impact on his understanding of the Continental Renaissance in art and letters. Service to the King was a risky business during the King's later years, however, for the King was increasingly suspicious and the court, especially after the Reformation, was split into competing factions. The balance had tipped against Surrey's family in 1536 when Henry VIII married Jane Seymour, his third wife, for the Seymours, who welcomed Henry's break with the Church of Rome, were bitter rivals of the Catholic Howards and took advantage of their new power (Surrey himself seems to have leaned toward Reform, although his exact views can be debated and perhaps shifted). Thanks to probably false accusations that he had sided with a rebellion against the King, the so-called Pilgrimage of Grace, Surrey was imprisoned between 1537 and 1539. His misfortune did not last, however, for Jane Seymour died shortly after giving birth. The King married Catherine Howard, another of Surrey's cousins, bringing the Howard family back into favor, at least until Catherine was found guilty of adultery and executed in early 1542. In 1541 the King named Surrey a Knight of the Garter, and for the next five years Surrey served the King in various English wars or administrative capacities.

During these years Surrey wrote verse (including love poems, elegies, satire, Biblical paraphrases, translated sections of Virgil's Aeneid, and a poignant meditation on Windsor Castle). During his lifetime he published only one poem, in praise of the deceased Sir Thomas Wyatt. Shakespeare and others would often adopt his sonnet structure, which instead of Petrarch's pattern—an octave followed by a sestet—most often has three quatrains (four lines usually rhyming alternately) and a couplet (a pair of lines). We call this the Shakespearean or English form, but it was Surrey who invented it. Even more important for the future of English literature is the blank verse that Surrey developed for his translations from Virgil, a flexible and harmonious meter that English writers such as Marlowe, Shakespeare, and Milton found the best equivalent for the dactylic hexameter of Latin epic.

In 1546, Surrey was involved in another political struggle. Henry VIII's health was bad, and the court was thinking about who might be regent for his little son, the future Edward VI. Surrey dared suggest openly that his father, the earl of Norfolk, would be Protector. Norfolk was next in the line of succession after Edward, and the Seymour family convinced the King that he was planning to depose the prince after Henry died and make himself king instead. Surrey was put on trial, the legal excuse being that he had treasonably placed the royal arms and insignia on his own coat of arms. He and his father were imprisoned in the Tower and there Surrey lost his head on 10 January 1547—the last person to be executed during Henry's reign. Norfolk was also condemned to die, but the death of Henry on January 28 voided the sentence at the last minute. Surrey is buried in Framlington, Suffolk.

[Please note that an additional poem by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey appears in the Elizabethan Sonnet and Lyric section elsewhere in this volume.]

*Love, that Doth Reign and Live within My Thought*¹

Love, that doth reign and live within my thought,
And built his seat within my captive breast,
Clad in the arms wherein with me he fought,
Oft in my face he doth his banner rest.
5 But she that taught me love and suffer pain,
My doubtful hope and eke° my hot desire also
With shamefast° look to shadow and refrain, modest
Her smiling grace converteth straight to ire.
And coward Love, then, to the heart apace
10 Taketh his flight, where he doth lurk and plain,° complain
His purpose lost, and dare not show his face.
For my lord's guilt thus faultless bide° I pain; endure
Yet from my lord shall not my foot remove:
Sweet is the death that takes end by love.

*Set Me Whereas the Sun Doth
Parch the Green*²

Set me whereas the sun doth parch the green,
Or where his beams may not dissolve the ice,
In temperate heat where he is felt and seen;
With proud people, in presence sad and wise;
5 Set me in base, or yet in high degree,
In the long night or in the shortest day,
In clear weather or where mists thickest be,
In lusty° youth or when my hairs be gray; vigorous
Set me in earth, in heaven, or yet in hell,
10 In hill, in dale, or in the foaming flood;
Thrall° or at large, alive whereso I dwell, captive
Sick or in health, in ill fame° or in good: repute
Yours will I be, and with that only thought
Comfort myself when that my hap° is nought. luck

¹ Love ... Thought This sonnet is a translation of Petrarch's Rima 140, which Surrey's friend Wyatt also translated.

² Set ... Green Adaptation of Petrarch's Rima 145.

*Alas! So All Things Now Do
Hold Their Peace*¹

Alas! so all things now do hold their peace,
 Heaven and earth disturbed in nothing.
 The beasts, the air, the birds their song do cease;
 The night's chair² the stars about doth bring;
 5 Calm is the sea, the waves work less and less:
 So am not I, whom love, alas, doth wring,
 Bringing before my face the great increase
 Of my desires, whereat I weep and sing
 In joy and woe, as in a doubtful ease.
 10 For my sweet thoughts sometime do pleasure bring,
 But by and by the cause of my disease³ uneasiness, distress
 Gives me a pang that inwardly doth sting,
 When that I think what grief it is again
 To live and lack the thing should rid my pain.

*So Cruel Prison How Could Betide*³

So cruel prison how could betide, alas,
 As proud Windsor, where I, in lust and joy,
 With a king's son my childish years did pass
 In greater feast than Priam's sons of Troy?⁴
 5 Where each sweet place returns a taste full sour:
 The large green courts, where we were wont to hove,⁵ linger
 With eyes cast up unto the maidens' tower,
 And easy sighs, such as folk draw in love.
 The stately sales,⁵ the ladies bright of hue,
 10 The dances short, long tales of great delight,

² night's chair The constellation Ursa Major.

³ So ... Betide In 1537 Surrey was imprisoned in Windsor Castle for having struck a courtier and broken the peace in the king's domain. In this poem he remembers his earlier stay at the castle (1530–32) with Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond and illegitimate son of Henry VIII. Richmond (who had married Surrey's sister in 1533) died in 1536.

⁴ Priam's ... Troy Priam, the king of Troy at the time of the Trojan war, had fifty sons.

⁵ sales Halls or spacious chambers (from the French "salle").

With words and looks that tigers could but rue,⁶
 Where each of us did plead the other's right.

The palm play,⁷ where, despoiled⁸ for the game, stripped
 With dazed eyes oft we by gleams of love
 15 Have missed the ball and got sight of our dame,
 To bait⁹ her eyes, which kept the leads⁸ above. attract

The gravelled ground,⁹ with sleeves tied jousting ground on the helm,⁹
 On foaming horse, with swords and friendly hearts,
 With cheer as though the one should overwhelm,
 20 Where we have fought and chased oft with darts.⁹ javelins

With silver drops the meads yet spread for ruth,¹⁰
 In active games of nimbleness and strength,
 Where we did strain, trained by swarms of youth,
 Our tender limbs that yet shot up in length.

25 The secret groves, which oft we made resound
 Of pleasant plaint,⁹ and of our ladies' praise, lament
 Recording soft what grace each one had found,
 What hope of speed, what dread of long delays.

The wild forest, the clothed holts⁹ with green; wooded hills
 30 With reins ailed, and swift ybreathed¹¹ horse,
 With cry of hounds and merry blasts between,
 Where we did chase the fearful hart⁹ a force.¹² male deer

The void¹³ walls eke⁹ that harboured us each night; also
 Wherewith, alas, revive within my breast

⁶ rue Regard with compassion.

⁷ palm play Game in which the ball was hit with the palms.

⁸ leads Sheets of metal that covered the roofs of the courts. Spectators would watch the game from these.

⁹ helm Helmet, to which jousting would tie a lady's sleeve (then a separate, ornamental covering) as a token of her favor.

¹⁰ With ... ruth I.e., the meadows (meads) were still covered with dew; ruth Compassion.

¹¹ ailed Slackened; swift ybreathed Panting.

¹² chase ... a force Run down.

¹³ void I.e., empty. In royal houses it was customary for all tapestries and wall-hangings to be taken down when the resident members of the court were not at home.

35 The sweet accord, such sleeps as yet delight,
The pleasant dreams, the quiet bed of rest;

The secret thoughts imparted with such trust,
The wanton talk, the divers change of play,
The friendship sworn, each promise kept so just,
40 Wherewith we past the winter night away.

And with this thought the blood forsakes my face,
The tears berain^o my cheeks of deadly hue, rain upon
The which, as soon as sobbing sighs, alas,
Upsupped^o have, thus I my plaint renew: swallowed

45 "O place of bliss! renewer of my woes!
Give me accompt,^o where is my noble fere,^o account / companion
Whom in thy walls thou didst each night enclose,
To other lief;^o but unto me most dear?" precious

Each stone, alas, that doth my sorrow rue,
50 Returns thereto a hollow sound of plaint.
Thus I alone, where all my freedom grew,
In prison pine with bondage and restraint;

And with remembrance of the greater grief,
To banish the less, I find my chief relief.

Wyatt Resteth Here

Wyatt resteth here, that quick^o could never rest; alive
Whose heavenly gifts increased by disdain,^o malice
And virtue sank the deeper in his breast:
Such profit he by envy could obtain.

5 A head where wisdom mysteries^o did frame, profound thoughts
Whose hammers beat still in that lively brain
As on a stith,^o where that some work of fame anvil
Was daily wrought to turn to Britain's gain.

A visage stern and mild, where both did grow
10 Vice to contemn,^o in virtue to rejoice; scorn
Amid great storms, whom grace assured so,
To live upright and smile at fortune's choice.

A hand that taught what might be said in rhyme;
That reft^o Chaucer the glory of his wit— robbed
15 A mark the which (unperfected for time¹)
Some may approach, but never none shall hit.

A tongue that served in foreign realms his king;
Whose courteous talk to virtue did inflame
Each noble heart: a worthy guide to bring 20 Our English youth, by travail, unto fame.^o good character

An eye whose judgment no affect^o could blind, affection
Friends to allure and foes to reconcile;
Whose piercing look did represent a mind
With virtue fraught, reposed, void of guile.

25 A heart where dread yet never so impressed
To hide the thought that might the truth advance;
In neither fortune loft,^o nor yet repressed, lifted
To swell in wealth or yield unto mischance.

A valiant corps^o where force and beauty met, body
30 Happy—alas, too happy, but for foes;
Lived and ran the race that nature set,
Of manhood's shape, where she the mold did lose.

But to the heavens that simple^o soul is fled, free from guile
Which left with such as covet^o Christ to know² desire
35 Witness of faith that never shall be dead;
Sent for our health, but not received so.

Thus, for our guilt, this jewel have we lost;
The earth his bones, the heavens possess his ghost.

THE ELIZABETHAN SONNET AND LYRIC

Developed first in thirteenth-century Italy and wildly popular in Renaissance Europe, the sonnet (or “little song”) became one of the most enduring forms of English verse. A lyric poem in fourteen lines, usually with ten or twelve syllables to a line, the standard sonnet follows one of several rhyme schemes. The most important are the Italian or “Petrarchan,” the English (often referred to as the “Shakespearean,” although it was Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, who first developed it), and the Spenserian. The Petrarchan form, introduced by the Italian writer Francesco Petrarch in the fourteenth century, has two parts: first comes the “octave” of eight lines, which usually sets forth some situation, argument, narrative, analogy, comment, wish, or other thought. This is followed by the “sestet,” six lines that often perform a volta, or turn, that gives some resolution, further elaboration, counter-argument, or other contrast to the octave. The rhyme scheme ordinarily is abba abba cde cde, although variations for the sestet (such as cde dcd or cdd cdd) are acceptable.

The English poets Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey first introduced the sonnet into English, translating some of Petrarch’s sonnets in the 1520s and 1530s and, in the case of Surrey, writing a few more in the Petrarchan manner. They were not published until 1557, but they circulated in manuscript. By the 1580s the popularity of the sonnet on the Continent led to its revival in England, and the posthumous publication in 1591 of Sir Philip Sidney’s Astrophil and Stella started a fashion for the form and for the sonnet sequence that blazed for a few years with extraordinary intensity.

The influence of Wyatt and Surrey (and later of Sidney, Spenser, and Shakespeare) on poetry in English has been so powerful that we tend to think of the sonnet sequence as being naturally associated with love poetry. The first known sonnet sequence in English—Anne Lock’s A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner—is a forceful reminder that the form may also be put to religious purposes. Appended to her translation of a selection of John Calvin’s sermons, the sonnet sequence now attributed with considerable confidence by scholars to Lock includes five prefatory sonnets, followed by twenty-one sonnets providing commentaries on the verses of Psalm 51; taken as a whole, the sequence is a powerful Calvinist poetic meditation on sin and guilt. It is worth noting in passing here that, in a variety of forms, psalm discourse became during the sixteenth century a recognized genre of writing, particularly for women; it was one form in which women writers could express themselves in the first person without fear of their behavior being termed inappropriate. Later in the century Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke, completed a poetic translation of all the psalms that her brother, Sir Phillip Sidney, had begun before he died. (Of considerable importance in themselves, Herbert’s series of translations are also thought to have influenced John Donne’s series of Holy Sonnets.)

Shakespeare’s sonnets (some of which certainly, and many others probably, were written in the 1590s although Shakespeare may well have revised them before they were published, well after the fashion was over, in 1609) typically have four parts: three “quatrains” (a set of four lines) each rhyming abab cdcd efef and then a couplet rhyming gg. The quatrains may trace the development of an idea, state the same notion several times, or describe a situation from several angles—the possibilities of this flexible form are nearly endless. The couplet may be a logical conclusion, a further thought, or even a dramatic denial of what has come before.

Edmund Spenser’s Amoretti (1595) have yet another scheme, a sort of compromise between the Petrarchan and the Shakespearean, interlocking its quatrains with the rhyme scheme abab bcbc cdcd concluding with a couplet ee. Substantial selections from the sonnets by Sidney, Shakespeare, and Spenser appear elsewhere in this volume, thus the sonnets in this section are designed to provide further insight into the origins and range of the form; the lyrics by Gascoigne and by an anonymous poet are meant to extend the reader's sense of how the short Elizabethan lyric could handle some of the themes—age, absence—found in the sonnets.

The Continental Background

FRANCESCO PETRARCH (1304–1374)

The influence of Petrarch's sonnet sequence, about his unfulfilled love for Laura, was immense, and provided European love poets with a way to shape the erotic experience in terms of frustration, self-scrutiny, self-division, praise, and longing and to express this through elaborate metaphor, paradox, and an intense focus on detail. Whether the object of imitation, revision, or satire, Petrarch's approach to love long remained the discourse against which and through which poets defined themselves when writing on love.

Pace non trovo et non ò da far guerra,
 e temo et spero, et ardo et son un ghiaccio,
 et volo sopra 'l cielo et giaccio in terra,
 et nulla stringo et tutto 'l mondo abbraccio.
 5 Tal m'è in pregon, che non m'apre né serra,
 né per suo mi riten né scioglie il laccio,
 et non m'ancide Amore et non mi sferra,
 né mi vuol vivo, né mi trae d'impaccio.
 Veggio senza occhi, et non ò lingua et grido,
 10 et bramo di perir, et cheggio aita,
 et ò in odio me stesso et amo altrui.
 Pascomi di dolor, piangendo rido, egualmente mi spiace morte et vita.
 In questo stato son, Donna, per vui.

Amor, che nel penser mio vive et regna
 e 'l suo seggio maggior nel mio cor tene, talor armato ne la fronte vene;
 ivi si loca et ivi pon sua insegna.
 5 Quella ch' amare et sofferir ne 'nsegna
 e vol che 'l gran desio, l'accesa spene ragion, vergogna, et reverenza affrene, di nostro ardir fra se stessa si sdegna.
 Onde Amor paventoso fugge al core,
 10 Lasciando ogni sua impresa, et piange et trema;
 ivi s'asonde et non appar più fore.
 Che poss' io far, temendo il mio signore,
 se non star seco infin a l'ora estrema?
 ché bel fin fa chi ben amando more.

Passa la nave mia colma d'oblio

Love, that doth reign and live within my thought
 And built his seat^o within my captive breast, dwelling
 Clad in the arms wherein with me he fought
 Oft in my face he doth his banner rest.
 5 But she that taught me love and suffer pain,
 My doubtful hope and eke^o my hot desire also

 Her smiling grace converteth straight to ire.
 And coward Love then to the heart apace

² 'Tween rock and rock Petrarch specifies Scylla and Charybdis, the dangerous monsters who lived on a rock and in the whirlpool on either side of a narrow channel through which Ulysses must sail in Homer's Odyssey.

³ lord I.e., Cupid, Love.

Una candida cerva sopra l'erba verde m'apparve con duo corna d'oro, fra due riviere all'ombra d'un alloro,
levando 'l sole a la stagione acerba.

ch' i' lasciai per seguirla ogni lavoro,
come l'avarò che 'n cercar tesoro con diletto l'affanno disacerba.
"Nessun mi tocchi," al bel collo d'intorno

GASPARA STAMPA (1523–1554)

132

Quando io dimando nel mio pianto Amore,
Che cosí male il mio parlar ascolata,
Mille fate il dí, non una volta,
Ché mi fere e trafigge a tutte l'ore:
5 "Come esser può, s'io diedi l'alma e 'l core al mio signor dal dí ch'a me l'ho tolta,
e se ogni cosa dentro a lui raccolta
è riso e gioia, è scema di dolore, ch'io senta gelosia fredda e temenza,
10 e d'allegrezza e gioia resti priva,
s'io vivo in lui, e in me di me son senza?"
"Vo' che tu mora al bene ed al mal viva," mi risponde egli in ultima sentenza;
"Questa ti basti, e questo fa' che scriva."
—1554 (Rime, NO. 132 IN A. SALZA ED., 1913)

¹ Noli me tangere "Do not touch me," words said by Christ after the Resurrection. Early commentators on Petrarch often read this as signifying that Laura considered herself bound by the laws of chaste marriage as decreed by Augustus Caesar. Wyatt's readers who identified the deer with Anne Boleyn (whom Wyatt knew and perhaps loved), would have read the lines as suggesting that the "hind" belongs to Henry VIII.

190

Whoso list^o to hunt, I know where is a wishes hind,^o female deer
But as for me, alas, I may^o no more: can
The vain travail^o hath wearied me so sore effort
I am of them that farthest come behind.
5 Yet may I by no means my wearied mind
Draw from the deer: but, as she fleeth afore, Fainting I follow. I leave off therefore,
Since in a net I seek to hold the wind.
Who list to hunt, I put him out of doubt,
10 As well as I may spend his time in vain.
And, graven with diamonds in letters plain,
There is written her fair neck round about:
"Noli me tangere,¹ for Caesar's I am,
And wild for to hold, although I seem tame."
—C. 1520S (ADAPTED BY SIR THOMAS WYATT)

When in my weeping I inquire of Love²
(Who so unwillingly gives ear to me)
A thousand times a day—never just once—
Why he will wound and pierce me all the time:
5 "How can it be, since I gave heart and soul
To him,³ the day I took them both from me;
If everything enclosed within his breast
Is only joy and laughter, never sorrow,
How can I feel cold jealousy and fear
10 And be deprived of all my joyfulness,
Living in him, and never in myself?"
"I bid you die to joy and live in grief,"
Love answers me in his hard final sentence:
"Let this suffice you, that it makes you write."
—1997 (TRANS. LAURA ANNA STORTONI AND MARY PRENTICE LILLIE)

² Love The personified god of love, Cupid, Eros.

³ To him Stampa refers to her beloved and social superior, Count Collatino di Collalto, on whose name, "high hill," she often puns, and who seems for a while to have reciprocated her love.

SI NOSTRE VIE ...

Si nostre vie est moins qu'une journée
 En l'éternel, si l'an qui faict le tour
 Chasse noz jours sans espoir de retour,
 Si perissable est toute chose née,
 5 Que songes-tu, mon ame emprisonnée?
 Pourquoy te plaist l'obscur de nostre jour
 Si pour voler en un plus cler sejour,
 Tu as au dos l'aile bien empanée?
 La, est le bien que tout esprit desire,
 10 La, le repos ou tout le monde aspire,
 La, est l'amour, la, le plaisir encore.

 Tu y pouras recongnoistre l'Idée
 De la beauté, qu'en ce monde j'adore.²

IF THIS, OUR LIFE ...

If this, our life, be less than but a day
 In the eternal; if each circling year
 Bears off our days, never to reappear;
 If every creature born must death obey,
 5 Why then, my prisoned soul, should you delay?
 How can it please you thus to tarry here,
 In darkness, when unto a brighter sphere,
 Your well-plumed wings would carry you away?
 There is the good that man's mind hungers for;
 10 There, the repose he seeks, forevermore;
 There, love and joy abound, their bliss bestow.
 There, O my soul, as you reach heaven's height,
 Beauty ideal will loom within your sight,
 That beauty that I worship here below.

Best he who like Ulysses voyaged fair and wide,
 Or like the man who conquered Colchis' Golden Fleece,⁴
 And then returned well-traveled, learned now and wise,
 To live among his own all his remaining years!

¹ L'Olive augmentée The L'Olive sequence of sonnets, written in the style of Petrarch, did much to popularize the sonnet form in France. Whereas for Petrarch the laurel was the symbol of his loved one, for Du Bellay it was the olive tree. The first edition of Du Bellay's collection appeared in 1549; the expanded edition in which this sonnet first appears was published a year later.

² Si nostre ... monde j'adore A Neoplatonic sonnet adapted from a sonnet by Bernardino Daniello.

³ Les Regrets Du Bellay published this sequence of 191 sonnets in 1558. The poem has been translated for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by Roger P. Kuin.

⁴ Colchis' Golden Fleece In Greek mythology, Jason and his Argonauts traveled to Colchis (on the Black Sea) in a quest for the fleece of a winged ram made of gold.

5 Quand reverrai-je, hélas, de mon petit village
Fumer la cheminée, et en quelle saison
Reverrai-je le clos de ma pauvre maison,
Qui m'est une province, et beaucoup davantage?

10 Plus me plaît le séjour qu'ont bâti mes aïeux,
Que des palais Romains le front audacieux,
Plus que le marbre dur me plaît l'ardoise fine:

Plus mon Loir gaulois, que le Tibre latin,
Plus mon petit Liré, que le mont Palatin,
Et plus que l'air marin la douceur angevine.

PIERRE DE RONSARD (1524–1585)

Je voudroy bien richement jaunissant
En pluye d'or goute à goute descendre
Dans le giron de ma belle Cassandre,
Lors qu'en ses yeux le somne va glissant.¹
5 Puis je voudroy bien en toreau blandissant²
Me transformer pour finement la prendre,
Quand elle va par l'herbe la plus tendre
Seule à l'escart mille fleurs ravissant.
Je voudroy bien afin d'aiser ma peine
10 Estre un Narcisse, & elle une fontaine
Pour m'y plonger une nuit à séjour:
Et voudroy bien que ceste nuit encore
Durast toujours sans que jamais l'Aurore³
D'un front nouveau nous r'allumast le jour.
—1552 (Amours I.20)

5 Alas, when shall I see my village and the smoke
Of its few humble fires once more, and in what season
Shall I behold again the yard of my poor house,
Which is to me a province, yea, and even more?

10 Better I love the dwelling my forefathers built
Than Roman palaces' great arrogant façades;
Better than marble hard I love the gentle slate:

Better my Gallic Loire than Latin Tiber⁴ far,
Better my slight Liré⁵ than the Mount Palatine,
And better than sea air the softness of Anjou.⁶
—2015 (TRANS. ROGER P. KUIN)

Iwould in rich and golden coloured rain,
With tempting showers in pleasant sort descend
Into fair Phyllis' lap (my lovely friend)
When sleep her sense with slumber doth restrain.
5 I would be changed to a milk-white bull,
When midst the gladsome fields she should appear,
By pleasant sweetness to surprise my dear,
Whilst from their stalks she pleasant flowers did pull.
I were content to weary out my pain,
10 To be Narcissus so she were a spring
To drown in her those woes my heart do wring:
And, more, I wish transformed to remain:
That whilst I thus in pleasures' lap did lie,
I might refresh desire, which else would die.
—1593 (TRANS. THOMAS LODGE, Phyllis 34)

¹ Je voudroy ... glissant In this poem, popular in England, Ronsard wishes to become golden rain like that into which Zeus changed himself so as to visit the imprisoned Danaë, into a white bull like the one Zeus became when he seduced and kidnapped young Europa, and a pool like the one in which Narcissus saw himself and fell in love.

² blandissant Later editions have "blanchissant"—"white."

³ l'Aurore The dawn goddess.

⁴ Loire ... Tiber The Loire, France's most celebrated river, flows through central France to the Atlantic; the Tiber River flows through Rome, in Italy.

⁵ Liré Village in which Du Bellay was born and raised.

⁶ Anjou A former county of France, Anjou is located in the Loire valley.

Quand vous serez bien vieille, au soir à la chandelle,
Assise auprès du feu, devidant & filant,
Direz, chantant mes vers, en vous esmerveillant, “Ronsard me celebroit du temps que j’étois belle.”

- 5 Lors vous n’aurez servante oyant telle nouvelle,
Desja sous le labeur à demy sommeillant,
Qui au bruit de “Ronsard” ne s’aïlle resveillant,
Benissant vostre nom de louange immortelle.
Je seray sous la terre, & fantaume sans os:
10 Par les ombres Myrtheux je prendray mon repos.
Vous serez au fouyer une vieille accroupie,
Regrettant mon amour, & vostre fier disdain.
Vivez, si m’en croyez, n’attendez à demain:
Cueillez dès aujourd’huy les roses de la vie.

ANNE LOCK (?1533–c. 1600)

from A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner

- Long have I heard, and yet¹ I hear the sounds¹ still
Of dreadfull threats and thunders of the law,
Which echo of my guilty mind resounds,
And with redoubled horror doth so draw
5 My listening soul from mercy’s gentle voice
That louder, Lord, I am constrained to call:
Lord, pierce mine ears, and make me to rejoice
When I shall hear, and when thy mercy shall Sound in my heart the gospel of thy grace.
10 Then shalt thou give my hearing joy again,
The joy that only may relieve my case.
And then my bruised bones, that thou with pain
Hast made too weak my feebled corpse to bear,
Shall leap for joy, to show mine inward cheer.

¹ The marginal gloss provided for this sonnet is verse 8 of Psalm 51: “Thou shalt make me hear joy and gladness; all the bones which thou hast broken shall rejoice.”

When you are very old, by candle’s flame,
Spinning beside the fire, at end of day,
Singing my verse, admiring, you will say:
“When I was fair, Ronsard’s muse I became.”

- 5 Your servant then, some weary old beldame—
Whoever she may be—nodding away,
Hearing “Ronsard,” will shake off sleep, and pray
Your name be blessed, to live in deathless fame.
Buried, I shall a fleshless phantom be,
10 Hovering by the shadowed myrtle tree;
You, by the hearth, a pining crone, bent low,
Whose pride once scorned my love, much to your sorrow.
Heed me, live for today, wait not the morrow:
Gather life’s roses while still fresh they grow.
—2002 (TRANS. NORMAN R. SHAPIRO)

- Look on me, Lord: though trembling I beknowe,²
That sight of sin so sore offendeth thee,
That seeing sin, how it doth overflow
My whelmed soul, thou canst not look on me
5 But³ with disdain, with horror and despite.³ except / scorn
Look on me, Lord: but look not on my sin.
Not that I hope to hide it from thy sight,
Which seest me all without and eke³ within. also
But so remove it from thy wrathful eye,
10 And from the justice of thine angry face,
That thou impute it not.³ Look not how I
Am foul by sin: but make me by thy grace
Pure in thy mercy’s sight, and, Lord, I pray,
That hatest sin, wipe all my sins away.
—1560

² The marginal gloss provided for this sonnet is verse 9 of Psalm 51: “Turn away thy face from my sins, and do away all my misdeeds.”

³ impute it not Do not take it into consideration.

SAMUEL DANIEL (1562–1619)

from *Delia*6¹

Fair is my love, and cruel as she's fair;
 Her brow shades frowns, although her eyes are sunny;
 Her smiles are lightning, though her pride despair;
 And her disdains are gall, her favours honey.
 5 A modest maid, decked with a blush of honour,
 Whose feet do tread green paths of youth and love;
 The wonder of all eyes that look upon her:
 Sacred on earth, designed a saint above.
 Chastity and Beauty, which were deadly foes,
 10 Live reconciled friends within her brow:
 And had she pity to conjoin^o with those, join
 Then who had heard the complaints I utter now?
 O had she not been fair, and thus unkind,
 My Muse had slept, and none had known my mind.
 —1592

28²

Raising my hopes on hills of high desire,
 Thinking to scale the heaven of her heart,
 My slender means presumed too high a part;
 Her thunder of disdain forced me retire,
 5 And threw me down to pain in all this fire,
 Where, lo, I languish in so heavy smart,
 Because th'attempt was far above my art:
 Her pride brooked not poor souls should come so nigh her.
 Yet I protest my high aspiring will 10 Was not to dispossess her of her right:
 Her sovereignty should have remained still,
 I only sought the bliss to have her sight.
 Her sight, contented thus to see me spill,
 Framed my desires fit for her eyes to kill.
 —1592

² 28 First printed in a collection of sonnets appended to the 1591 unauthorized edition of Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella.

33

When men shall find thy flower, thy glory pass,
 And thou with careful^o brow full of cares
 sitting alone

Received hast this message from thy glass,
 That tells thee truth, and says that all is gone;
 5 Fresh shalt thou see in me the wounds thou madest,
 Though spent thy flame, in me the heat remaining:
 I that have loved thee thus before thou fadest,
 My faith shall wax, when thou art in thy waning.
 The world shall find this miracle in me,
 10 That fire can burn when all the matter's spent:
 Then what my faith hath been thy self shalt see,
 And that thou wast unkind thou mayst repent.
 Thou mayst repent that thou hast scorned my tears,
 When winter snows upon thy golden hairs.

MICHAEL DRAYTON (1563–1631)

from Idea

6

How many paltry, foolish, painted things,
 That now in coaches trouble every street,
 Shall be forgotten, whom no poet sings,
 Ere they be well wrapped in their winding sheet?
 5 Where I to thee eternity shall give,
 When nothing else remaineth of these days,
 And queens hereafter shall be glad to live
 Upon the alms of thy superfluous praise;
 Virgins and matrons reading these my rhymes,
 10 Shall be so much delighted with thy story,
 That they shall grieve they lived not in these times,
 To have seen thee, their sex's only glory:
 So shalt thou fly above the vulgar throng,
 Still to survive in my immortal song.
 —1619

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part;
 Nay, I have done: you get no more of me,
 And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart,
 That thus so cleanly I myself can free;
 5 Shake hands for ever, cancel all our vows,
 And when we meet at any time again,

Be it not seen in either of our brows
 That we one jot of former love retain.
 Now at the last gasp of Love's latest breath,
 When his pulse failing, Passion speechless lies,
 When Faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
 And Innocence is closing up his eyes,
 Now if thou would'st, when all have given him over,
 From death to life, thou might'st him yet recover.
 —1619

Truce, gentle Love, a parley now I crave:
 Methinks 'tis long since first these wars begun.
 Nor thou, nor I, the better yet can have;
 Bad is the match, where neither party won.
 I offer free conditions of fair peace,
 My heart for hostage that it shall remain.
 Discharge our forces, here let malice cease,
 So for my pledge thou give me pledge again.
 Or if no thing but death will serve thy turn,
 Still thirsting for subversion of my state,
 Do what thou canst, raze, massacre, and burn,
 Let the world see the utmost of thy hate:
 I send defiance, since if overthrown,
 Thou vanquishing, the conquest is mine own.
 —1599

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE (1564–1616)

from Romeo and Juliet (Act 1, Scene 5)

ROMEO. If I profane with my unworthiest hand
 This holy shrine,¹ the gentle fine is this,
 My lips, two blushing pilgrims, ready stand
 To smooth that rough touch with a tender kiss.
 JULIET. Good pilgrim, you do wrong your hand too much,
 Which mannerly devotion shows in this;
 For saints² have hands that pilgrims' hands do touch,
 And palm to palm is holy palmers' kiss.³
 ROMEO. Have not saints lips, and holy palmers too?

¹ holy shrine Juliet's hand.² saints That is, images or statues of saints, venerated by pilgrims.³ palmers' kiss Palmers were pilgrims who have been to the Holy Land; their emblem was the palm frond (hence Juliet's pun on "palm").

JULIET. Aye, pilgrim, lips that they must use in prayer.
 ROMEO. Oh then, dear saint, let lips do what hands do.
 They pray. Grant thou, lest faith turn to despair.
 JULIET. Saints do not move, though grant for prayers' sake.
 ROMEO. Then move not while my prayer's effect I take.
 [He kisses her.]

SIR JOHN DAVIES (1569–1626)

from *Gulling Sonnets*⁴

3

What eagle can behold her sun-bright eye,
 Her sun-bright eye that lights the world with love,
 The world of Love wherein I live and die,
 I live and die and diverse changes prove,
 I changes prove, yet still the same am I,
 The same am I and never will remove,
 Never remove until my soul doth fly,
 My soul doth fly and I surcease to move,
 I cease to move which now am moved by you,
 Am moved by you that move all mortal hearts,
 All mortal hearts whose eyes your eyes doth view,
 Your eyes doth view whence Cupid shoots his darts,
 Whence Cupid shoots his darts and woundeth those
 That honor you, and never were his foes.
 —1594

JOHN DAVIES OF HEREFORD (1565–1618)

from The Scourge of Villany

The author loving these homely meats⁵ specially, viz:
 cream, pancakes, buttered pippin pies⁶ (laugh, good people) and tobacco; writ to that worthy and virtuous gentlewoman, whom he calleth mistress, as followeth:

⁴ Gulling Sonnets Davies's Gulling Sonnets, parodying the conventions and clichés of the sonnet form, circulated in manuscript.⁵ meats Foods, consumables; Davies, too, is writing parody.⁶ pippin pies Apple pies.

If there were, oh! an Hellespont¹ of cream
 Between us, milk-white mistress, I would swim
 To you, to show to both my love's extreme,
 Leander-like—yea! dive from brim to brim.
 5 But met I with a buttered pippin pie
 Floating upon't, that would I make my boat
 To waft me to you without jeopardy,
 Though sea-sick I might be while it did float.
 Yet if a storm should rise, by night or day,
 10 Of sugar-snows and hail of caraways,
 Then, if I found a pancake in my way,
 It like a plank should bring me to your quays;
 Which having found, if they tobacco kept,
 The smoke should dry me well before I slept.

RICHARD BARNFIELD (1574–1620)

Here, hold this glove (this milk-white cheverel^o glove) leather
 Not quaintly over-wrought with curious knots,
 Not decked^o with golden decorated
 spangs,^o nor silver spots, decorative metal
 Yet wholesome for thy hand as thou shalt prove.
 5 Ah no (sweet boy)² place this glove near thy heart,
 Wear it, and lodge it still within thy breast,
 So shalt thou make me (most unhappy) blest.
 So shalt thou rid my pain, and ease my smart:
 How can that be (perhaps) thou wilt reply,
 10 A glove is for the hand not for the heart,
 Nor can it well be proved by common art,
 Nor reason's rule. To this, thus answer I:
 If thou from glove dost take away the "g,"
 Then glove is love: and so I send it thee.
 —1595

¹ Hellespont Older name for the Dardanelles, the strait between European and Asian Turkey. The Leander of line 4 is the young man in classical legend who swam across the Hellespont to meet his mistress Hero.

² sweet boy Barnfield's sonnets are the only extant ones in Renaissance England, other than Shakespeare's, in which a male speaker addresses another man in a homoerotic manner.

 On whose fair front^o a poet's pen may write, forehead
 Whose roseate red excels the crimson grape,
 5 His love-enticing delicate soft limbs,
 Are rarely^o framed t' entrap poor gazing eyes: wonderfully
 His cheeks, the lily and carnation dyes
 With lovely tincture, which Apollo's dims.⁴
 His lips ripe strawberries in nectar wet,
 10 His mouth a hive, his tongue a honey-comb,
 Where muses (like bees) make their mansion.
 His teeth pure pearl in blushing coral set.
 Oh how can such a body sin-procuring,
 Be slow to love, and quick to hate, enduring?

GEORGE GASCOIGNE (1539–1578)

Gascoigne's Lullaby

Sing lullaby, as women do,
 Wherewith they bring their babes to rest,
 And lullaby can I sing too
 As womanly as can the best.
 5 With lullaby they still the child,
 And if I be not much beguiled,
 Full many wanton babes have I
 Which must be stilled with lullaby.
 First lullaby my youthful years,
 10 It is now time to go to bed,
 For crooked age and hoary hairs
 Have won the haven within my head:
 With lullaby then youth be still,
 With lullaby content thy will,
 15 Since courage quails, and comes behind,
 Go sleep, and so beguile thy mind.

³ ADONIS The young man beloved by the goddess Venus.

⁴ Apollo's dims God of the sun: the beloved's color "dims" even the sun.

Next lullaby my gazing eyes,
Which wonted were to glance apace.^o
For every glass may now suffice,
20 To show the furrows in my face:
With lullaby then wink awhile,
With lullaby your looks beguile:
Let no fair face, nor beauty bright,
Entice you eft^o with vain delight.

directly

25 And lullaby my wanton will,
Let reasons rule now reign thy thought,
Since all too late I find by skill,
How dear I have thy fancies bought.
With lullaby now take thine ease,
30 With lullaby thy doubts appease:
For trust to this, if thou be still,
My body shall obey thy will.

again

Eke^o lullaby my loving boy,
My little Robin¹ take thy rest,
35 Since age is cold, and nothing coy,
Keep close thy coin, for so is best:
With lullaby be thou content,
With lullaby thy lusts relent,
Let others pay which hath mo^o pence,
40 Thou art too poor for such expense.

also

Thus lullaby my youth, mine eyes,
My will, my ware, and all that was,
I can no mo delays devise,
But welcome pain, let pleasure pass:
45 With lullaby now take your leave,
With lullaby your dreams deceive,
And when you rise with waking eye,
Remember Gascoigne's lullaby.

ANONYMOUS²*Ode*³

*That time and absence proves*⁴
Rather helps than hurts to loves.

Absence, hear thou my protestation
Against thy strength,
Distance and length:

Do what you can for alteration,
5 For hearts of truest mettle
Absence doth join and time doth settle.

Who loves a mistress of such quality,
He soon hath found
Affection ground⁵

10 Beyond time, place, and all mortality;
To hearts that cannot vary,
Absence is present, time doth tarry.

My senses want^o their outward motions, lack
Which now within

15 Reason doth win,
Redoubled in her⁶ secret notions,
Like rich men that take pleasure
In hiding, more than handling, treasure.

By absence, this good means I gain:
20 That I can catch her,
Where none can watch her,

In some close corner of my brain.
There I embrace and kiss her,
And so I both enjoy and miss her.

—1611

⁴ That time and absence proves I.e., prove: a singular verb after a double subject was then common.

LITERATURE IN IRELAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES

Anthologies that endeavor to provide some sense of the literatures of Ireland and of Scotland and of Wales as well as of England tend to follow a similar pattern so far as the first three are concerned: to include significant representation of these literatures in the early medieval period, but then to allow them to drop almost entirely from view until the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The greatest classics of the Celtic literatures in the early medieval period—Táin Bó Cúailnge, the Mabinogion—often make an appearance, but the later medieval poet Dafydd ap Gwilym, for example, is usually omitted, despite being regarded by many as the most important Welsh poet of any era. If Dafydd deserves to be represented, so too do important late medieval poets such as Giolla Brighde Mac Con Midhe and Gofraidh Fionn Ó Dálaigh; and so too do important poets of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries such as Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn, Dáibhí Ó Bruadair, Piaras Feiritéar, and Aodhagán Ó Rathaille. So too do less canonical but highly interesting poets such as Isabel, Countess of Argyll. And so too do important prose works such as Geoffrey Keating's History of Ireland and Elis Gruffydd's Chronicle.

One thread above all—aside from a shared linguistic background—ties together the literatures of Ireland, Scotland, and Wales in the medieval era and the early part of the early modern period: the presence of a bardic tradition. A bard (Gaelic spelling) or bardd (Welsh spelling) was a poet and storyteller by profession; bards underwent long training in their art, and became adept at writing in a variety of genres, each with its own conventions as to meter and rhyme as well as appropriate subject matter and tone. Bards wrote elegies, eulogies and other praise poems, satires, and lyric poetry. They were well versed in history and legend, and were expected to be able to compose new work in these areas too (as well as to know and to be able to recite traditional works). Typically they worked for hire, under the patronage of a chief or nobleman—though during some eras they might move from place to place or compose work for more than one patron.

From the medieval into the early modern period in Ireland, of far more importance than the bards were the filid (singular: fili), poets who also had a role in spiritual, political, and educational matters. The system of filid had a complex hierarchical character; within the category of fili there were several sub-categories, with the highest, ollam, being accorded a status approximating that of a chieftain or king. The thirteenth century saw the rise of bardic schools, which taught traditional history and law as well as poetic technique; over the following centuries, the stature of bards increased and the duties of fili became more circumscribed, such that the position of bard and of fili became quite similar.

In Wales a pencerdd (lord of song, later a prydydd), who appears to have enjoyed a high status not far below that of an ollam in Ireland, was expected to offer praise poems to God and to the king (including, when necessary, his eulogy). The bard teulu (household bard, later called a teuluwr), who had official status at court, was tasked with performing for the queen and with entertaining the teulu (warband or household guard) with poems related to battle.

In all three of Ireland, Gaelic Scotland, and Wales the bardic traditions were eroded over the course of the late medieval era and the beginnings of the early modern period. Economic pressures, periodic depopulation (as a result of the Black Death, but also of numerous other factors), the decline of court-centered society, the adoption of new forms of schooling, the development of the printing press—all these played a role in the decline of bardic traditions.

In all three cultures the decline was certainly hastened by the periodic efforts of the English to bring Ireland, Gaelic Scotland, and Wales under their control. The invasion and partial conquest of Ireland in the late twelfth century had left Irish culture largely intact over the long run, as the conquerors adopted the culture of the conquered; the “Old English,” as the invaders came to be known, were before long speaking Gaelic as their first language. And Gaelic poets appeared to have no qualms about entering the service of the Anglo-Norman patrons; as Gofraidh Fionn Ó Dalaigh wrote, “In the poem for the foreigners we promise that the Irish will be driven from Ireland; in the poem for the Irish we promise that the foreigners will be scattered eastwards across the sea.”

The “New English”—the settlers who appropriated Irish land in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (following the “re-conquest” of Ireland that began under England’s Henry VIII in the 1530s)—were influenced by the local culture too, but not to anything like the same degree as their Anglo-Norman predecessors. They were slower than their predecessors to intermarry with the local population, they continued to speak English, they remained fiercely Protestant in a Catholic culture—and they made frequent efforts to impose the language and the religion of England on the Irish, as well as exerting political and economic control. In doing so, they proved themselves capable on many occasions of horrendous brutality. More than once in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries they resorted to purposeful mass starvation as a means of imposing control, and when Oliver Cromwell invaded to re-assert control of the island in 1649, the result was a drop in the Irish population that has been variously estimated by many to have been over 40% (whether as a direct result of battle or through war-related starvation and disease).

Scotland enjoyed greater independence than Ireland over these centuries—though Lowland (i.e., southern) Scotland came to be heavily influenced by English culture. (Middle Scots—the language of the poets known as the Scots Makars—developed largely out of Old English.) For Gaels in Scotland, the conflict of greatest importance was between the Stewart kings (who were not Gaels, but of predominantly French ancestry) and the Gaelic lords. In fact, one of the most damaging turns of events for the Gaelic peoples of Highland Scotland came at the hands of a Stewart—James VI, who also assumed the English crown as James I on the death of Elizabeth in 1603. James’s efforts to achieve full union between England and Scotland (which would have entailed abolishing the Scottish parliament and the Scottish legal system) were frustrated, but he succeeded in enacting the 1609 Statutes of Iona; among many other provisions, the statutes outlawed bards and required that Highland chiefs send their children to be educated in Lowland Scotland as Protestants.

Like Ireland, Wales also suffered invasion in multiple stages, beginning with the Anglo-Norman invasion in the later eleventh century; the English title “Prince of Wales” came into existence after the 1282 vanquishing of Llywelyn ap Gruffudd and the Welsh by Edward I of England. As in Ireland, Welsh culture largely resisted the English for several centuries, though there were significant changes. Notably, the structure of the bardic system altered. The most important patrons of the bards had been kings and princes—the rulers of the several independent kingdoms that had existed within the territory of Wales; hence the chief bards of pre-conquest Wales are often referred to as the “poets of the princes” (Beirdd y Tywysogion).¹ The independent kingdoms ceased to exist with the English conquest; the bards continued their art, but now under different sorts of patrons—the Church, and even more frequently as time went on, wealthy landowners. The “poets of the gentry” (Cywyddwyr or Beirdd yr Uchelwyr) who dominated Welsh literature between roughly 1300 and 1600 inclined less towards praise poems of the old sort and more towards poems on the themes of nature and of love (including many poems dealing with sexual themes in a strikingly direct fashion)—as well as more humorous poems. New forms developed as well—perhaps most notably the cywydd, in which seven-syllable lines are rhymed, but with the rhyme alternately falling on stressed and unstressed syllables. Also around this time, cynghanedd (chiming), a system of patterns of alliteration and internal rhyme, became solidified.

Among the “poets of the gentry” Dafydd ap Gwilym stands out not only for the quality of his verse but also for his good humor in virtually all circumstances; one would never imagine from reading his poetry that life in Wales in the fourteenth century, though its politics were relatively calm, was characterized by economic hardship, insecurity, and plague. The fifteenth century, on the other hand, was a time of frequent rebellion against the English, and fifteenth-century poets such as Guto’r Glyn and Lewis Glyn Cothi gave open expression to that discontent, condemning both the English invaders and those among the gentry who collaborated with them. Poets of the fifteenth century were far less positive in other ways as well; it would be difficult to imagine a poem further in tone from the sunny humor of Dafydd’s verse than Siôn Cent’s “The Illusion of the World,” with which this section of the anthology concludes.

By the late sixteenth century, when the literary Renaissance in England was entering full flower, the same could hardly be said of Ireland, Scotland, or Wales; in his Defense of Poesy, Sir Philip Sidney largely relies on the past tense when he speaks in 1596 of the bardic tradition:

In Wales, the true remnant of the ancient Britons, there are good authorities to show the long time they had poets, which they called bards; so through all the conquests of Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, some of whom did seek to ruin all memory of learning among them, yet do their poets to this day, last; so as it is not more notable in soon beginning than in long continuing.

The great Welsh—and Irish, and Scottish—traditions from the twelfth through fifteenth centuries were indeed still alive at the end of the sixteenth century, but many of them only barely so. Arguably, Celtic literary culture had enjoyed a Renaissance much earlier than the English Renaissance of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.

IRELAND AND SCOTLAND

GOFRAIDH FIONN Ó DÁLAIGH (D. 1387)

One of the best-known Irish bardic poets, Gofraidh Fionn (Geoffrey the Fair) held the post of Chief Ollam of Ireland, which may be loosely translated as “great poet of Ireland”; the post of Chief Ollam carried with it far more prestige and cultural authority than do roles such as “poet laureate” today. The 73-stanza poem of praise and exhortation that is excerpted below is in the late medieval tradition of eulogy, or praise poetry; it may give some sense as well of Irish society during this period. “Domhnall,” to whom the poem is addressed, was Domhnall Og Mag Carthaigh of Kerry. The English controlled portions of south-eastern Ireland through much of the late medieval period; Irish forces under chiefs such as Domhnall had been pushed to the west into Kerry, but made frequent efforts to re-take the lost land.

from *To Domhnall*¹ (“Domhnall Og”)

Be our guide, O Domhnall, thou who soothest all affliction.
We long for guidance through Banbha.²
March before us, O prince

- 5 Lead not to West or South
this great host setting forth.
Better lead us North-East,
thou salmon of Eas Ruaidh.³

¹ To Domhnall Translated by Lambert McKenna; first published in the Irish Monthly, 1919.

² Banbha I.e., Ireland. Banbha was a patron goddess of Ireland, and her name came to be often used as synonymous with the island itself.

³ Eas Ruaidh Waterfall traditionally considered to be one of the three greatest in Ireland and known for the large population of salmon who leapt up the waterfall in spawning season. In some versions of an Irish myth, the hero Fionn mac Cumhaill caught a magic salmon in the falls.

10 Lead us forward to the East,
O Domhnall son of Mág Carthaigh, to Corc's¹ bright-horned castle-lawn,
the bright famous blue fort.

15 O Son of Cormac, fresh of hue, lead the Eoghanacht of Caiseal
to that land not 'neath them now; stretch forth to thy old country.

A challenge to thee are the foreigners' houses on the place of Pádraig's² tent.
Fight thy foes' hosts for the castle
20 bequeathed by us to that saint.

Thou art heir to Corc of Caiseal
by whom that castle was built.
The entering of its lord therein
—not by securer right stood Corc there!

25 Why would'st thou not follow Corc?
Thy land mourns thy exile.
Corc held that fortress whence he was called Caiseal-Corc.

30 Thine at length, O Domhnall, shall Caiseal be, a fence against oppression!
No man can gainsay thee
—by thy folk 'twas first held.

O Domhnall of the noble-browed eyes,
the saints' prophecies state
35 that in the East shall be thy home.
From the East came ye at first.

40 That smooth fair-treed fort,
Caiseal of Corc son of Lughaidh, thoughtlessly you left; and drank
a draught that made you forget it!

¹ Corc Corc of Caiseal, legendary founder of the Eoghanachta, an important Irish dynasty that had been extremely powerful in southern Ireland, with its seat of power in Cashel (Caiseal). Though its strength was greatly reduced beginning in the tenth century, and in the mid-fourteenth century Cashel was under English control, the Eoghanachta survived in a line of kings that included Domhnall.

² Pádraig Saint Patrick.

For those lands thy folk left the hills around Caiseal.
Twas wrong to prefer wild glens,
to exchange wine for small ale!

45 O generous-hearted Domhnall Óg, thou hast two causes for change:
Better the fruits of the land you abandoned,
And 'tis shame to cleave to chill rocks!

50 Strange to ever depart from those seventeen tuaths,³
the fair fields of royal Caiseal, lands not to be despised!

Lead us back the same road,
O curly-haired strong-armed hero.
55 Too long our absence from our country,
Great our misery to miss it!

From here to Sliabh gCrot⁴
'tis all a sea storm-swollen of foreigners, O prince of the Eirne.⁵
60 May God quell it before thee!

Moses' passage through the waters,⁶ as he brought home his host,
when the Red Sea ebbed before them,
—with his host were comparison fit!

65 The folk of Moses, Amram's son
O prince of Banbha, were long in duress far from their home till he delivered them!

³ tuaths Areas of land. The Old Irish term tuath was used to refer both to the land and to its inhabitants.

⁴ Sliabh gCrot Mountain near Cashel.

⁵ Eirne River featuring the Eas Ruaidh.

⁶ Moses ... waters The story of Moses leading the Israelites out of Egyptian slavery (recounted in the biblical book of Exodus) was a frequent reference point in literature that pointed hopefully towards the Irish throwing off the yoke of English control.

70 For a weary length was Israel's race in duress in Egypt.
Till the end of their woe and captivity long drawn out was their misery.

Through God's power that goodly host was saved by Moses.
75 Than their deliverance from exile no folk ever got greater blessing!

For saving Israel's race
Moses is now in Jesus' home.
For freeing them from slavery
80 he has won from God his own freedom.
...

Of the West of Banbha leave to each lord his ancestral domain.
Extend thy sway to Caiseal,
fair gentle well-watered hill.

85 Lead O Domhnall of Dún Inbhir thy chiefs and their departing folk into that fair festive plain yew-clad, swan-haunted, lovely!

90 Passing Ciarraidhe¹ on the South, through leafy-forted Magh Coinchinn
by Luachair of Síol Deadhaidh of fair banks and blue streams,

into I Chonaill Gabhra
thy warrior bands shall go,
95 then across Claonghlais and the Daol on whose stream are white swans;

to high Dún Eochair Máighe
to the centre of lovely Mumha

—swift onset to be ever famous!
100 to the Máigh of the famous yew;
...

At the rock of royal Caiseal thou shalt put away their troubles when the seventeen tuaths
view from it their true land.

105 Set each chief in his own land of the tuaths of smooth-built Caiseal.
Let each chief's house be set on the dwelling-spot of his sires.

In the fort of stout-lanced Caiseal
110 establish thyself, guarding it from harm
—the fort we ne'er should have left,
Mayst thou enjoy it, O Domhnall!

Thine by right is thy sires' steading;
therefore must thou go to Caiseal.
115 Bravest thy valour on every hill.
Thee must we ever trust!
...

ISABEL, COUNTESS OF ARGYLL (ISEABAIL NÍ MHEIC CAILEIN) (B. 1437)

The official status of bardic poet was a male preserve, but at least a few women evidently wrote classical poetry in the bardic style. Notable among them is the Countess of Argyll (Gaelic: Iseabail Ní Mheic Cailein); unfortunately, nothing of her work beyond a few courtly love poems has survived. We know little of Isabel; she appears to have been either the wife or the daughter of Colin Campbell, 1st Earl of Argyll, and is said to have had eight children herself.

¹ Ciarraidhe The progression of place names in the following three stanzas suggests a movement eastward from Kerry toward Cashel.

Atá Fleasgach Ar Mo Thí

A tá fleasgach ar mo thí,
a Rí na ríogh go rí leis!
a bheith sínte ré mo bhroinn
agus a choim ré mo chneis:

5 Dá mbeith gach ní mar mo mhian, ní bhiadh cian eadrainn go bráth,
gé beag sin dá chur I gcéill,
's nach tuigean sé féin, mar tá.

10 Acht ní éadtrom gan a luíng, sgéal as truaighe linn 'nar ndís:
esan soir is mise siar,
mar nach dtig ar riar a rís.

Is Mairg Dá Ngalar An Grádh

I s mairg dá ngalar an grádh,
gé bé fáth fá n-abrainn é;
deacair sgarachtainn ré pháirt;
truagh an cás i bhfeilim féin.

5 An grádh-soin tугas gan fhios, ó's é mo leas gan a luadh,
mara bhfaigh mé furtacht tráth,
biaidh mo bhláth go tana truagh.

10 An fear-soin dá dtugas grádh,
's nach féadtar a rádh ós n-aird,
dá gcuireadh sé mise i bpéin,
gomadh dó féin bhus céad mairg.

There's a Young Man in Pursuit of Me¹

There's a young man in pursuit of me,
Oh King of Kings, may he have success!
Would he were stretched out by my side
with his body pressing against my breast!

5 If everything were as I would wish,
no distance would ever cause a separation,
though that is all too little to say with him not yet knowing the situation.

10 But it isn't easy if his ship doesn't come,
for the two of us it's a wretched matter:
he is East and I am West,
so what we desire can never again happen.

Woe to the One Whose Sickness Is Love

Woe to the one whose sickness is love,
no matter the grounds I might present,
hard it is to get free of its hold,
sorry the lot I have myself.

5 That love I have given in secret,
it being better not to declare it,
unless I find relief before long,
my flowering will grow wan, withered, and wretched.

10 That man to whom I have given love,
(this should not be said out loud)
if he should ever cause me hurt, may he suffer a hundred times the woe.

¹ There's a Young Man in Pursuit of Me Both the Gaelic text and the English translations of this and the following poem are from An Anthology of Scottish Women Poets, ed. Catherine Kerrigan, translations by Meg Bateman.

(alternative translation)¹

Pity whose complaint is love,
Whate'er my reason thus to speak,
'Tis hard to separate from its object,
Sad's the condition I am in.
5 The love which I in secret gave,
Of which I'd better never speak,
Unless I quickly get relief,
Withered and thin I'll soon become.
The man whom I have so loved,
10 A love I never must confess;
Has me put in lasting bonds,
For me a hundred times 'tis pity.

ANONYMOUS

Though its authorship is uncertain, the elegy below is often attributed to Marion Campbell, wife of Gregor MacGregor (Griogair Ruadh), who in the 1560s was the young leader of the MacGregor clan. The Campbell and MacGregor clans had been allies before this time, and marriages such this one between a Campbell and a MacGregor were not uncommon. In 1562, however, a bitter feud between the two groups broke out after Grey Colin of the Campbell clan refused to recognize Gregor MacGregor's claims to certain lands. The MacGregors under Gregor responded aggressively, seizing Campbell lands on Loch Tay and killing several Campbells. The feud continued with sporadic violence until Gregor's capture on 1 August 1569; he was tried and convicted, then executed on 7 April 1570. Marion Campbell is believed to have been present at her husband's beheading. The Campbell and MacGregor clans ended their feud late that same year, but the MacGregors continued to be involved in violent controversies over disputed lands through the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Scottish monarchs generally sided against the MacGregors; in the early sixteenth century James I banned the use of the MacGregor name, and in the mid seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries many MacGregors fled to Ireland and to North America. (Meanwhile, the Campbells acquired the role of government agents among the clans, and in 1691 were used by King William to carry out the infamous Massacre of Glencoe, in which dozens of members of the MacDonald clan were killed for hesitating to swear allegiance to the king.)

Lament for MacGregor of Glenstrae, who was beheaded in 1570²

Early on Lammas³ morning
I was sporting with my love, but before noon came upon us
my heart had been crushed.

5 Alas, alas, alas and alack,
sore is my heart, my child,
alas, alas, alas and alack,
your father won't hear our cries.

A curse on nobles and relations
10 who brought me to this grief, who came on my love unawares
and took him by deceit.⁴

Had there been twelve of his kindred and my Gregor at their head, 15 my eye would not be weeping
nor my child without a friend.

They put his head on an oaken block and spilled his blood on the ground,

² Lament for MacGregor of Glenstrae, who was beheaded in 1570 The present translation, by Meg Bateman, is from An Anthology of Scottish Women Poets, ed. Catherine Kerrigan. As the editor notes, it is impossible to be sure whether or not a poem such as this, written from a woman's point of view but of unknown authorship, was written by a woman or a man.

³ Lammas Harvest festival; Lammas Day is celebrated on 1 August.

⁴ by deceit It is not known by what means the Campbells managed to capture Gregor.

20 if I had had a cup there
I'd have drunk my fill down.¹

A pity my father was not diseased and Grey Colin stricken with plague, even though Ruthven's daughter² would wring her hands dismayed.

25 I'd put Grey Colin under lock and key and Black Duncan³ in heavy irons, and every Campbell in Taymouth⁴
I'd set to wearing chains.

30 I reached the lawn of Taymouth
but for me that was no balm,
I left no hair on my head unpulled
nor skin upon my palms.

35 If only I had the flight of the lark with Gregor's strength in my arm, the highest stone in the castle
would be the closest to the ground.

40 Though now I'm left without apples and the others have them all,
my apple is fair and fragrant
with the back of his head on the mould.

Though others' wives are safe at home
lying sound asleep,
I am at the edge of your grave beating my hands in grief.

45 I'd far rather be with Gregor
roaming moor and copse

than be with the niggardly Baron of Dull⁵
in a house of lime and stone.

50 I'd far rather be with Gregor driving the cattle to the glen than be with the niggardly Baron of Dull drinking beer and wine.

I'd far rather be with Gregor
under a rough hairy skin⁶
55 than be with the niggardly Baron of Dull
dressed in satin and silk.

60 Even on a day of driving snow
when the seven elements reel
Gregor would find me a little hollow where we would snugly sleep.

Ba hu, ba hu, little waif,⁷ you are still only young,
but the day when you revenge your father
I fear will never come.

—LATE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

TADHG DALL Ó hUIGINN (1550–91)

The best-known of a long family line of poets, Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn wrote in a variety of different genres and (as was the case with most bardic poets by the sixteenth century), in praise of a variety of noblemen. The forty-odd poems attributed to him include humorous poems, elegies, satires, and battle poems (notable among them "The Battle of Drumleene" and "Brian na Murratha," which calls on one Irish lord to vanquish "the Saxon tribe ... so that from the proclamation of war there

¹ if I ... fill down Blood-drinking as a metaphor for women's grief is commonplace in this genre of poetry, called lament or "keening" (caoineadh). It is unclear whether mourning women actually drank blood or whether such references are purely symbolic.

² Ruthven's daughter Kate Ruthven, Grey Colin's wife.

³ Black Duncan Grey Colin's eldest son.

⁴ Taymouth Taymouth (and Taymouth Castle) was home to the Campbell clan.

⁵ with the ... Dull I.e., with some stingy, boring nobleman. The village and parish of Dull are located in the Scottish county of Perth.

⁶ a rough hairy skin It was common practice among the peasantry to sleep under animal skins.

⁷ Ba hu ... waif This verse, which reveals the poem to be a lullaby, offers a twist on literary tradition; many bardic poems were couched as lullabies from the outset, praising the deeds of the future chief still in the cradle.

will never be any save Irishmen" in Ireland). The "Dall" in Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn translates as "blind," and it has often been taken to mean that the poet was indeed either partially or entirely blind, though there is no evidence for that other than his name.

Until the stars of heaven be numbered, or the great sands of the sea, it will not be possible to recount the evil deeds wrought on the brightly foliaged hill with its ancient fields.

5 Six royal battles 'ere now have been waged around the fair hill of Foyle,² by the sluggish stream, without recording any petty fray.

In short, this is the seventh battle, this mighty conflict of tomorrow, that the champion of Ulster's³ land will 10 wage upon this mound of which ye have heard.

It is he, moreover, who will give battle, Hugh, son of Manus, of Tara's⁴ rampart; the cheery and ruddy of countenance, that is most wont to triumph over the foe.

15 This great battle of the morrow is the grievous, destructive plague which has set the four elements trembling throughout the spacious Rampart of Lughaidh.⁵

¹ The Battle of Drumleene Translated by Eleanor Knott. The battle that gives the poem its title has not yet occurred; the structure of the work is to recount the history of six previous Irish battles, taking poetic license to describe them as having been waged on the site, as inspiration for the expected battle to come. Drumleene is in the northwest of Ireland.

² hill of Foyle Drumleene is located near the River Foyle.

³ Ulster Northernmost of the four provinces into which Ireland is traditionally divided.

⁵ Lughaidh Probably a literary name for Ireland, which is sometimes called "the land of Lughaidh."

That is what has made flaming folds of the hills of the world, and sent the waves through the forest thickets in mighty masses of flame.

20 The spurting fires of heaven, a presage of conflict, have appeared, with the great maned star in a wondrous, warlike array.

The sepulchred dead will be struggling and contending, throughout Fál's⁶ plain the corpses are quickening, in 25 expectancy of the extraordinary evil.

Throughout the delightful expanses of the Field of the Fair the beasts of Banbha's⁷ plain are uttering intelligent speech, simultaneously proclaiming the woes of Ireland.

Brutes are brought forth in human shape, and men in 30 the form of brutes, many a monster has that created throughout the dyked meadow of Cobhthach.⁸

The ravenous fury of battle is inciting the great chief, passing over the isles of Ireland with crimson tresses about her head.

35 Until morn come, the phantom women of faery, the wolves and wild animals, will utter presage of the coming battle to the host of Macha.⁹

Many this night, throughout both armies, will be the spectres, ghosts and apparitions around the spoiler of 40 Banbha's castles.

Many a soldier in the camp of the warrior of Bregia¹⁰ will have had his shield on his wrist since the night before; many the long fingers looped around javelins, hands clasped about swordhilts.

⁶ Fál Literary name for Ireland.

⁷ Banbha Goddess both of fertility and of war. Banbha came to be regarded as patron goddess of Ireland; here, her name is used as synonymous with the island itself.

⁸ meadow of Cobhthach I.e., Ireland.

⁹ host of Macha I.e., the host of Ulster; the phrase references Emain Macha, the ancient seat of Ulster's kings.

¹⁰ Bregia Location of Tara.

45 In the morn betimes¹ there will be many a meal consumed without comfort, warriors whetting their keen weapons, shrieks of scaldcrows and ravens.

Most horrifying, then, will be the clang of the clashing spears, the whistle of their sharp blades with dripping
50 points, the harsh calling of their ivory horns.

Piteous, at the same time, will be the bellowing of the gaping brutes, the voices of the wolves from the heights of Banbha, the fluttering of strange banners.

Betimes tomorrow morn the blue assembly mound of 55 Cruachán,² the woeful ridgepole of all slaughter, will be a clamorous hillock.

The battle of tomorrow morning will be gained, as is wont, by the keen-eyed host from Teach Truim and the stately race of Conall.³ ...

*Enniskillen*⁴

Located in what is now County Fermanagh in Northern Ireland, Enniskillen Castle was in the late seventeenth century held by Cú Chonnacht, the wealthy and powerful Lord of Fermanagh. Cú Chonnacht often received support from the English government in his conflicts with other Irish lords and—no doubt in part because of his great wealth—attracted the attention of numerous poets. The poem below was included in a duanaire (song-book) that brought together twenty-four praise-poems, written by eleven different poets. “Enniskillen,” a poem that

² Cruachán Another name for Drumleene.

³ Teach Truim Probably Tara; Conall Conall Gulban, fifth-century king who founded the kingdom of Tyrconnell in northwestern Ireland.

⁴ Enniskillen The present text is based on the early twentieth-century translation by Eleanor Knott; the language has been revised and modernized for this anthology. The translation does not attempt to replicate the meter or rhyme scheme of the original, in which each stanza comprises four lines, with the second and fourth of these rhyming.

lauds the castle and all it represents rather than praising its lord (or his son) directly, is unusual in its tone as well as its content.

Alas for him who looks on Enniskillen, the gleaming water of its bays, the music of its waterfalls. To look on it is perilous for us; like a shining sword its brightness hurts our eyes, but we cannot turn away.

5 Long 'ere I came to the white-walled rampart amongst the blue hills, I thought that if I reached that house I should lack nothing.

I heard, alas for me that heard it, such repute of the fairy castle of surpassing treasure, and how my beguilement 10 was in store, that it was impossible to turn me back from it.

This was what each one said of the splendid dwelling of the lion of the Erne⁵—never in Banbha⁶ had there been a dwelling to equal it.

15 They used to say too that whoever would see the bending wood or the verdant slope, the level beach or the green field, would never walk away from it.

Once I had heard it described, I could see no other vision whenever I slept, but only the spacious splendor 20 of this noble dwelling.

I proceed on my way, I reach Enniskillen of the overhanging oaks. Through the fair field of bending, fruit-laden branches I did not hesitate to approach.

As I neared the place I was startled at the tumult; the 25 baying of lively hounds and hunting-dogs driving deer from the wood for hunters.

A space beyond the court, on a fairy-like bay of murmuring water, was so crowded with groves of tapering ship-masts that you could hardly make out the 30 waves on the shore.

⁵ Erne River near which Enniskillen is located.

⁶ Banbha Literary term for Ireland. It refers to the goddess Banbha, patron goddess of Ireland and goddess of fertility and war.

And hard by the enclosed courtyard I see a lovely plain of golden radiance, the grounds of the bright-hued castle, glistening with dew, the soil of Heaven, or else its very likeness.

35 Then I reached the green of the castle grounds—soil upturned by the hooves of steeds; no plant could compete with the horses as they pranced on the ground of the courtyard.

40 The horses of the castle raced against each other; I see them coursing one by one, the hills around all hidden as if by mist, the dust from thundering steeds.

I make directly for the fortress of the Lia;¹ wondrous were the people I found within the walls of the fair mansion.

45 I found the nobles of the race of Colla² handing out treasure in the thronged court, and among them were those who could show you the mysteries from the beginnings of the Grecian Gaels.³

50 And throughout the fortress I found plenty of poets and minstrels, filling the place from one bright, white wall to the other—happy the dwelling in which they find room!

In other rooms were slender-lipped, satin-clad maidens,
I found many of them, weaving wondrous golden fringe, the castle with fair, sleek hounds.

55 All through the house there are warriors, against every wall; sharp-edged weapons hang over each fighter, warriors of fruitful Druim Caoin.⁴

¹ Lia Possibly a reference to the Lia Fáil or “Stone of Destiny” at Tara, which would shriek when the rightful king stood on it.

² Colla According to Irish legend, Colla Uais (one of three brothers named Colla) was king of all Ireland in the fourth century; his brother, Colla da Crioich, was considered a distant ancestor of Cú Chonnacht.

³ beginnings ... Grecian Gaels Legend traced the beginnings of Gaelic settlement in the British Isles to a Greek general, Galethus, who lived in the era of Moses.

⁴ Druim Caoin Another name for the Hill of Tara. According to legend, Tara was the site of the court of the ancient high kings of Ireland, who ruled over the whole island; though it is unlikely that

On the battlements of the bright, wooded rampart a mighty band of elfin youth, whether from the fairy-mound of Bodhbh or from Ler’s Hostel,⁵ the eye dared not see for the brightness of their splendour.

60 A company of artificers making vessels, a company of smiths making weapons; a company of wrights from their different lands work upon her—fair gem of 65 babbling streams.

Dyeing of cloth, polishing of blades, fitting of spearheads on spears, exercising of horses; negotiating over captives, drawing up of conditions, scholars surveying the list of kings.

70 Taking of hostages, releasing of hostages; healing of warriors, wounding of warriors; continual bringing in and giving out of treasure at the wondrous, smooth-walled castle.

75 Part of that day they talked of exploits, telling and thinking of battles; and time would be spent by the men of Ushnagh⁶ in feasting, hearing music.

The whole fair day until supper we spent in the bright, grassy courtyard; just one hour in length did that whole day seem to us.

80 All began to seat themselves, smooth places in the great hall; in hardly any meeting place would you see a throng to equal them.

Cú Chonnacht Óg, son of Cú Chonnacht, supple form to which smoke clings—when all in that great hall are 85 seated he seats himself on his royal chair.

I sat on the right hand of the champion of Tara until the circling of goblets had ended; many nobles paid court to the king, but his elbow never disdained me.

anykings actually had such extensive power, the site has retained its importance as both a mythological and a political symbol.

⁵ Bodhbh ... Hostel In the legend of The Children of Ler, Bodhbh and Ler were rivals who made peace with each other.

⁶ Ushnagh Traditionally considered the center of Ireland, where the four ancient provinces meet.

90 In a while it came time for those in the castle to take their rest; beds of down were prepared for the noblest among those who were gathered there, well-mannered.

Before the day could overtake them, a band of warriors were fitting spears; at daybreak horses shod, men rounding up their horses.

95 Shortly after sleep I see, gathered around the hawk of Síoth Truim,¹ chosen warriors in battle gear, standing in the bright stone castle courtyard.

100 Ere morning came the brave youths of the king's court set out, left us; a great, long, dense column, spear-armed, no thoughts of making peace.

It was not long until they returned to us, golden men of Colla, after victories everywhere; happy the kingdom that is their homeland.

105 That day around Loch Erne there is many a stranger woman whose husband is no more; and the figures of many wounded hostages are coming in after the conflict.

110 Precious treasures there were in that dwelling, which had not been there at the beginning of day; and hard by the place there were cattle which had not been near the night before.

Then were the poets of the castle rewarded by Eachaidh's descendant,² who never shrank from combat:

115 their verses he paid for had caused small harm; riches had been got beyond what he allowed to them.

I sought to take leave of Maguire,³ I and other scholars who were there; away from the lofty, bright castle, alas, he allowed me to go.

120 Tears flowed down his cheek when he parted from me, that warrior said he would not part from me for good,
though I might travel far away from him.

I remember that the day I turned my back on the household of the king's dwelling, such sorrow lay upon them all that the grief of any one of them was not 125 separate from the grief of others.

I am none the better now for losing that household.
Would I had reached the end of my days; I would not wish long life after they have gone, I fear I shall survive too long.

130 Never have I heard of a household so noble as that in the castle—how splendid!—under any that sprung from Colla; so every poet will pronounce.

135 Castle of the bright lawns, that none ever leaves of his own free will; men are lured to that place from every quarter—alas for him who looks on Enniskillen.

¹ Síoth Truim Fairy mound (side) that is identified variously as the birth-place or burial-place of the ancient hero Cú Chulainn. Its mention here invites a comparison between Cú Chulainn and Cú Chonnacht.

² Eachaidh's descendant I.e., Cú Chonnacht; Eachaidh Doimhlen was the father of the three Collas to which Cú Chonnacht traced his descent.

³ Maguire I.e., Cú Chonnacht; Maguire was the name of his dynasty.

*A Satire*¹

Among the subgenres of bardic poetry is der (Welsh: dychan)—usually translated as satire. Many poems in this tradition, however, are more poems of defamation or direct insult (or simply poems expressing negative or pessimistic views) than they are what we would today term satire. The spirit of such verse may seem relatively harmless, but it was not always taken to be such; the satire below, written against six visitors who are accused of having taken advantage of the poet's generosity to them, is a notable case in point. The response of members of the O'Hara (Gaelic: Ó hEadhra) family he had lampooned was, according to different versions of the story, either to cut out his tongue or to murder as well as mutilate him; it is believed that he is the "Teige Dall O Higgen" who was (along with his wife and one of his children) reported to have been murdered in 1591 by members of the Ó hEadhra family.

A troop of six that came to my house, I shall give a description of them; scarce of milk was I the next morning, from the thirst of the six vagabonds.

5 It's been a long time, seemingly, since a bit of cow's produce had entered their bodies, the twice three whom I have mentioned.

I was able—'tis a pity—to bring them from death to life; they must needs drink my milk, so great was their thirst from the dry bread.

10 I in want, and they in necessity—I am in a strait between the two; it is hard for me to repress these verses, yet is it sinful for me to make them.

15 It is best not to conceal the satire if any deserve censure; since I satirized the troop of six it is unfitting not to tell it.

The first that I saw, he was the best equipped of the band, a youth whose vest was not worth more than a groat; one whom feasting or gaming never impoverished.

20 The second man, as I found, coming in front of the company, was a miserable fellow whose marrow had gone from him, I shall not leave him out of the reckoning.

25 The weapons of the third wretch were an old javelin and an untempered, gapped² ax; were he and his makings-of-an-ax in an encounter, I pity one with such a battle-equipment.

30 The equipment of the fourth fellow who marched with them? Four shafts,³ that never knocked a splinter out of target, were slung across his rear end.

At the heels of the four others comes the fifth rogue, in a short smock not worth a groat; I do not think his mantle was any better.

35 The appearance of the last one, a fellow not worth a fleshworm⁴ was along the lines of the other five; a gaunt, pale fellow, he was a poor commodity on inspection.

I beseech God who shed His blood, since it is but decay for them to be alive—it is scarcely to be called living—that none may slay the troop of six.

¹ A Satire Translated by Eleanor Knott; the English has been slightly modernized for this anthology.

² untempered Tempered metal has been subjected to a process of repeated heating that makes the metal stronger and more resilient as a weapon; gapped With a notched, unsharpened blade.

³ shafts Arrows.

⁴ fleshworm Maggot.

GEOFFREY KEATING (SÉATHRÚN CÉITINN)
(c 1569–1644)

Irish poet, historian, priest, and theologian, Geoffrey Keating (Gaelic: Séathrún Céitinn) was one of the most significant Irish authors of his time. Born in Tipperary to a family of “old English” (i.e., Anglo-Norman) ancestry, Keating is believed to have been educated first at a bardic school in Tipperary; he then lived overseas (in Rheims and later Bordeaux) for many years, and did not return to Ireland until c. 1610. He then seems to have been active as a priest in the area of Tipperary for some years. According to legend, he also spent some years in hiding from the English authorities, though it is not clear when that may have occurred, or whether he spent another period abroad. He must have lived for much of the 1620s and early 1630s in a center with a good library; it would not otherwise have been possible for him to write his major work, Foras Feasa ar Éirinn (History of Ireland, completed c. 1634). That work is a history of Ireland from the Creation to the Anglo-Norman conquest. It is a history with a particular focus on invasions—Geoffrey was clearly keen to examine all historical precedents, real or imagined, for outsiders invading Ireland. One of the work’s literary models is evidently the Bible, and Keating wrote it in the tradition of Lebor Gabála Éirenn (The Book of the Taking of Ireland), which extends and reconciles Biblical chronology with the mythology of Ireland’s settlement. The English authorities did not allow the work to be printed, but it circulated widely in manuscript, and was published in Latin translation in 1660; it came to be regarded as a foundational work of Irish history.

*O Woman Full of Wiles*¹
(A bhean lán de stuaim)

O woman full of wiles
Take your hand away from there

I can’t do what you want
Though sick with love we are.

5 My hair has fallen out
My blood has turned to dust
My body’s lost its youth
Is it after this you lust?

Don’t think that I’ve gone daft
10 Or toss your head again,
Our loving must be chaste
O slender fairy one.

Take your mouth away from mine
For I pity you your plight—
15 When your skin rubs on mine
The heat sets us alight.

Your lovely curly hair,
Your dew-bright green eyes
Your flower-white rounded breasts
20 Only my eyes can please.

My body can’t speak the words
Yours hears beneath the quilt—
All else I’ll do for love
O woman full of wiles.

25 O fair lady, so gentle, accomplished, refined,
With cascading hair flowing down in ringlets and curls;
I cannot look at you without suddenly catching my breath
You must give me up, however hard it may be.

I swear that if all the rest were drowned in the flood 30 That Venus let down when she shook out her wet hair,
You are the one I would want to be left with me,
To enjoy forever your fingers, your figure, your breasts.

*Bear with Thee, O Letter, My Blessing*¹
(Mo bheannácht leat a sgríbhinn)

Forced by fraud and by Saxon oppression
Beyond its green border to rest;
Bear with thee, O letter, my blessing
For the beautiful isle of the west.

5 To the nobles who cherish the bard,
Bear with thee my grateful farewell,
And my peace be thy clergy's reward—
Not laws that proscribe and expel.

To thy valleys, thy fields, and thy hills
10 My heart sends a thousand farewells.
To thy smooth lakes and swift rushing rills,
To thy mountains—their crags and their dells.

Farewell to the fruits of your trees,
Farewell to your murmuring streams
15 That give a sweet voice to the breeze,
Like the song of the women of tears.

Dear island—may plenty be always thine,
May the sky that is o'er thee be calm,
Thy mornings with dew freshly shine
20 And thy evenings breathe only of balm.

Holy isle—though within thee now dwell
False traitors to God, as to me,
Take my blessing—my fondest farewell—
Across the broad waves of the sea.

¹ Bear with Thee, O Letter, My Blessing The present text is a lightly modernized version of the translation by T. Crofton Croker (originally published in Fraser's Magazine No. 7, August 1830, reprinted in Croker, ed., Specimens of the Keen of the South of Ireland as Illustrative of Irish Political and Domestic History). Though Keating did not give the poem any title other than “Mo bheannácht leat a sgríbhinn,” Croker gives it the title “The Exile's Farewell”; others have sometimes given it the title “Farewell to Ireland.”

*On the Miseries of Ireland*² (On sgeoil do chradh Magh Fail ni chodlaim oidhche)

The news I hear from distant Erin³
Destroys my peace and breaks my sleep:
Fresh chains and fetters for her wearing
Are forged, and she must wear and weep.

...

5 Strong armed soldiers boldly seize on
Every chieftain's hall—his ancient home;
If sword be drawn 'tis death or treason—
Outlawed the rightful lord must roam.

...

Be still, be still, my heart's high pounding,
10 Gone is the race of Eògan Mòr;⁴
Vanquished spirits now are found in
My country—all her pride is over.

Oh! to the strangers this is glory
But shame it is for me to sing:
15 Now all the fame of Finnian's story⁵
Is bubble-like—an empty thing.

Oh that my voice could rouse each valley,
Then would I make its children free!
Oh that mine eyes could see them rally—
20 But that my eyes shall never see.

² On the Miseries of Ireland The present text is a lightly modernized version of the translation by T. Crofton Croker (originally published in Fraser's Magazine, No. 7, August 1830, reprinted in Croker, ed., Specimens of the Keen of the South of Ireland as Illustrative of Irish Political and Domestic History). The excerpts below comprise approximately one third of the full poem, which bears the Gaelic title “On sgeoil do chradh Magh Fail ni chodlaim oidhche.”

⁴ Eògan Mòr Second-century CE king of Munster, celebrated for his many victories in battle, and often said to possess supernatural powers.

⁵ Finnian's story Saint Finnian of Clonard (470–549) was one of the most important founding figures of the Irish church.

from *History of Ireland*¹
(Foras Feasa ar Éirinn)

from "THE AUTHOR TO THE READER"

I

Whosoever proposes to trace and follow up the ancient history and origin of any country ought to determine on setting down plainly the method which reveals most clearly the truth of the state of the country, and the condition of the people who inhabit it: and forasmuch as I have undertaken to investigate the groundwork of Irish historical knowledge, I have thought at the outset of deploring some part of her affliction and of her unequal contest; especially the unfairness which continues to be practised on her inhabitants, alike the old foreigners² who are in possession more than four hundred years from the Norman invasion down, as well as the native Irish³ who have had possession during almost three thousand years. For there is no historian of all those who have written on Ireland from that epoch that has not continuously sought to cast reproach and blame both on the old foreign settlers and on the native Irish.

Whereof the testimony given by Cambrensis, Spenser, Stanihurst, Hanmer, Camden, Barckly, Moryson, Davies, Campion, and every other new foreigner⁴ who has written on Ireland from that time, may bear witness; inasmuch as it is almost according to the fashion of the beetle they act, when writing concerning the Irish. For it is the fashion of the beetle, when it lifts its head in the summertime, to go about fluttering, and not to stoop towards any delicate flower that may be in the field, or any blossom in the garden, though they be all roses or lilies, but it keeps bustling about until it meets with dung of horse or cow, and proceeds to roll itself therein. Thus it is with the set above-named; they have displayed no inclination to treat of the virtues or good qualities of the nobles among the old foreigners and the native Irish who then dwelt in Ireland; such as to write on their valour and on their piety, on the number of abbeys they had founded, and what land and endowments for worship they had bestowed on them; on the privileges they had granted to the learned professors of Ireland, and all the reverence they manifested towards churchmen and prelates: on every immunity they secured for their sages, and the maintenance they provided for the poor and for orphans; on each donation they were wont to bestow on the learned and on petitioners, and on the extent of their hospitality to guests, insomuch that it cannot truthfully be said that there ever existed in Europe folk who surpassed them, in their own time, in generosity or in hospitality according to their ability. Bear witness the literary assemblies which were proclaimed by them, a custom not heard of among any other people in Europe, so that the stress of generosity and hospitality among the old foreigners and the native Irish of Ireland was such that they did not deem it sufficient to give to any who should come seeking relief, but issued a general invitation summoning them, in order to bestow valuable gifts and treasure on them.

However, nothing of all this is described in the works of the present-day foreigners, but they take notice of the ways of inferiors and wretched little hags, ignoring the worthy actions of the gentry: yet as far as regards the old Irish, who were inhabiting this island before the Norman invasion, let it appear whether there has been in Europe any people more valiant than they, contending with the Romans for the defence of Scotland. For they compelled the Britons to make a dyke between their portion of Britain and Scotland,⁵ to protect [Roman] Britain from the incursion of the Gaels; and notwithstanding that there were usually fifty-two thousand of a Roman army defending the dyke, and two hundred (scouts) riding about, and twenty-three thousand foot and thirteen hundred horse

² old foreigners The "old foreigners" or "Old English" were those of Anglo-Norman background—descendants of the twelfth century invaders.

³ native Irish The word Keating uses is Gaedhil (English: Gaels).

⁵ a dyke ... Scotland Hadrian's Wall, a fortification built just south of present-day Scotland by the Roman Empire in the second century CE.

with them (besides), defending the frontier and harbours of the country against the violent attacks of the Scots¹ and of the Picts;² yet, with all that, the Irish would burst over the dyke, and the country would be harried by them, despite these great hosts, according to Samuel Daniel in his chronicle. Cormac, son of Cuileannan, says also in his saltair,³ that, as a result of the violence of the Irish (or Scots) and of the Crutheni (who are called Picts) against Britain, the Britons three times conspired against the Roman governors set over them, as a means of purchasing peace with the Scots and Picts. Observe, moreover, the straits in which the Irish had placed the Britons whilst Vortigern⁴ was king over them, whence it arose that he subsidised Hengist, with his German host, as may be read in Geoffrey of Monmouth.

DÁIBHÍ Ó BRUADAIR (1625–98)

Ó Bruadair, arguably the leading Irish poet of the seventeenth century, is a figure whose practice harks back to that of the bards of earlier centuries. He looked for the patronage of wealthy nobles; he wrote elegies, satires, religious verse, and poems on historical subjects. His poetry is highly accomplished, but Ó Bruadair could not succeed in worldly terms as had the bards of earlier centuries; he ended his life in poverty as a farm worker.

*Gone Are All the Noble Poets*⁵
(D'Aithle na bhFileadh n-Uasal)

Gone are all the noble poets
Sad the darkness of the world:
The children of high-ranking wise ones

Are now empty of keen words.

5 Sad their books with gray dust covered,

Bookbags never versed in delight:
Mystic lore lost—forgotten

By those born of wisdom drinkers.

After the Death of the Poets

After the death of the poets, whose riches were
A poems and wit—
Woe unto the foreseer of the fate that has come upon us:
The poets' books unheeded in corners, mouldered,
covered in dust.
Their sons possess nothing of their storied treasures.

GEOFFREY O'DONOGHUE OF THE GLENS (SEAFRAIDH Ó DONNCHADHA AN GHLEANNA)
(c. 1615–?c. 1670)

Geoffrey was both a prolific poet and a hereditary chief of his clan. Though he was born into privilege, his family lost their lands in the English-Irish conflicts of the 1640s (in which he fought). Many of his poems deal with those conflicts—and with the results of Cromwell's invasion and re-conquest of Ireland.

¹ Scots Keating, like other medieval writers, often uses the term Scots to refer interchangeably to the Gaelic peoples of Ireland and of Scotland.

² Picts Keating uses the Gaelic word for the Pictish people, Cruithnigh.

³ saltair Psalter; book of songs or poems.

⁵ Gone Are All the Noble Poets Two short poems on this subject have been ascribed to Dáibhí Ó Bruadair; both are included here. Dating of the poems is uncertain, though the verses are addressed in one manuscript to the children of Cú Chonnacht Ó Dálaigh, who died in 1642. The translation provided here, based on the early twentieth-century translation of John C. MacErlean, has been revised and modernized for this anthology.

*This caps all their tricks, this statute

This caps all their tricks, this statute from overseas²
That lays the whip on the people of Heber
the Fair;³
A crooked deal has robbed us of our land
And all our rights in Ireland are swept away.

5 The Gaels are now stripped at last of all they had in Ireland;

Now let the grave be dug of every man
Or else he gets a pass to cross the waves
And promise to stay gone till death.

10 The English are stronger now than the Gaels
And their fortunes better for who knows how long.
Relying on their title, they will not till the fields:
On their backs God's anger will rain down in streams.

AODHAGÁN Ó RATHAILLE (c.1670–1729)

Over the course of Aodhagán Ó Rathaille's lifetime the English tightened their hold over Ireland. The descendants of those Englishmen who had been given land when England conquered Ireland became more and more powerful—and the Irish aristocracy they had displaced continued to decline in wealth, power, and influence; such is the “ruin” that Ó Rathaille writes of in this poem.

² this statute from overseas A series of laws enacted both under Cromwell and following the Restoration of the English monarchy in 1660 (accompanied by the unification of the English, Scottish, and Irish monarchies) resulted in the confiscation of large amounts of land from Irish landowners. It is not clear which of these statutes is being referred to here.

³ people of Heber the Fair I.e., Irish Gaelic people. According to legend, Heber the Fair and his brothers conquered Ireland. (They came from Iberia, now Spain and Portugal, and later still their people were also said to have settled in the Hebrides.) Many Irish kings were said to be descended from the family.

Ó Rathaille, arguably the leading Irish-language poet of his era, is best known for having been the first writer of Aisling poetry; an aisling (pronounced “aish-ling”) is a dream vision, typically featuring Ireland personified as a woman.

The Ruin that Befell the Great Families of Ireland⁴

My pity, that Carthy's⁵ heirs are weaklings, this poor land's people without a leader;
no man to free her, locked up and keyless,
and shieldless now in this land of chieftains.
5 Land with no prince of her ancient people, land made helpless from foreigners' beatings,
land stretched out beneath the feet of treason,
land chained down—it is the death of reason.
Land lonely, tortured, broken and beaten,
10 land sonless, manless, wifeless, and weeping,
land lifeless, soulless, and without hearing,
land where the poor are only ill-treated.
Land without churches, massless and priestless,
land that the wolves have spitefully eaten;
15 land of misery and obedience to tyrant robbers, greedy and thieving.
Land that produces nothing of sweetness,
land so sunless, so starless and so streamless;
land stripped naked, left leafless and treeless,
20 land stripped naked by the English bleaters.
Land in anguish—and drained of its heroes,
land for its children forever weeping;
a widow wounded, crying and keening,
humbled, degraded, and torn to pieces.
25 The white of her cheeks is never tearless,
and her hair falls down in rain showers gleaming;
blood from her eyes in torrents comes streaming and black as coal is her appearance.

⁵ Carthy Powerful Irish family with whom Ó Rathaille's own family had a long-held connection. Ó Rathaille authored several other poems praising the MacCarthys or lamenting their loss of power.

Her limbs are shrunken, bound and bleeding;
 30 around her waist is no satin weaving,
 but iron from Hades¹ blackly gleaming, forged by henchmen who are Vulcan's² demons.
 Red pools are filled by her poor heart's bleeding and dogs from Bristol lap it up greedily—35 her body is being pulled to pieces
 by Saxon curs with their bloody teeth full.
 Her branches rotten, her forests leafless,
 the frosts of Heaven have killed her streams now;
 the sunlight shines on her lands but weekly,
 40 the fog of the forge is on her peaks now.
 Her quarries, her mines, are exploited freely,
 the rape of her trees is pointless, greedy;
 her growing plants are all scattered seawards
 to foreign countries to seek for freedom.
 45 Griffin and Hedges,³ the upstart keepers of the Earl's holdings—it is painful speaking—
 Blarney,⁴ where only bold wolves are sleeping,
 Ráth Luirc⁵ is plundered, naked and fearful.
 The Laune is taken, has lost its fierceness,
 50 Shannon and Maine and Liffey⁶ are bleeding;

Kingly Tara lacks the seed of Niall Dubh,⁷
 No Raighleann⁸ hero is alive and breathing.
 O'Doherty is gone—and his people,
 and the Moores are gone, that once were heroes;
 55 O'Flaherty is gone—and his people,
 and O'Brien has joined the English cheaters.
 Of the brave O'Rourke there is none speaking,
 O'Donnell's fame has none to repeat it,
 and all the Geraldines, they lie speechless,
 60 and Walsh of the slender ships is needy.

Hear, oh Trinity, my poor beseeching:
 take this sorrow from my book broken people,
 from the seed of Conn and Ír and Eibhear⁹—restore their lands to my broken people.
 65 They are my tormenting sorrow, brave men broken by this rain,
 and fat pirates in bed
 in the place of older tribes of fame,
 and the tribes that have fled
 70 and who cared for poets' lives, defamed.
 This great crime has me led shoeless, bare,
 through cold towns crying today.
 —C. 1720

¹ Hades Ancient Greek term for the underworld; in Christian literature, the word became used to refer to hell.

² Vulcan Ancient Roman god of volcanoes and metalwork.

⁴ Blarney Blarney had been the seat of a branch of the MacCarthy family until Blarney Castle was captured in the 1690s.

⁵ Ráth Luirc The town of Ráth Luirc (Irish: Lorc's ring fort, named for a mythical Irish king) was renamed Charleville (after King Charles II) in the seventeenth century.

⁶ The Laune ... Liffey The Laune, Shannon, Maine, and Liffey are all rivers in Ireland.

⁷ Tara According to legend, the Hill of Tara was the site of the court of the ancient high kings of Ireland. The location has retained its importance as both a mythological and a political symbol; Niall Dubh Tenth-century High King of Ireland. The O'Neill dynasty, which included several other high kings and other Irish kings, claimed to have descended from Niall Dubh.

⁸ Raighleann The names listed in the remainder of this stanza are all those of prominent Irish families.

⁹ Conn Conn of the Hundred Battles, a legendary High King of Ireland from whom multiple important Irish dynasties claimed descent; Ír and Eibhear Two of a group of brothers who, according to legend, conquered Ireland and established Gaelic settlement there. Many Irish kings were said to be descended from the family.

LADY ANNE LINDSAY (1750–1825)

Born and raised in the Lowland county of Fife, Lady Anne Lindsay moved to London in 1773 and lived there for most of the remainder of her life—during which time she was better known as a portrait painter and as a figure of note in aristocratic society than as a poet. She became Lady Anne Barnard upon her marriage to Andrew Barnard in 1793; he was appointed Colonial Secretary for the Cape Colony, and the couple lived in Cape Town from 1797 until 1802, when they resumed living in London. There, Lindsay moved in influential circles, counting such elites as Edmund Burke among her friends. (Andrew Barnard later returned on his own to Cape Town, where he died in 1807.)

“Auld Robin Gray” was written in 1771, when Lindsay was just 21, and was later published anonymously in several anthologies of Scottish verse (the first of them in 1783; there are slight variations among the poem’s published versions). Her authorship of the ballad was not revealed until 1812, and Lindsay did not confirm that she had written it until she was in her seventies. One the best-known of all Scottish ballads, “Auld Robin Gray” has been set to music numerous times, by composers from Reverend William Leves to Joseph Haydn. Lindsay also wrote a sequel (or “continuation,” as it is often called) to “Auld Robin Gray,” but no other poems can be attributed to her with any certainty.

Unlike the other Scottish selections in this section, which are Gaelic, this poem is an example of the Lowland Scots tradition.

Auld Robin Gray

When the sheep are in the fauld, and the kye° cows
at hame,
And ’a the weary warld to rest are gane,
The waes o’ my heart fa’ in showers frae my e’e,
While my gudeman lies sound¹ by me.

5 Young Jamie lo’ed me weel, an’ sought me for his bride;
But saving a crown he’d naething else beside:²

² saving a ... beside Except for a crown he had nothing else. (A crown was a British coin, worth a quarter of a pound in old British currency.)

To make the crown a pound, young Jamie gaed° went to sea;
And the crown and the pound, they were baith for me.

He hadna been awa’ a week but only twa,
10 When my father brak his arm, and the cow was stown awa;
My mother she fell sick—and my Jamie was at sea—
And auld Robin Gray came a-courtin’ me.

My father couldna work, and my mother couldna spin;
I toiled day and night, but their bread I couldna win;
15 Auld Robin maintained them baith, and wi’ tears in his e’e
Said, “Jennie, for their sakes, O, marry me!”

My heart it said nay; I look’d for Jamie back;
But the wind it blew high, and the ship was a wrack;
His ship it was a wrack—Why didna Jamie dee?
20 Or why do I live to cry, Woe is me?

My father urged me sair°—my mother sorely
didna speak;
But she looked in my face till my heart was like to break:
They gi’ed him my hand, though my heart was in the sea;
So auld Robin Gray he was gudeman to me.

25 I hadna been a wife a week but only four,
When mournfu’ as I sat on the stane at the door,
I saw my Jamie’s wraith°—for ghost, shadow
I couldna think it he,
Till he said, “I’ve come home, my love, to marry thee.”

O sair, sair did we greet, and muckle° did we say; much
30 We took but ae kiss,³ and we tore ourselves away:
I wish that I were dead, but I’m no like to dee;⁴
And why was I born to say, Woe is me!

I gang like a ghaist, and I care na to spin;⁵
I dare na think on Jamie, for that wad be a sin;
35 But I’ll do my best, a gude wife aye to be,
For auld Robin Gray, he is kind unto me.
—1773

³ but ae kiss Only one kiss.

⁴ no like to dee Not likely to die.

⁵ I gang ... na to spin I go about like a ghost, and I have no interest in spinning. (Spinning wool was a major occupation in the Scottish Highlands.)

WALES

DAFYDD AP GWILYM (C. 1320–?C. 1370)

Dafydd was born into a noble family near Aberystwyth, but we know little with any certainty of his life. Though various authorities have estimated his death to have occurred c. 1370, others have argued that he died in the wake of the Black Death, c. 1350. His poetry has powerful links to the traditions of medieval Welsh poetry, but it points forward at least as strongly, creating new traditions that run through much of the early modern period. Dafydd's early poems are written largely in traditional fixed forms (such as the englyn and the *awdl*¹), and largely in traditional genres (praise poems for noble patrons, elegies, and so on). He became a truly distinctive poet as he turned more and more to the cywdd, a poetic form typically used for subject matter of an unelevated variety, and began to write subjectively and irreverently about the world around him, and about love—erotic love, in particular. At times he may have had the classical poetry of Ovid as a model, but much of Dafydd's work is highly original; at roughly the same time as Petrarch was popularizing fresh forms of love poetry and emotional introspective in Renaissance Florence, Dafydd ap Gwilym, in his own distinctive fashion, was doing the same in Wales.

The translations here are from a variety of sources; the first four endeavor to capture the meaning as closely as possible, but without approximating Dafydd's rhymes; the translations of "The Mirror" and "The Ruin," on the other hand, try to capture something of the feel of the rhymes, even if the sense strays here and there from the literal meaning of the original.

*The Skylark*² (Yr Eheddydd)

The powerful prayers of the skylark turn upwards from his house every day,

¹ englyn ... awdl The awdl takes its name from the Welsh word for rhyme (also spelled "odl"); poems written in this form are usually fairly long, but use only one end-rhyme throughout the poem. An englyn is a short poem (in some variants of the form, only three lines), with a fixed number of syllables in each line.

² The Skylark Translated by Dafydd Johnston for the Dafydd ap Gwilym.net website.

- world's early-riser, agitation of bright song,
towards the sky, April's gatekeeper.
5 Gracious voice, director of rhymes,
sweet path, yours is fair labour:
making song above hazel groves,
tasteful masterpiece of the brown-winged one.
You have a mind intent on preaching,
10 dear office, and excellence of language,
a strong tune from the fountain of the faith,
deep privileges before God.
Up on high you go, true Kay's³ attribute,
and on high you sing every song.
- 15 My fair brown bird, my love-messenger,
and my fellow author, if you will go,
greet her of the comely features, bright her endowment, moon of Gwynedd,⁴
and seek one of her kisses
20 to bring here to me, or two.
Splendid incantation by the stars' partition,
long twisting journey to the heights, seizing a portion, you've climbed high enough, you got a reward.
25 Teacher of praise from dawn to dusk,
come down, God save your wings.
- Let every good creature praise its creator, pure radiant governor.
Praising God as He says,
30 thousands hear him, he is famous, he never stops.
Manner of a love author, where are you?
The voice is gentle and clear in brown-grey cloth.
Yours is a lovely pure singing voice, songbird, bay-coloured muse.
35 Cantor in God's chapel,
the omen will be fair, you are skilful.
Right to an allotment of land, frequent exquisite song,
a crest, and the cape is brown.
Make for the familiar sky,
40 poet, to the wild moorland.
You are to be seen up above, indeed, when the day is longest.

³ Kay King Arthur's nephew who, in the Arthurian prose tale Culhwch and Olwen, "could make himself as tall as the highest tree in the forest."

⁴ Gwynedd Region in northwestern Wales.

When you come to worship,
 a talent given to you by God who is One and Three,
 45 no tree branch supports you above the world, you possess language, but the grace of the true Father and His frequent miracle and His providence.

Dedicated one of the wild sky sea,
 50 go yonder to the environs of her court.
 If I be with her, the Jealous One's anger will be a small matter one morning.
 The fine for sad [act] of killing you is so great that no one dares to kill you.
 55 Were anyone to try it, bold turmoil,
 boo to the Jealous One if you don't survive.
 The firmament is your great perch,
 you are so far from a hand bow.
 Harsh trampled ground, the Bowman is sad,
 60 he will be clumsy with his great aim.
 His rage is evil, turn above his reach as his hobby-hawk passes by.

The Gull¹ (Yr Wylan)

Fair gull on the tide, indeed,
 of the same hue as snow or the white moon,
 your beauty is without blemish,
 a piece like the sun, gauntlet of the brine.
 5 You are light on the ocean wave,
 swift proud fish-eating bird.
 You'd go close by the anchor hand-in-hand with me, sea lily.
 Just like a letter you are painted silver,
 10 You're a nun on the crest of the sea tide.

Perfect praise of a girl, you are praised afar,
 make for the curve of fortress and castle.
 Gull, look for one of the colour of Eigr on the lovely fortress.
 15 Say my ardent words,
 may she choose me, go to the girl.
 If she's alone, make bold to greet her,
 be courteous to the dainty maid

¹ The Gull Translated by Dafydd Johnston for the Dafydd ap Gwilym.net website.

for gain; say I will not live,
 20 noble refined youth, unless I have her.
 I love her, strength of complete passion,
 oh men, neither Myrddin²
 with his fine wheaten lips
 nor Taliesin³ ever loved a fairer one.
 25 A sought-after girl [dressed in] fine linen under copper [hair], exquisite visage perfectly formed.

Ah gull, if you get to see the cheek of the fairest girl in Christendom, unless I get a most gentle response
 30 the girl will be the death of me.

Trouble at an Inn⁴ (Trafferth mewn Tafarn)

I came to a choice town followed by my handsome page-boy.
 Fine merry expense, an excellent place for dinner,
 I took a pretty dignified public lodging,
 5 I was a proud / fine⁵ young man,
 and I had some wine.
 I spotted a fair slender maid
 in the house, my one fair sweetheart.
 I set my mind entirely upon
 10 my slender darling, colour of the rising sun,
 I bought roast and expensive wine,
 (not to show off) [for] me and the beauty over there.
 Young men love playing games,
 I called the girl, a modest maid, to [me on] the bench,
 15 and we had a very grand dinner,
 greater than a wedding feast.

² Myrddin Myrddin Wyllt, legendary figure of early Wales, who is said to have retreated into the forest after a battle and there received the gift of prophecy. In Arthurian legend in English, he typically appears as Merlin.

³ Taliesin Legendary poet of early Wales.

⁴ Trouble at an Inn Translated by Dafydd Johnston for the Dafydd ap Gwilym.net website.

⁵ proud / fine Here and at line 21 a slash is used to indicate a point of semantic ambiguity in the original; "proud" and "fine" are both possible here. (The translator discusses the poem's ambiguities at length in a 2008 article in Cambrian Medieval Celtic Studies.)

I whispered (I was a bold diligent man, that's for sure) two alluring words.
 After the obstacle was cleared
 20 by the whispering (close fate),
 I made an agreement (love was not idle / easy)
 to come to the lovely girl
 when the crowds had gone to sleep; she was a dark-browed beauty.
 25 When everyone except me and the girl had gone to sleep (exceedingly piteous),
 I tried most adeptly to make my way to the girl's bed, [but] it turned out disastrously.
 I had a nasty fall making a commotion there,
 30 there were no good feats.
 I hurt my shin (my poor leg!),
 I didn't jump safely, above the ankle,
 on the edge of a stupid shrill stool,
 because of the inn-keeper.
 35 I hit my forehead (excessive desire is bad),
 where I ended up, without any free leap,
 frequent confusion of wild crashing,
 on the end of the table,
 where there was a loose basin now
 40 and a noisy brass pan.
 The table fell, a heavy piece,
 and the two trestles and all the utensils.
 The pan let out a clang,
 it could be heard a long way behind me.
 45 The basin boomed (I was a vain man)
 and the dogs barked.
 It's easier to get up awkwardly
 (foolish wickedness) than swiftly.
 I came up (it was a remorseful tale)
 50 —Welshmen love me!—
 by thick walls where there were three Englishmen in one stinking bed worrying about their three packs,
 Hickin and Jenkin and Jack.
 55 The churlish slobber-chops
 (cruel hate) hissed to the [other] two:
 "There's a Welshman, fierce deceitful commotion, roaming around here most cunningly;

he's a thief, if we allow it,
 60 watch out, keep clear of him."

The inn-keeper roused up all the host,
 and it was a woeful tale.

Nine at a time they searched for me
 scowling all around me,
 65 whilst I, covered in painful bruises,
 kept quiet in the darkness.
 I prayed, not in fearless fashion,
 in hiding, like one afraid,
 and through the power of dear sincere prayer,
 70 and through the grace of Jesus,
 I got back (sleepless confusion)
 without any gain to my own lair.
 I escaped (thank goodness that saints are close by),
 I beg to God for forgiveness.

Morfudd Like the Sun¹
(Morfudd fel yr Haul)

I am waiting for a soft-spoken girl,
 sheen of fine snow on a stony field.
 See, O God, that she is a radiant girl,
 brighter than a crest of foam,
 5 colour of a bright resounding wave,
 an ardently bright girl, she is modest.
 She knows how to earn a love song from my lips,
 best aspect of the sun beside a cloud,
 the people's mistress [or dawn] in mantle of fine fur, 10 she knows well how to mock an ugly man, lovely Morfudd, pity the weak frivolous poet who loves her, beautiful Gwenhwyfar.²
 The girl's appearance is a golden web, woe to that handsome man crying out in anguish.
 15 Her deceit and trickery is enormous,
 worse than anything, and [yet] she is my darling.
 One time my white girl appears between church and court,

¹ Morfudd Like the Sun Translated by Dafydd Johnston, for the Dafydd ap Gwilym.net website.

² Gwenhwyfar King Arthur's beautiful wife in Arthurian legend.

and another time, proud clever girl on fortress battlements, 20 bright shining Morfudd hides,
 like the sun with its bountiful fringes,
 foster-mother of the principality of fine weather,
 her skilled work is worthy of praise,
 May's merchantess freely giving light,
 25 brilliant Morfudd's great countenance,
 the radiant and exquisite semblance of Mary.

Over the earth's immense expanse
 the sun comes like a dazzling girl beautifully within the body of a single day,
 30 shepherdess of the sky from end to end.
 When the sun which dazzles sight is needed (we feel great pain)
 after a thick cloud passes over it,
 fierce elemental war,
 35 it escapes before the darkening
 when the night comes, sense of harsh pain.
 The dark blue sky will be completely filled,
 Eluned's¹ image, the planet's place.
 No one has any idea then
 40 where it goes, it is God's ball.
 No hand can touch it
 nor take hold of its edge.
 The next day it will raise up again,
 igniting from afar the firmament of the world.

45 Not dissimilar, apportioning of grief,
 is the way in which Morfudd leaves me by setting:
 after coming from the sky above,
 running across the firmament below,
 she of the lovely frown sets
 50 beneath the lintel of the wicked cold man.

I pursued passion around the land of Penrhyn,² abode of love.
 Every day the clever shining girl is to be seen there, and every night she disappears.
 55 It's no easier to touch her on hall's floor (I have been slain)
 than it is (girl freely praised and lavishly spending)

¹ Eluned Possibly Saint Eluned, a legendary princess and virgin martyr, or Luned, a handmaiden of Arthurian legend who aids the knight Sir Ywain.

² Penrhyn Village near Dafydd's home.

for people's hands to catch the sun.
 The blazing sun with its sparkling sheen
 60 has no better face than her.
 If either one is most fair this year,
 it is our sun, of noble lineage, which is the fairest.

Why (appearance which is a step greatly to be desired)
 does one of them not take possession of the night, 65 whilst the other as splendid warmth,
 good light, colours the day?
 If the two faces were to appear in rotation in the four corners of the world, it would be a wonder [like that found in] a stiff-leaved book
 70 if night ever came during this girl's lifetime.

*The Mirror*³ (Y Drych)

It never occurred to me—what a thought!—
 That my fine and handsome face might not Be so good-looking. Then one day I could see
 A mirror—nasty thing! It looked right back at me
 5 And paused, and then at last it told
 Me to my face: what was there was not so fair.

Sunken cheeks, pining away, wanting love
 That will not ever come, and skin above
 All stretched, and parched, yellow
 10 And lined all through, just like the skin below.
 How astonishing—the length of the nose—
 Pointy as a razor, you might suppose.
 And who could see my lively soul
 In those eyes—each lost in its hollow hole?

15 Is there something there I've missed?
 Perhaps I'm too much the pessimist.
 Is this ugly, mottled face a guise?
 Is it, perchance, the mirror who lies?
 If I'm at fault, love's pining's done
 20 This to me, and I'll soon die—but none
 Of that will be ever be the case
 If all the ugliness is in the mirror's face.

³ The Mirror This rhymed translation has been prepared for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature.

Circle of silver, like a moon—real magic?
 Or is it false, mere bringer of tragic
 25 News that no one should believe?
 Men of magic made him: magic can deceive.
 Dreams fly; the cruel and speedy dream betrays;
 Icy brother to the truth—his coldness stays.
 Cold, false, and truly ugly creature—
 30 Into the fire you go: I'll burn your every feature.

But if what's there is really mine?
 I'm not to blame for every wrinkle, every line.
 It's the girl from Gwynedd¹ who made me pine away—
 It's not my fault, whatever the mirror may say.

The Ruin² (Yr Adfail)

Nothing but a ruin now
 Between moorland and meadow,
 Once the owners saw in you
 A comely cottage, bright, new,
 5 Now roof, rafters, ridge-pole, all
 Broken down by a broken wall.

A day of delight was once there
 For me, long ago, no care
 When I had a glimpse of her
 10 Fair in an angle-corner.
 Beside each other we lay
 In the delight of that day.

Her forearm, snowflake-lovely,
 Softly white, pillowing me,
 15 Proffered a pleasant pattern
 For me to give in my turn,
 And that was our blessing for
 The new-cut lintel and door.

Now the wild wind, wailing by,
 20 Crashes with curse and with cry
 Against my stones, a tempest
 Born and bred in the East,

Or south ram-batterers break
 The shelter that folk forsake.

25 Life is illusion and grief;
 A tile whirls off, as a leaf
 Or a lath goes sailing, high
 In the keening of kite-kill cry.
 Could it be our couch once stood
 30 Sturdily under that wood?
 Pillar and post, it would seem
 Now are less than a dream.
 Are you that, or only the lost
 Wreck of a fiddle, rune-ghost?

35 "Dafydd, the cross on their graves
 Marks what little it saves,
 Says, They did well in their lives."

*The Poet and the Grey Friar³
 (Y Bardd a'r Brawd Llwyd)*

Woe is me that the celebrated maiden, whose court is in the grove, does not know about the conversation with the mouse-coloured friar about her today.

5 I went to the Friar to confess my sin.
 I did admit to him, indeed,
 that I was a sort of poet,
 and that I had long loved 10 a white-faced black-browed girl, and that for the life of me
 I could get no favour or satisfaction from the lady,
 but only loving her constantly and pining greatly for her love,
 15 and carrying her praise throughout Wales and being without her for all that,
 and longing to feel her
 in my bed between me and the wall.

² The Ruin This translation is from Gwynn Jones, The Oxford Book of Welsh Verse in English.

³ The Poet and the Grey Friar Translated by A. Cynfael Lake for the Dafydd ap Gwilym.net website.

20 The Friar said to me,
 "I will give you good council.
 If you have loved the foam-hued one,
 colour of paper, for a long time until now,
 reduce the pain of the day to come,
 it is good for your soul to stop,
 25 and leave your cywyddau
 and start saying your prayers.
 God did not redeem man's soul
 for the sake of a cywydd or an englyn.
 Your songs, you minstrels,
 30 are nothing but nonsense and vain voices,
 and inciting men and women
 to sin and falsehood.
 Praise of the flesh which carries the soul to the devil is no good thing."

35 I did answer the Friar for every word that he said.
 "God is not as cruel
 as old men say.
 God will not let a gentle man's soul
 40 be lost for loving a woman or a maiden.
 Three things are loved throughout the world:
 woman and fine weather and health.
 A girl is the fairest flower
 in heaven besides God himself.
 45 Every man was born of woman of all the peoples except three men.
 And for that reason it is no wonder that girls and women are loved.
 All gaiety comes from heaven
 50 and all sadness from hell.

"Song gladdens the hearts of old and young, sick and healthy.
 It is just as fitting for me to sing poems as it is for you to preach sermons, 55 and just as right for me to live by minstrelsy
 as it is for you to live by begging.

cywyddau to holy God?

"God does not feed every man with the same food and delicacies.
 There is a time for food
 and a time for prayer,
 65 and a time for preaching
 and a time for making merry.
 Song is sung in every feast
 to entertain young girls,
 and a pater noster in church
 70 to seek the land of Paradise.

"It is true what Ystudfach³ said when carousing with his poets,
 'The joyful man will have a full house,
 and misfortune will come to the sad man.'
 75 Though some love holiness others love merriment.
 Very few know a sweet cywydd
 and everyone knows his pater.⁴
 And therefore, you dogmatic Friar,
 80 song is not the greatest sin.

"When everyone is as glad to hear a pater to harp accompaniment as the young girls of Gwynedd⁵ are to hear a merry cywydd
 85 I will sing, by my hand,
 the pater without end.
 Until then shame on Dafydd
 if he sings a pater rather than a cywydd."

² David Biblical king to whom many of the psalms in the Bible are attributed.

³ Ystudfach Early Welsh poet who is an oft-quoted source of maxims and sayings; according to tradition, he was poet to the legendary fifth-century King Vortimer.

⁴ pater The Paternoster (Latin: Our Father), a well-known Christian prayer.

⁵ Gwynedd Region in northwestern Wales.

TUDUR PENYLLYN (C. 1420–C. 1485)

Born in northwest Wales to a family of high standing, Tudur Penyllyn appears to have been a professional poet under the sometime patronage of Welsh nobles. Evidently this was insufficient to provide him with a steady living, however; he is also known to have worked in the wool trade. The poem included here is the only known cywydd of his; the other poems of his that have survived include praise poems, religious poems, and love poems. The following appears in facing column translation to show the dual-language original, in which the Welshman speaks Welsh and the Englishwoman speaks Middle English.

Conversation between a Welshman and an Englishwoman¹

“Good day, fine, nimble Englishwoman,
I do love you, maiden.”

“What are you saying, man?” she said,
“for truth, I believe you are a bold Welshman.”

5 “Fair girl, pure, bright love, give me a kiss, distrust your hatred.”

“Kiss the devil, what are you trying to do?
Sir, leave it alone, with sorrow.”

10 “Let my hand go under your skirt to feel you, beautiful, glad girl.”

“I am not Welsh, you Welshman.
I forbid you, leave me alone.”

“Don’t be so quick to repulse me, you’ll get plenty of money from my hand.”

15 “I think you are mad, by our lady.
Get out, I will do nothing for you.”

30 "Let me get up into your crotch, up to the cross, isn't there a door?"

"You shall not pass, by Saint Asaph;¹
for your life, I have a knife, knave."

"Oh girl, are you going to let Tudur do it, or aren't you?"

1 GWERFUL MECHAIN (FL. 1460–1500)

Gwerful Mechain is among the most important Welsh poets of her time, but we know little of her life other than that she lived in Mechain in northeast Wales. She wrote largely in traditional formal bardic meters. Among the many poems of hers that have survived are several on religious themes (including a cywydd about Christ on the cross). Some of her most famous poems (including "To Jealous Wives" ["Wragedd Eiddigus"] and "Conversation between Two Poets" ["Ymddioldan Rhwng Dau Fardd"]) deal with erotic themes; "To the Vagina" ("Cywydd y Cedor"), one of her best-known works in this category, is included below. The poem is part of a brief tradition of poems addressed to genitalia—one in which Dafydd ap Gwilym (with his poem "Y Gal" ["The Penis"]) also participated.

To the Vagina² (Cywydd y Cedor)

5 Every poet, drunken fool
Thinks he's just the king of cool,
(Every one is such a boor,
He makes me sick, I'm so demure),
He always declaims fruitless praise

² To the Vagina The present translation is by Katie Gramich.

Of all the girls in his man's gaze,
 He's at it all day long, by God,
 Omitting the best bit, silly sod:
 He praises the hair, gown of fine love,
 10 And all the girl's bits up above,
 Even lower down he praises merrily
 The eyes which glance so sexily;
 Daring more, he extols the lovely shape
 Of the soft breasts which leave him all agape,
 15 And the beauty's arms, bright drape,
 Even her perfect hands do not escape.
 Then with his finest magic,
 Before night falls, it's tragic,
 He pays homage to God's might,
 20 An empty eulogy: it's not quite right:
 For he's left the girl's middle unpraised,
 That place where children are upraised,
 The warm bright quim he does not sing,
 That tender, plump, pulsating broken ring,
 25 That's the place I love, the place I bless,
 The hidden quim below the dress.
 You female body, you're strong and fair,
 A faultless, fleshy court plumed with hair.
 I proclaim that the quim is fine,
 30 Circle of broad-edged lips divine,
 It's a valley, longer than a spoon or hand,
 A cwm to hold a penis strong and grand;
 A vagina there by the swelling bum,
 Two lines of red to song must come.
 35 And the churchmen all, the radiant saints,
 When they get the chance, have no restraints,
 They never fail their chance to steal,
 By Saint Beuno, to give it a good feel.
 So I hope you feel well and truly told off,
 40 All you proud male poets, you dare not scoff,
 Let songs to the quim grow and thrive
 Find their due reward and survive.
 For it is silky soft, the sultan of an ode,
 A little seam, a curtain on a hole bestowed,
 45 Neat flaps in a place of meeting,
 The sour grove, circle of greeting,
 Superb forest, faultless gift to squeeze,

Fur for a fine pair of balls, tender frieze,
 A girl's thick glade, it is full of love,
 50 Lovely bush, blessed be it by God above.

ELIS GRUFFYDD (c. 1490–?c. 1540)

Born and raised in Llanasa in northern Wales, Elis Gruffydd spent the first part of his career in the English army, then worked as an administrator for an English nobleman in Calais and in London. His Chronicle is divided into two parts, the first covering the history of the world from the Creation to the beginnings of Christianity, the second covering the histories of Wales and of England from 1066 to 1552. The work is an important source of knowledge about the early myths and legends of Wales as well as about its later history.

from *Chronicle*Llywelyn and the Fool¹

After the death of Iorwerth Drwyndwn ab Owain,² Llywelyn, his son, took the crown of the principality of Wales. In the fifth year of the reign of King John, Llywelyn or Lord Llywelyn was engaged and married to Elisabeth, the second daughter of King John, as the English chronicle says. But the Welsh chronicle says that it was Sioned, the youngest of the three daughters that he married.³ But indeed, it scarcely matters which of the two it was, since all the books say clearly that he married one of King John's daughters and that the prince made great preparations to go to England for the marriage. At the time, as the story says, the prince's fool begged and pleaded with his master to be allowed to go on that journey with his master the prince, but the fool's request was denied.

Soon, Lord Llywelyn mounted his horse and rode from Maenan to Rhuddlan. The next day he continued his journey from there to Caerleon on Dyfrdwy.⁴ It was then, as some of the books of Wales say, that the prince encountered a spirit that looked and acted like the fool he had left behind, and who followed him to Caerleon. There, he handed him over to his innkeeper to keep under close guard until he could find someone to take him back to Trefriw.⁵

Then the prince mounted his horse and rode on, pushing forward determinedly until he had nearly arrived at the king's court. Then suddenly the fool appeared in the presence of the prince and his company.

³ In the fifth ... married Llywelyn married Siwan (also called Joan, c. 1191–1237), a daughter of King John of England (r. 1199–1216). Peace between Llywelyn and John lasted about a decade, but relations eventually deteriorated.

⁴ from Maenan ... Dyfrdwy Llywelyn travels across the eastern half of northern Wales to a point just across the present-day border between Wales and England.

⁵ Trefriw Site of Llywelyn's hunting lodge, near Maenan.

The fool, as the text says at great length, had the prince dress him in flamboyant clothes, as was proper for a person of that sort of learning.

Soon thereafter the prince arrived at the court and married the king's daughter. At the wedding feast, as my copy says, there was no shortage or lack of every sort of species of rare and excellent provisions to place before the rustic and lowly Welsh. These were consumed amid merriment and entertainment by every kind of minstrel and magician, the sort that were at that time very much in vogue in the courts of kings and princes.

Then one of the king's magicians stepped forward to demonstrate the power of his art for the entertainment of the people at the feast. To mock the ignorant Welsh, he conjured up through the magic of his art two or three men in Welsh boots and frocks, driving a herd of goats before them into the hall or the chamber where the wedding was taking place. As soon as they had come into the upper part of the hall or chamber, the goats began leaping on the seats and benches and tables, running from one place to another, with the people laughing and shouting, "Look! Here's an offering from Wales!" This stunned the prince, causing the blood to rise in his cheeks from embarrassment as he asked the magician why the goats signified the Welsh rather than some other people.

The magician answered and said, "because they're ready to leap and run about from one place to another all over this kingdom and over land and sea to other realms to do the wretched things that goats do." On hearing this the prince lowered his head and fell silent. Just then the prince's fool came and stood beside his master and asked permission to show the crowd the power of his magic. The prince answered, saying, "Indeed, I have cause enough to be embarrassed here without giving you permission to give me more reason to be red-faced."

But anyway, the story says that by the fool pleading and others pleading for him the prince gave permission to the fool to do what he thought appropriate. As my copy says, the fool, through his magic, conjured some men driving a herd of pigs before them into the hall or chamber in the same way the other magician had made men driving goats earlier. As soon as they came into the upper part of the chamber, they began to root up the ground and overturn tables and do other piggish activities which would be too long to rehearse here. And the Welsh laughed at that, saying, "Look! Here's a fine offering of English pigs for the prince to send to Llanrhychwin¹ to root up bracken!" This stunned the English, who asked the fool what the pigs indicated.

He answered them saying that that they signified the English people, whom he said were pigs, unmindful of their faith, and who were turning up the ground to make fields and ditches to put the land into the hands of a small number of them, all of whom were stranger to each other than dogs and pigs are to each other. All this cheered the prince.

Eventually the prince took his leave from the king and began the journey back to Wales. He pushed on steadily until he came to Y berth Ddu above Llan Eurgain.² There the fool said to the prince, "Sire, 'tis here I met you and 'tis here I leave you. Know and be assured that I am not the same as nor akin to your own fool, whom you suppose I am. You'll find him in your court, from which he hasn't moved, when you return home."

SIÔN CENT (?C. 1390–?C. 1440)

Little is known with any certainty about this fifteenth-century poet (who is also known as Sion Gwent and Sion Y Kent). Siôn Cent is believed to have lived in Brecknockshire in south-central Wales, to have worked as a chaplain, and to have been fluent in several languages. He wrote often in the cywydd form, but used it for religious rather than secular subjects. A distinctive feature of his cywyddau is the repetition of the same line at the end of each stanza.

from *The Illusion of the World*³

The world's purpose hides from us;
What we see is as if made with a paintbrush
By one who has made many images—nothing real,
nothing sure,
Like the saints all colored like stars on the ceiling—
a picture.
5 Even all that brave warriors see, and seem to have done,
Is as if done by the trick of a fat magician
Casting his spells: worthless things we cling
To, bought dear, a seeming world of nothing
In a magic of color all dressed.

O, when Christ comes! With avenging pain
The castle gate one Sunday will open:
Judge with never a fault to confess
Will judge good and bad, and doubtless

And some will strangely make merry.

EDMUND SPENSER

1552? – 1599

Edmund Spenser has consistently been accorded a special place in the history of English literature. In the seventeenth century John Milton, as much impressed by The Faerie Queene's subtle treatment of the moral virtues as by its aesthetic charm, called him "our sage and serious Spenser, whom I dare to name a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas." In the nineteenth, Wordsworth wrote of "Sweet Spenser, moving through his clouded heaven / With the moon's beauty and the moon's soft pace." And in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries poets and critics have continued to hold Spenser and The Fairie Queene in extraordinarily high regard.

Spenser's career as a servant of the Crown was less glorious. He was not the moping failure some have thought him (he had steady work in Ireland helping the English govern its often rebellious and resentful population), but in England he was never the courtier that he seems to have wanted to be. His bid for more direct royal patronage was the first part of The Faerie Queene (1590). This is an allegorical epic poem with debts to Virgil, elements of Arthurian and Italian epic or romance, traces of medieval pilgrimage allegory, Chaucerian moments, and passages indebted to a range of other genres from the fabliau to the pastoral. The central if often absent figure is Prince Arthur, the future British king, who is seeking the always absent heroine, Gloriana, queen of Fairyland and an allegorical "mirror," Spenser told his friend Sir Walter Raleigh in a letter published at the end of the volume, of Queen Elizabeth in her public role as ruler. Modern scholars may perceive veiled criticisms of Elizabeth in the poetry, but the queen either did not notice or thought it wise to read the epic as purely complimentary, so she gave the author a generous yearly pension of fifty pounds.

Little is known with any certainty of Spenser's early life, although his writings provide some information. He was born, probably in London, to parents of modest means, and it was as an "impoverished" student that he entered the Merchant Taylors' School, headed by the scholar Richard Mulcaster, remembered today for his impassioned defense of the English language. There Spenser studied Latin, Greek, and possibly Hebrew; he also learned French and Italian. From there he went to Pembroke Hall (now Pembroke College) at Cambridge University, where he was registered as a "sizar," a poor student who was required to work for his keep, earning his bachelor's degree in 1573 and his M.A. in 1576. While at Pembroke, Spenser made friends with Gabriel Harvey, soon to be a prominent Cambridge don, who introduced him to useful patrons and whose correspondence with the young poet demonstrates a shared interest in poetic theory, genres, and metrics.

In 1579 Spenser produced his first significant, if pseudonymous, publication, The Shepheardes Calender, a set of illustrated pastoral poems for each month of the year and written, says a prefatory poem, by one "Immerito." The work, dedicated to Philip Sidney, comes with a preface and annotations by the still unidentified "E.K." In this innovative work, which saw a number of editions, Spenser exploits a genre that hearkened back to Theocritus and Virgil in the third and first centuries BCE but that had since added the potential for religious and political commentary because of the Christian associations of "pastor" and "flock." The book's presentation is fashionably Continental and the metrical variation innovative, yet the language is deliberately old-fashioned, reminiscent of Chaucer and with a name for the protagonist—Colin Clout—taken from the work of an earlier poet, John Skelton.

In that same year, 1579, Spenser was in the service, as secretary, of the Earl of Leicester, an important royal advisor and at one point suitor to Queen Elizabeth. There he would have met Sidney, Leicester's nephew, and Edward Dyer, both poets and both eventually knighted, whose friendship, or at least notice, would have seemed valuable. Sidney may have helped Spenser later gain an appointment as secretary to Lord Grey, the Lord Deputy of Ireland. It is not quite clear how Spenser regarded Grey's brutality against the Spanish troops who supported the Irish rebels, but his later tract, A View of the Present State of Ireland (printed 1633—see the anthology's online component of Literature in Ireland, Scotland, and Wales for excerpts), whatever the ambiguities of its dialogue form and a few residual doubts about its authorship, displays little regard for the Irish and even less for the insurgents. After Grey was recalled to England, Spenser remained in Ireland and continued to work as a civil servant, gaining considerable acreage and a small castle.

In 1589 Spenser traveled with Sir Walter Raleigh to England, where in 1590 he published the first three books of The Faerie Queene, on which he had been working for about a decade. Politically as well as poetically motivated, this Protestant, but hardly "Puritan," epic creates a romance world filled with monsters, giants, knights, and enchanters, allegorical personifications who enact a subtle, complex, and often elusive interplay between the Aristotelian or Christian virtues and their enemies, both those active out in the world and those operating within the leading figures' own souls. According to his letter to Raleigh, Spenser hoped to write twelve books, but only six were completed (the second set being published in the 1596 edition): the "legends" of holiness, temperance, chastity, friendship, justice, and courtesy, as well as a fragment on "Mutabilitie." Spenser won his pension, but Elizabeth's patronage seems to have gone no further, perhaps because his satirical "Mother Hubberds Tale," included in his Complaints (1591), angered the authorities.

In between the first and second installments of The Faerie Queene Spenser published his Complaints, a collection of poems; Colin Clouts Come Home Againe (1595), a sometimes satirical anti-court pastoral; Astrophel, an elegy for Philip Sidney (1596); and Amoretti and Epithalamion (1595), sonnets that commemorate Spenser's courtship of Elizabeth Boyle, followed by a magnificently stately marriage hymn celebrating their wedding. The sonnets, which depart from the Petrarchan tradition of adulterous or futile desire, are structured by allusions to the liturgical year; the twenty-four stanzas of the "Epithalamion" allude to the day (June 11, then the summer solstice), and its 365 long lines recall the year.

In 1597 Spenser became Sheriff of Cork, but later that year Irish rebels ransacked and burned his castle. He returned to London carrying dispatches for the Privy Council, but his time there was to be short. He died early in 1599 and is buried in Westminster Abbey, next to Chaucer. A memorial erected in 1620 reads, in part, "Heare lyes ... the body of Edmond Spencer, the prince of poets in his tyme; whose divine spirit needs noe other witnesse then the works which he left behinde him."

The Faerie Queene

In a letter to his friend Sir Walter Raleigh, Spenser writes that his unfinished Faerie Queene aimed to "fashion" a gentleman or noble person who would combine the virtues represented by twelve knightly heroes. In his epic poem, each of the books features one of these knights, who represents a virtue and who struggles to fight the specific vices that threaten his quest. The hero of Book 1's "Legend of Holinesse," is Saint George (the Redcrosse Knight), patron saint of England and, with God's help, slayer of a satanic dragon that has been threatening a royal family and its kingdom, Eden. In the legend as it came down to Spenser, George rescues the royal maiden and the kingdom by defeating the dragon but then leaves, soon to be martyred. In Spenser's Protestant version, however, the knight will marry the princess, Una (representing the One, the Truth, and the True Church), although not until his earthly service to the Fairy Queen, Gloriana (who represents, among other things, Queen Elizabeth), is finished. Then, at the end of human time, the marriage of Christ and his Church can be completed.

The somewhat chilly hero of Book 2 is Sir Guyon, Knight of Temperance, who with the intermittent guidance of a Palmer (usually a religious figure, but here signifying rectified reason) seeks not so much a middle way as a dynamic mixture of positive and negative energies, fire and water, excess and lack—a mixture that parallels the healthy body's balance of elements and the cosmos's own tense harmony. The villain is the seductively beautiful but murderous Acrasia ("Excess") who, like Homer's Circe, turns men to beasts. After a journey recalling that of Odysseus, Guyon arrives at her island, a pseudo-paradise of sensuous but sterile pleasures and largely artificial beauty.

The Garden of Adonis is the Bower's parallel and correction, made beautiful by Nature's own art. To this garden will come the lovely Amoret to be raised by Venus in "goodly womanhed." The Garden is the center, structurally and conceptually, of Book 3, the Legend of Chastity. For Spenser, Chastity (represented by the armed lady knight, Britomart) is an energetic love that embraces a sexuality culminating in faithful marriage. In Book 3's last two cantos Britomart sets out to liberate Amoret from the enchanter Busirane, who holds her in a house furnished with artworks and a procession illustrating what many see as literary and mythical eros, not the genuine love of faithful spouses. Rescued, Amoret and her beloved Scudamore embrace, although in the 1596 edition Spenser undoes that moment so he can send the pair on more adventures. After Book 4, on friendship, comes the Book of Justice, starring Britomart's beloved Sir Artegall. One challenge to Justice is offered by "The Equality Giant," as he is now often called, who demands the abolition of private property and a return to humanity's primal equality. The scene has provoked debate on Spenser's attitude toward the longing, felt by some radicals in his day, to restore a supposedly lost social and economic justice. In all the books, the epic's chief hero is Prince Arthur, a Briton who is in love with Gloriana and who will, in Spenser's version of the tale, establish the royal line from which will eventually derive the Welsh Tudor dynasty.

Book 1 derives from a saint's legend, a genre that many Protestants contemptuously dismissed as medieval and Catholic. It is also a dynastic epic, as loosely defined in the Renaissance: its opening lines signal Spenser's aims, and his ambition to be a national poet, through paraphrasing the canceled start of Virgil's Aeneid and the opening of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. Spenser takes his structure of twelve books, each consisting of twelve cantos, from Virgil's Aeneid, but his rhyme scheme is distinctly his own. Each nine-line stanza (later referred to as the Spenserian stanza) consists of eight lines of iambic pentameter and a final line of iambic hexameter (an alexandrine) with an interlocking rhyme scheme (ababbcbcc). Structurally, the poem follows a pattern set by St. Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153) in a sermon that allegorizes the parable of the Prodigal Son: a young man on an impatient horse journeys with a number of personifications through Error, to Pride, to Despair, and finally to a house where he recovers and is ready for Heaven. Spenser also borrows heavily from Ariosto, Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, Virgil, Chaucer, Arthurian legend, and Tudor anti-Catholic polemic, so that the poem incorporates epic, romance, legend, personification allegory, satire, and pastoral. The Bible figures too, for the narrative moves from a besieged Eden through a fall into error and eventually by way of a victory over the old dragon Satan to the promise of the New Jerusalem and the union of God and humanity at the end of time. George's very name, from the Greek for farmer, or "earth-worker," parallels that of Adam (Hebrew for "red earth"), because the Legend of Holiness also narrates the conversion by God's grace of earthy flesh into Saint George of "merry" England.

Book 1 also allegorizes England's loss of the true Church to Catholicism—just when this had occurred, historically, was a matter of debate at the time, and Spenser is not clear on that point—and its recovery under the Protestant Tudors. In this regard, Spenser's poem exemplifies the anti-Catholicism common in his time and place. Yet he also incorporates a number of Catholic touches, from the hermit who instructs Redcrosse to elements of the Catholic Easter Eve liturgy that deepen the concluding betrothal ceremony. Indeed, in recent years Spenser has seemed less urgently Protestant, and although there can be no doubt that he feared and detested the might of Catholic Spain (allegorized by the giant Orgoglio) and what he saw as the mendaciously seductive powers of the Papacy (allegorized by the magician Archimago and the witch Duessa), his theology has been read as less rigidly Calvinist, with at least a little more room for a free human will than strict Protestants would have liked, and with an acceptance of formal and communal ceremony that would make radical Puritans wince.

In recent years, then, Spenser's moral and religious understanding has come to seem more flexible. Similarly, his treatment of the virtues that his knightly heroes represent has been seen as less illustrative or demonstrative and more interrogative or exploratory. In all the books, even Book 1 (which deals with a virtue hard to live by but easy for readers to value), Spenser is willing to show the problems and paradoxes attendant upon the six virtues he examines: holiness, temperance, chastity, friendship, justice, and courtesy. Although few at his time would deny the virtue of holiness, Spenser can still suggest that it might need, or lead to, the other virtues, and when he comes to the remaining five he is willing to show their limits and their need of correction by yet others. In all cases his knights, and especially the usually less than brilliant St. George, make terrible mistakes. Through these knights' errors Spenser implies that we live in a world that makes virtuous action difficult because perceiving what is good, or even simply knowing what is going on, is often harder than wanting to be good. Spenser's readers may (and perhaps should) find his allegory confusing, but his knights are usually just as confused. Eventually both hero and reader realize what is happening, but each experiences the error and puzzlement that, for Spenser, characterize human life.

The first three books of The Faerie Queene were published in 1590 with an appended letter to Sir Walter Raleigh in which Spenser outlines his designs for the epic; some modern editions print it as a preface and others, including this anthology, as the "annex" Spenser himself called it.

from The Faerie Queene

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE FAERIE QUEENE
CONTAYNING THE LEGENDE OF THE KNIGHT OF
THE RED CROSSE, OR OF HOLINESSE

Lo I the man, whose Muse¹ whilome^o did formerly
maske,
As time her taught, in lowly Shepherds weeds,^o garments
Am now enforst a far unfitter taske,
For trumpets sterne to chaunge mine Oaten reeds,²
5 And sing of Knights and Ladies gentle^o deeds; noble
Whose prayes having slept in silence long,

¹ Muse One of the nine goddesses who preside over the arts and sciences. In line 10 it seems that Spenser is referring either to Clio, the Muse of history, or Calliope, the Muse of epic.

² Oaten reeds I.e., the shepherd's pipe, the symbol of pastoral poetry. Spenser exchanges these pipes for the trumpet, the symbol of heroic poetry.

Me, all too meane,^o the sacred Muse common
areeds^o advises
To blazon^o broad^o emongst her learned proclaim / abroad
throng;
Fierce warres and faithfull loves shall moralize my song.

2

10 Helpe then, O holy Virgin chiefe of nine,
Thy weaker^o Novice to performe thy will, weak
Lay forth out of thine everlasting scryne³
The antique rolles, which there lye hidden still,
Of Faerie knights and fairest Tanaquill,⁴
15 Whom that most noble Briton Prince^o so long Arthur
Sought through the world, and suffered so much ill,
That I must rue his undeserved wrong:
O helpe thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong.

³ scryne Chest for valuables, especially sacred objects such as saints' relics.

⁴ Tanaquill I.e., Gloriana, a symbolic representation of Queen Elizabeth I.

And thou most dreaded impe^o of highest Jove,¹ child

20 Faire Venus sonne, that with thy cruell dart
At that good knight so cunningly didst rove,^o shoot
That glorious fire it kindled in his hart,
Lay now thy deadly Heben^o bow apart, ebony
And with thy mother milde come to mine ayde:
25 Come both, and with you bring triumphant Mart,²
In loves and gentle jollities arrayd,
After his murderous spoiles and bloudy rage allayd.

4

And with them eke,^o O Goddesse heavenly bright, also Mirroure of grace and Majestie divine,
30 Great Lady of the greatest Isle, whose light
Like Phoebus lampe³ throughout the world doth shine,
Shed thy faire beames into my feeble eyne,^o eyes
And raise my thoughts too humble and too vile,
To thinke of that true glorious type⁴ of thine,
35 The argument^o of mine afflicted^o stile:^o topic / humble / work
The which to heare, vouchsafe, O dearest dred⁵ a-while.

CANTO I

*The Patron of true Holinesse,
Foule Errour doth defeate:
Hypocrisie him to entrappe,
Doth to his home entreate.*

1

A Gentle Knight was pricking^o on the plaine, galloping
Y cladd in mightie armes and silver shielde,
Wherein old dints of deepe wounds did remaine,
The cruell markes of many a bloudy field;
Yet armes till that time did he never wield:⁶

¹ And thou ... Jove Here Cupid is the son of Jove, Roman King of the gods, and Venus, goddess of beauty and love. Cupid's father is sometimes said to be Hermes or Mars rather than Jove.

² Mart Mars, god of war and one of Venus's lovers.

³ Phoebus lampe I.e., the sun (Phoebus Apollo is god of the sun).

⁴ that ... type Gloriana.

⁵ dred Object of reverence.

⁶ Y cladd ... wield The knight wears the "whole armor of God" (Ephesians 13-17), worn by those who struggle against sin. Though the armor itself bears marks from many battles, this particular knight has never fought in it before.

His angry steede did chide his foming bitt,
As much disdayning to the curbe to yield:
Full jolly^o knight he seemd, and faire did sitt, handsome
As one for knightly giusts^o and fierce encounters fitt. jousts

2

10 But on his brest a bloudie Crosse he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lord,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he wore,
And dead as living ever him ador'd:
Upon his shield the like was also scor'd,
15 For soveraine^o hope, which in his helpe he had: greatest
Right faithfull true he was in deede and word,
But of his cheere^o did seeme too solemne demeanor
sad;^o serious
Yet nothing did he dread, but ever was ydrad.^o dreaded

3

Upon a great adventure he was bond,
20 That greatest Gloriana to him gave,
That greatest Glorious Queene of Faerie lond,
To winne him worship,^o and her grace to have, renown
Which of all earthly things he most did crave;
And ever as he rode, his hart did earne^o yearn
25 To prove his puissance^o in battell brave strength
Upon his foe, and his new force to learne;
Upon his foe, a Dragon horrible and stearne.

4

A lovely Ladie rode him faire beside,
Upon a lowly Asse more white then snow,
30 Yet she much whiter, but the same did hide
Under a vele, that wimpled^o was full low, folded
And over all a blacke stole she did throw,
As one that inly mournd: so was she sad,
And hevie sat upon her palfrey slow:
35 Seemèd in heart some hidden care she had,
And by her in a line a milke white lambe she lad.

5

So pure and innocent, as that same lambe,
She was in life and every vertuous lore,
And by descent from Royall lynage came
40 Of ancient Kings and Queenes, that had of yore
Their scepters stretcht from East to Western shore,

And all the world in their subjection held;
 Till that infernall feend with foule uprore
 Forwasted° all their land, and them expeld: lay waste
 45 Whom to avenge, she had this Knight from far compeld.

6

Behind her farre away a Dwarfe did lag,
 That lasie seemd in being ever last,
 Or wearied with bearing of her bag
 Of needments at his backe. Thus as they past,
 50 The day with cloudes was suddeine overcast,
 And angry Jove an hideous storme of raine
 Did poure into his Lemans lap¹ so fast,
 That every wight° to shrowd° it did creature / cover
 constrain,° impel
 And this faire couple eke to shroud themselves were fain.° eager

7

55 Enforst to seeke some covert° nigh at hand, shelter
 A shadie grove not far away they spide,
 That promist ayde° the tempest to withstand: aid
 Whose loftie trees yclad with sommers pride,
 Did spred so broad, that heavens light did hide,
 60 Not perceable² with power of any starre:
 And all within were pathes and alleies wide,
 With footing worne, and leading inward farre:
 Faire harbour that them seemes; so in they entred arre.

8

And foorth they passe, with pleasure forward led,
 65 Joying to heare the birdes sweete harmony,
 Which therein shrouded from the tempest dred,
 Seemd in their song to scorne the cruell sky.
 Much can° they prayse the trees so straight and hy, did
 The sayling Pine, the Cedar proud and tall,
 70 The vine-prop Elme, the Poplar never dry,
 The builder Oake, sole king of forrests all,
 The Aspine good for staves, the Cypressse funeral.

9

The Laurell, meed° of mightie Conquerours reward
 And Poets sage, the Firre that weepeth³ still,° continuously

75 The Willow worne of forlorne Paramours,
 The Eugh° obedient to the benders will, yew
 The Birch for shaftes,° the Sallow for the mill, lances
 The Mirrhe sweete bleeding in the bitter wound,
 The warlike Beech, the Ash for nothing ill,
 80 The fruitfull Olive, and the Platane° round, plane-tree
 The carver Holme,° the Maple seeldom inward holly sound.

10

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way,
 Untill the blustering storme is overblowne;
 When weening° to returne, whence they expecting
 did stray,
 85 They cannot finde that path, which first was showne,
 But wander too and fro in wayes unknowne,
 Furthest from end then, when they neerest weene,
 That makes them doubt, their wits be not their owne:
 So many pathes, so many turnings seene,
 90 That which of them to take, in diverse doubt they been.

11

At last resolving forward still to fare,
 Till that some end they finde or in or out,
 That path they take, that beaten seemd most bare,
 And like to lead the labyrinth about;° out from 95 Which when by tract they hunted had throughout,
 At length it brought them to a hollow cave,
 Amid the thickest woods. The Champion stout Eftsoones° dismounted from his courser soon afterwards
 brave,
 And to the Dwarfe a while his needlesse spere he gave.

12

100 Be well aware, quoth then that Ladie milde,
 Least suddaine mischief ye too rash provoke:
 The danger hid, the place unknowne and wilde,
 Breedes dreadfull doubts: Oft fire is without smoke,
 And perill without show: therefore your stroke
 105 Sir knight with-hold, till further triall made.
 Ah Ladie (said he) shame were to revoke° withdraw
 The forward footing for° an hidden shade: because of Vertue gives her selfe light, through darkenesse for to wade.

² perceable Able to be perceived.

³ weepeth I.e., by exuding resin.

13

Yea but (quoth she) the perill of this place

110 I better wor^o then you, though now too late know

To wish you backe returne with foule disgrace,

Yet wisdomes warnes, whilst foot is in the gate,

To stay the steppe, ere forcèd to retrate.

This is the wandring wood, this Errours den,

115 A monster vile, whom God and man does hate:

Therefore I read^o beware. Fly fly (quoth then declare

The fearefull Dwarfe:) this is no place for living men.

14

But full of fire and greedy hardiment,^o daring

The youthfull knight could not for ought be staide,

120 But forth unto the darksome hole he went,

And looked in: his glistring armor made

A litle glooming light, much like a shade,

By which he saw the ugly monster plaine,

Halfe like a serpent horribly displaide,

125 But th'other halfe did womans shape retaine,

Most lothsom, filthie, foule, and full of vile

disdaine.^o loathsomeness

15

And as she lay upon the durtye ground,

Her huge long taile her den all overspred,

Yet was in knots and many boughtes^o upwound, coils

130 Pointed with mortall sting. Of her there bred

A thousand yong ones, which she dayly fed,

Sucking upon her poisonous dugs, each one

Of sundry shapes, yet all ill favored:

Soone as that uncouth^o light upon them shone, unfamiliar

135 Into her mouth they crept, and suddain all were gone.

16

Their dam^o upstart, out of her den effraide,^o mother / alarmed

And rushèd forth, hurling her hideous taile

About her cursèd head, whose folds displaid

Were stretcht now forth at length without entraile.^o coil

140 She lookt about, and seeing one in mayle

Armèd to point,^o sought backe to turne againe; completely

For light she hated as the deadly bale,^o injury

Ay^o wont^o in desert darknesse to ever / accustomed

remaine,

Where plaine^o none might her see, nor she see any plainly
plaine.

17

145 Which when the valiant Elfe¹ perceiv'd, he lept

As Lyon fierce upon the flying pray,

And with his trenchand^o blade her boldly kept cutting

From turning backe, and forcèd her to stay:

Therewith enrag'd she loudly gan to bray,

150 And turning fierce, her speckled taile advaunst,

Threatning her angry sting, him to dismay:^o defeat

Who nought aghast, his mightie hand^o raised up

enhaunst:

The stroke down from her head vnto her shoulder
glaunst.

18

Much daunted with that dint, her sence was dazd,

155 Yet kindling rage, her selfe she gathered round,

And all attonce^o her beastly body raizd at once

With doubled forces high above the ground:

Tho^o wrapping up her wrethèd^o sterne then / coiled arownd,

Lept fierce upon his shield, and her huge traine^o tail

160 All suddenly about his body wound,

That hand or foot to stirre he strove in vaine:

God helpe the man so wrapt in Errours endlesse traine.

19

His Lady sad to see his sore constraint,

Cride out, Now now Sir knight, shew what ye bee,

165 Add faith unto your force, and be not faint:

Strangle her, else she sure will strangle thee.

That when he heard, in great perplexitie,

His gall^o did grate for grieve and high spirit
disdaine,^o anger

And knitting all his force got one hand free,

170 Wherewith he grypt her gorge with so great paine,

That soone to loose her wicked bands did her constraine.

20

Therewith she spewd out of her filthy maw^o mouth

A floud of poyson horrible and blacke,

¹ valiant Elfe I.e., the Redcrosse Knight (who is from Fairyland, and not yet discovered to be English).

175 Full of great lumpes of flesh and gobbets raw,
Which stunck so vildly,^o that it forst him slacke vilely
His grasping hold, and from her turne him backe:
Her vomit full of bookes and papers was,¹
With loathly frogs and toades, which eyes did lacke,
And creeping sought way in the weedy gras:
180 Her filthy parbreake^o all the place defilèd has. vomit

21
As when old father Nilus^o gins to swell Nile river
With timely^o pride above the Aegyptian vale, seasonal
His fattie^o waves do fertile slime outwell,^o rich / gush forth
And overflow each plaine and lowly dale:
185 But when his later spring gins to avale,^o subside
Huge heapes of mudd he leaves, wherein there breed
Ten thousand kindes of creatures, partly male
And partly female of his fruitfull seed;
Such ugly monstrous shapes elsewhere may no man reed.^o see

22
190 The same so sore annoyèd has the knight,
That welnigh choked with the deadly stinke,
His forces faile, ne can no longer fight.
Whose corage when the feend perceiv'd to shrinke,
She pourèd forth out of her hellish sinke
195 Her fruitfull cursèd spawne of serpents small,
Deformèd monsters, fowle, and blacke as inke,
Which swarming all about his legs did crall,
And him encombred sore, but could not hurt at all.

23
As gentle Shepheard in sweete even-tide,
200 When ruddy Phoebus gins to welke^o in west, set
High on an hill, his flocke to vewen wide,
Markes^o which do byte their hasty supper best; notes
A cloud of combrous gnattes do him molest,
All striving to infixe their feeble stings,
205 That from their noyance he no where can rest,
But with his clownish^o hands their tender wings rustic
He brusheth oft, and oft doth mar their murmurings.

24
Thus ill bestedd,^o and fearefull more of shame, situated
Then of the certaine perill he stood in,
210 Halfe furious unto his foe he came,
Resolv'd in minde all suddenly to win,
Or soone to lose, before he once would lin;^o cease
And strooke at her with more then manly force,
That from her body full of filthie sin
215 He raft^o her hatefull head without remorse; cut off
A streame of cole black bloud forth gushed from her corse.

25
Her scattred brood, soone as their Parent deare
They saw so rudely^o falling to the ground, violently
Groning full deadly, all with troublous feare,
220 Gathred themselves about her body round,
Weening^o their wonted entrance to have found believing
At her wide mouth: but being there withstood
They flockèd all about her bleeding wound,
And suckèd up their dying mothers blood,
225 Making her death their life, and eke her hurt their good.

26
That detestable sight him much amazde,
To see th'unkindly Impes^o of heaven unnatural offspring
accurst,
Devoure their dam; on whom while so he gazd,
Having all satisfide their bloody thirst,
230 Their bellies swolne he saw with fulnesse burst,
And bowels gushing forth: well worthy end
Of such as drunke her life, the which them nurst;
Now needeth him no lenger labour spend,
His foes have slaine themselves, with whom he should contend.

27
235 His Ladie seeing all, that chaunst, from farre
Approcht in hast to greet his victorie,
And said, Faire knight, borne under happy starre,
Who see your vanquisht foes before you lye:
Well worthy be you of that Armorie,^o armor
240 Wherein ye have great glory wonne this day,
And proov'd your strength on a strong enimie,
Your first adventure: many such I pray,
And henceforth ever wish, that like succeed it may.

28

Then mounted he upon his Steede againe,

245 And with the Lady backward sought to wend;^o travel

That path he kept, which beaten was most plaine,

Ne ever would to any by-way bend,

But still did follow one unto the end,

The which at last out of the wood them brought.

250 So forward on his way (with God to^o frend^o) as / friend

He passèd forth, and new adventure sought;

Long way he travellèd, before he heard of ought.

29

At length they chaunst to meet upon the way

An agèd Sire, in long blacke weedes yclad,

255 His feete all bare, his beard all hoarie gray,

And by his belt his booke he hanging had;

Sober he seemde, and very sagely sad,^o serious

And to the ground his eyes were lowly bent,

Simple in shew, and voyde of malice bad,

260 And all the way he prayèd, as he went,

And often knockt his brest, as one that did repent.

30

He faire the knight saluted, louting^o low,Who faire him quited,^o as that courteous was: *bowing*And after askèd him, if he did know returned

265 Of straunge adventures, which abroad did pas.

Ah my deare Sonne (quoth he) how should, alas,

Silly^o old man, that lives in hidden cell, *simple*Bidding his beades¹ all day for his trespas,

Tydings of warre and worldly trouble tell?

270 With holy father sits not with such things to mell.^o meddle

31

But if of daunger which hereby doth dwell,

And homebred evill ye desire to heare,

Of a straunge man I can you tidings tell,

That wasteth all this countrey farre and neare.

275 Of such (said he) I chiefly do inquere,

And shall you well reward to shew the place,

In which that wicked wight his dayes doth weare:^o *spend*For to all knighthood it is foule disgrace,
That such a cursèd creature lives so long a space.

32

280 Far hence (quoth he) in wastfull^o wildernesses barren

His dwelling is, by which no living wight

May ever passe, but thorough great distresse.

Now (sayd the Lady) draweth toward night,

And well I wote,^o that of your later^o fight know / recent

285 Ye all forwearied be: for what so strong,

But wanting rest will also want of might?

The Sunne that measures heaven all day long,

At night doth baite^o his steedes the Ocean refresh
waves emong.

33

Then with the Sunne take Sir, your timely rest,

290 And with new day new worke at once begin:

Untroubled night they say gives counsell best.

Right well Sir knight ye have advisèd bin,

(Quoth then that agèd man;) the way to win

Is wisely to advise:^o now day is spent; consider

295 Therefore with me ye may take up your In

For this same night. The knight was well content:

So with that godly father to his home they went.

34

A little lowly Hermitage it was,

Downe in a dale, hard by a forests side,

300 Far from resort of people, that did pas

In travell to and froe: a little wyde^o *apart*There was an holy Chappell edifyde,^o *built*Wherein the Hermite dewly wont^o to say was accustomed

His holy things each morne and eventyde:

305 Thereby a Christall streame did gently play,

Which from a sacred fountaine wellèd forth alway.

35

Arrivèd there, the little house they fill,

Ne looke for entertainment, where none was:

Rest is their feast, and all things at their will;

The noblest mind the best contentment has.

310 With faire discourse the evening so they pas:

For that old man of pleasing wordes had store,

And well could file his tongue as smooth as glas;

¹ Bidding his beades I.e., praying with the aid of rosary beads. These beads, each of which represents a prayer, are counted off as each prayer is completed.

He told of Saintes and Popes, and evermore
 315 He strowd an *Ave-Mary*¹ after and before.

36
 The drouping Night thus creepeth on them fast,
 And the sad humour² loading their eye liddes,
 As messenger of Morpheus on them cast
 Sweet slombring deaw,^o the which to sleepe dew
 them biddes.
 320 Unto their lodgings then his guestes he riddes:^o leads Where when all drownd in deadly^o sleepe death-like
 he findes,
 He to his study goes, and there amiddes
 His Magick bookes and artes of sundry kindes,
 He seekes out mighty charmes, to trouble sleepy mindes.

37
 325 Then choosing out few wordes most horrible,
 (Let none them read) thereof did verses frame,
 With which and other spelles like terrible,
 He bad awake blacke Plutoes griesly Dame,³
 And cursèd heaven, and spake reprochfull shame
 330 Of highest God, the Lord of life and light;
 A bold bad man, that dar'd to call by name
 Great Gorgon,⁴ Prince of darknesse and dead night,
 At which Cocytus quakes, and Styx⁵ is put to flight.

38
 And forth he cald out of deepe darknesse dred
 335 Legions of Sprights, the which like little flyes
 Fluttring about his ever damnèd hed,
 A-waite whereto their service he applyes,
 To aide his friends, or fray^o his enimies: frighten
 Of those he chose out two, the falsest twoo,
 340 And fittest for to forge true-seeming lyes;
 The one of them he gave a message too,
 The other by him selfe staide other worke to doo.

¹ Ave-Mary I.e., "Hail, Mary!," a prayer to the Virgin Mary.

² sad humour Heavy moisture, sent by Morpheus, god of sleep.

³ Plutoes griesly Dame Persephone, or Proserpine, wife of Pluto and goddess of the underworld.

⁴ Gorgon Demogorgon, a pseudo-classical demon of the underworld, associated with the early days of creation.

⁵ Cocytus ... Styx Two rivers of the underworld.

39
 He making speedy way through persèd^o ayre, dispersed
 And through the world of waters wide and deepe,
 345 To Morpheus house doth hastily repaire.
 Amid the bowels of the earth full steepe,
 And low, where dawning day doth never peepe,
 His dwelling is; there Tethys⁶ his wet bed
 Doth ever wash, and Cynthia⁷ still^o continually doth steepe
 350 In silver deaw his ever-drouping hed, Whiles sad^o Night over him her mantle black grave
 doth spred.

40
 Whose double gates he findeth lockèd fast,
 The one faire fram'd of burnisht Yvory,
 The other all with silver overcast;
 355 And wakefull dogges before them farre do lye,
 Watching to banish Care their enemy,
 Who oft is wont to trouble gentle Sleepe.
 By them the Sprite doth passe in quietly,
 And unto Morpheus comes, whom drownèd deepe
 360 In drowsie fit he findes: of nothing he takes keepe.^o notice

41
 And more, to lulle him in his slumber soft,
 A trickling streame from high rocke tumbling downe
 And ever-drizling raine upon the loft,
 Mixt with a murmuring winde, much like the sowne^o sound
 365 Of swarming Bees, did cast him in a swowne:^o swoon
 No other noyse, nor peoples troublous cries,
 As still are wont t'annoy the wallèd towne,
 Might there be heard: but carelesse^o Quiet lyes, without care
 Wrapt in eternall silence farre from enemyes.

42
 370 The messenger approaching to him spake,
 But his wast^o wordes returnd to him in vaine: wasted
 So sound he slept, that nought mought^o might him awake.
 Then rudely he him thrust, and pusht with paine,
 Whereat he gan to stretch: but he againe

⁶ Tethys Goddess of the sea.

⁷ Cynthia Goddess of the moon.

375 Shooke him so hard, that forcèd him to speake.
 As one then in a dreame, whose dryer braine
 Is tost with troubled sights and fancies weake,
 He mumbled soft, but would not all his silence breake.

43

The Sprite then gan more boldly him to wake,
 380 And threatned unto him the dreaded name
 Of Hecate:¹ whereat he gan to quake,
 And lifting up his lumpish head, with blame
 Halfe angry asked him, for what he came.
 Hither (quoth he) me Archimago² sent,
 385 He that the stubborne Sprites can wisely tame,
 He bids thee to him send for his intent
 A fit false dreame, that can delude the sleepers sent.

44

The God obeyde, and calling forth straight way
 A diverse^o dreame out of his prison darke, diverting
 390 Delivered it to him, and downe did lay
 His heaue head, deuoid of carefull carke,³
 Whose sences all were straight benumbd and starke.
 He backe returning by the Yvorie dore,
 Remounted up as light as chearefull Larke,
 395 And on his litle winges the dreame he bore
 In hast unto his Lord, where he him left afore.

45

Who all this while with charmes and hidden artes,
 Had made a Lady of that other Spright,
 And fram'd of liquid ayre her tender partes
 400 So lively, and so like in all mens sight,
 That weaker sence it could have ravisht quight:
 The maker selfe for all his wondrous witt,
 Was nigh beguiled with so goodly sight:
 Her all in white he clad, and over it
 405 Cast a blacke stole, most like to seeme for Una⁴ fit.

46

Now when that ydle dreame was to him brought,
 Unto that Elfin knight he bad him fly,
 Where he slept soundly void of evill thought,
 And with false shewes abuse his fantasy,
 410 In sort as he him schoolèd privily:
 And that new creature borne without her dew,⁵
 Full of the makers guile, with usage sly
 He taught to imitate that Lady trew,
 Whose semblance she did carrie under feignèd hew.^o figure

47

Thus well instructed, to their worke they hast,
 And comming where the knight in slomber lay,
 The one upon his hardy head him plast,
 And made him dreame of loves and lustfull play,
 That nigh his manly hart did melt away,
 420 Bathèd in wanton blis and wicked joy:
 Then seemèd him his Lady by him lay,
 And to him playnd,^o how that false complained wingèd boy,⁶
 Her chaste hart had subdewd, to learne Dame pleasures toy.^o play

48

And she her selfe of beautie soveraigne Queene,
 425 Faire Venus seemde unto his bed to bring
 Her, whom he waking evermore did weene,
 To be the chastest flowre, that ay^o did spring ever
 On earthly braunch, the daughter of a king,
 Now a loose Leman to vile service bound:
 430 And eke the Graces⁷ seemèd all to sing,
Hymen iô Hymen, dauncing all around,
 Whilst freshest Flora⁸ her with Yvie girlond crownd.

49

In this great passion of unwonted lust,
 Or wonted feare of doing ought amis,

¹ Hecate Greek goddess of the crossroads, often perceived as evil and linked to witchcraft.

² Archimago Meaning both arch-image maker and arch-magician in Latin.

³ carefull I.e., full of care; carke Anxiety, distress.

⁴ Una From unus, the Latin word for one or unity.

⁵ without her dew I.e., unnaturally.

⁶ wingèd boy I.e., Cupid.

⁷ the Graces Handmaids of Venus who personify pleasure, courtesy, and beauty. Here they sing a hymn to Hymen, the god of weddings, in celebration of the pleasures of the marriage bed.

⁸ Flora Goddess of flowers.

435 He started up, as seeming to mistrust,
 Some secret ill, or hidden foe of his:
 Lo there before his face his Lady is,
 Under blake stole hyding her bayted hooke,
 And as halfe blushing offred him to kis,
 440 With gentle blandishment and lovely looke,
 Most like that virgin true, which for her knight him took.

50

All cleane dismayd to see so uncouth sight,
 And halfe enraged at her shamelesse guise,
 He thought have slaine her in his fierce despight:° indignation
 445 But hasty heat tempring with sufferance wise,
 He stayde his hand, and gan himselfe advise
 To prove his sense, and tempt her faignèd truth.
 Wringing her hands in wemens pitteous wise,
 Tho can° she weepe, to stirre up gentle did
 ruth,° compassion
 450 Both for her noble bloud, and for her tender youth.

51

And said, Ah Sir, my liege Lord and my love,
 Shall I accuse the hidden cruell fate,
 And mightie causes wrought in heaven above,
 Or the blind God, that doth me thus amate,° dismay 455 For° hopèd love to winne me certaine hate? in place of
 Yet thus perforce he bids me do, or die.
 Die is my dew:° yet rew° my wretched state due / pity
 You, whom my hard avenging destinie
 Hath made judge of my life or death indifferently.

52

460 Your owne deare sake forst me at first to leave
 My Fathers kingdome,—There she stopt with teares;
 Her swollen hart her speach seemd to bereave,
 And then againe begun, My weaker yeares
 Captiv'd to fortune and frayle worldly feares,
 465 Fly to your faith for succour and sure ayde:
 Let me not dye in languor° and long teares. distress
 Why Dame (quoth he) what hath ye thus dismayd?
 What frayes° ye, that were wont to comfort frightens
 me affrayd?

53

Love of your selfe, she said, and deare° constraint dire
 470 Lets me not sleepe, but wast the wearie night
 In secret anguish and unpittied plaint,
 Whiles you in carelesse sleepe are drownèd quight.
 Her doubtfull words made that redoubted° distinguished knight
 Suspect her truth: yet since no untruth he knew,
 475 Her fawning love with foule disdainefull spight
 He would not shend,° but said, Deare dame reprove
 I rew,
 That for my sake unknowne such grieve unto you grew.

54

Assure your selfe, it fell not all to ground;
 For all so deare as life is to my hart,
 480 I deeme your love, and hold me to you bound;
 Ne let vaine feares procure your needlesse smart,° suffering
 Where cause is none, but to your rest depart.
 Not all content, yet seemd she to appease
 Her mournefull plaintes, beguiled° of her art, foiled
 485 And fed with words, that could not chuse but please,
 So slyding softly forth, she turnd as to her ease.

55

Long after lay he musing at her mood,
 Much griev'd to thinke that gentle Dame so light,° immoral
 For whose defence he was to shed his blood.
 490 At last dull wearinesse of former fight
 Having yrockt a sleepe his irkesome° weary spright,° spirit
 That troublous dreame gan freshly tosse his braine,
 With bowres, and beds, and Ladies deare delight:
 But when he saw his labour all was vaine,
 495 With that misformèd spright¹ he backe returnd againe.

CANTO 2

*The guilefull great Enchaunter parts
 The Redcrosse Knight from Truth:
 Into whose stead faire falshood steps,
 And workes him wofull ruth.*

¹ that misformèd spright I.e., the spirit disguised as Una.

1

By this the Northerne wagoner¹ had set
 His sevenfold teme behind the stedfast starre,
 That was in Ocean waves yet never wet,
 But firme is fixt, and sendeth light from farre
 5 To all, that in the wide deepe wandring arre:
 And chearefull Chaunticlere^o with his note shrill rooster
 Had warned once, that Phoebus fiery carre^o chariot
 In hast was climbing up the Easterne hill,
 Full envious that night so long his roome did fill.

2

10 When those accursèd messengers of hell,
 That feigning dreame, and that faire-forgèd Spright
 Came to their wicked maister, and gan tell
 Their bootelesse^o paines, and ill succeeding night: useless
 Who all in rage to see his skilfull might 15 Deluded so, gan threaten hellish paine
 And sad Proserpines wrath, them to affright.
 But when he saw his threatning was but vaine,
 He cast about, and searcht his balefull^o destructive bookes againe.

3

Eftsoones he tooke that miscreated faire,
 20 And that false other Spright, on whom he spred
 A seeming body of the subtile aire,
 Like a young Squire, in loves and lusty-hed
 His wanton dayes that ever loosely led,
 Without regard of armes and dreaded fight:
 25 Those two he tooke, and in a secret bed,
 Covered with darknesse and misdeeming^o misleading
 night,
 Them both together laid, to joy in vaine delight.

4

Forthwith he runnes with feignèd faithfull hast
 Unto his guest, who after troublous sights
 30 And dreames, gan now to take more sound repast,^o repose
 Whom suddenly he wakes with fearefull frights,

As one aghast with feends or damnèd sprights,
 And to him cals, Rise rise unhappy Swaine,^o lover
 That here wex^o old in sleepe, whiles wicked grow
 wights

35 Have knit themselves in Venus shamefull chaine;
 Come see, where your false Lady doth her honour staine.

5

All in amaze he suddenly up start
 With sword in hand, and with the old man went;
 Who soone him brought into a secret part,
 40 Where that false couple were full closely ment^o joined
 In wanton lust and lewd embracèment:
 Which when he saw, he burnt with gealous fire,
 The eye of reason was with rage yblent,^o blinded
 And would have slaine them in his furious ire, 45 But hardly was restrained of^o that agèd sire. by

6

Returning to his bed in torment great,
 And bitter anguish of his guiltie sight,
 He could not rest, but did his stout heart eat,
 And wast his inward gall with deepe despight,
 50 Yrkesome of life, and too long lingring night.
 At last faire Hesperus² in highest skie
 Had spent his lampe, and brought forth dawning light,
 Then up he rose, and clad him hastily;
 The Dwarfe him brought his steed: so both away do fly.

7

Now when the rosy-fingred Morning faire,
 Weary of agèd Tithones³ saffron bed,
 Had spred her purple robe through deawy aire,
 And the high hils Titan^o discovered, the sun
 The royall virgin shooke off drowsy-hed,
 60 And rising forth out of her baser bowre,
 Lookt for her knight, who far away was fled,
 And for her Dwarfe, that wont to wait each houre;
 Then gan she waile and weepe, to see that woefull
 stowre.^o plight

¹ Northerne wagoner Constellation, probably Ursa Major (in England also called "Charles's Wain," or cart), imagined as a farmer guiding a wagon. The "stedfast starre" that never sets in the ocean, however, is the North Star, in the nearby Ursa Minor.

² Hesperus Venus as the morning or evening star.

³ agèd Tithones Husband of the goddess of the dawn, Aurora. Aurora asked Jupiter to give the mortal Tithonus eternal life, but forgot to ask for eternal youth.

8

And after him she rode with so much speede
 65 As her slow beast could make; but all in vaine:
 For him so far had borne his light-foot steede,
 Prickèd with wrath and fiery fierce disdainē,
 That him to follow was but fruitlesse paine;
 Yet she her weary limbes would never rest,
 70 But every hill and dale, each wood and plaine
 Did search, sore grievèd in her gentle brest,
 He so ungently left her, whom she lovèd best.

9

But subtill Archimago, when his guests
 He saw divided into double parts,
 75 And Una wandring in woods and forrests,
 Th'end of his drift,^o he praisd his divelish arts,
 That had such might over true meaning harts;
 Yet rests not so, but other meanes doth make,
 How he may worke unto her further smarts:
 80 For her he hated as the hissing snake,
 And in her many troubles did most pleasure take.

10

He then devisde himselfe how to disguise;
 For by his mightie science^o he could take
 As many formes and shapes in seeming wise,¹ 85 As ever Proteus² to himselfe could make:
 Sometime a fowle, sometime a fish in lake,
 Now like a foxe, now like a dragon fell,^o
 That of himselfe he oft for feare would quake,
 And oft would flie away. O who can tell 90 The hidden power of herbes, and might of Magicke spell?

11

But now seemde best, the person to put on
 Of that good knight, his late beguiled guest:
 In mighty armes he was yclad anon,
 And silver shield upon his coward brest
 95 A bloody crosse, and on his craven^o crest^o
 A bouch of haire discoloured diversly:
 Full jolly knight he seemde, and well address^o, armed

And when he sate upon his courser free,
 Saint George himselfe would have deemèd him to be.

12

But he the knight, whose semblaunt he did beare,
 The true Saint George was wandred far away,
 Still flying from his thoughts and gealous feare;
 Will was his guide, and grieve led him astray.
 At last him chaunst to meete upon the way
 105 A faithlesse Sarazin³ all arm'd to point,
 In whose great shield was writ with letters gay
Sans foy,⁴ full large of limbe and every joint
 He was, and carèd not for God or man a point.

13

He had a faire companion of his way,
 110 A goodly Lady clad in scarlot red,
 Purfled^o with gold and pearle of rich assay,^o decorated quality
 And like a Persian mitre^o on her hed
 She wore, with crownes and owches^o garnishèd,
 The which her lavish lovers to her gave;
 115 Her wanton palfrey all was overspred
 With tinsell trappings, woven like a wave,
 Whose bridle rung with golden bells and bosses^o brave.^o studs handsome

14

With faire disport^o and courting dalliaunce
 She intertainde her lover all the way;
 120 But when she saw the knight his speare advaunce,
 She soone left off her mirth and wanton play,
 And bad her knight addresse him to the fray:
 His foe was nigh at hand. He prickt with pride
 And hope to winne his Ladies heart that day,
 125 Forth spurred fast: adowne his coursers side
 The red blood trickling staine the way, as he did ride.

15

The knight of the Redcrosse when him he spide,
 Spurring so hote with rage dispiteous,^o
 Gan fairely couch his speare, and towards ride:
 130 Soone meete they both, both fell and furious,
 That daunted with their forces hideous,

¹ in seeming wise In the matter of seeming; i.e., in appearance.

² Proteus Sea god able to change his shape at will.

³ Sarazin I.e., Saracen, a Muslim (but representing Catholicism).

⁴ Sans foy French: Without faith.

135 Their steeds do stagger, and amazed stand,
And eke themselves too rudely rigorous,
Astonied with the stroke of their owne hand,
Do backe rebut,^o and each to other yeeldeth land. retreat

16

As when two rams stird with ambitious pride,
Fight for the rule of the rich fleecèd flocke,
Their hornèd fronts so fierce on either side
Do meete, that with the terroure of the shooke
140 Astonied both, stand sencelesse as a blocke,
Forgetfull of the hanging victory:
So stood these twaine, unmovèd as a rocke,
Both staring fierce, and holding idely
The broken reliques of their former cruelty.

17

145 The Sarazin sore daunted with the buffe
Snatcheth his sword, and fiercely to him flies;
Who well it wards, and quyteth^o cuff with cuff: requisites
Each others equall puissaunce envies,
And through their iron sides with cruell spies^o glances
150 Does seeke to perce: repining courage yields
No foote to foe. The flashing fier flies
As from a forge out of their burning shields,
And streames of purple bloud new dies the verdant fields.

18

Curse on that Crosse (quoth then the Sarazin)
155 That keepe thy body from the bitter fit;¹
Dead long ygoe I wote thou haddest bin,
Had not that charme from thee forwarnèd^o it: prevented
But yet I warne thee now assurèd sitt,
And hide thy head. Therewith upon his crest
160 With rigour so outrageous he smitt,
That a large share it hewd out of the rest,
And glauncing downe his shield, from blame^o harm
him fairely blest.^o protected

19

Who thereat wondrous wroth, the sleeping spark
Of native vertue^o gan eftsoones revive, strength
165 And at his haughtie helmet making mark,

¹ bitter fit I.e., death.

So hugely stroke, that it the steele did rive,^o rend
And cleft his head. He tumbling downe alive,
With bloudy mouth his mother earth did kis,
Greeting his grave: his grudging ghost did strive 170 With the fraile flesh; at last it flitted is,
Whither the soules do fly of men, that live amis.

20

The Lady when she saw her champion fall,
Like the old ruines of a broken towre,
Staid not to waile his woefull funerall,
175 But from him fled away with all her powre;
Who after her as hastily gan scowre,^o run
Bidding the Dwarfe with him to bring away
The Sarazins shield, signe of the conqueroure.
Her soone he overtooke, and bad to stay,
180 For present cause was none of dread her to dismay.

21

She turning backe with ruefull countenance,
Cride, Mercy mercy Sir vouchsafe to show
On silly Dame, subiect to hard mischaunce,
And to your mighty will. Her humblesse low 185 In so ritch weedes^o and seeming glorious show, clothes
Did much emmove his stout heroicke heart,
And said, Deare dame, your suddein overthrow
Much rueth^o me; but now put feare apart, grieves
And tell, both who ye be, and who that tooke your part.

22

190 Melting in teares, then gan she thus lament;
The wretched woman, whom unhappy howre
Hath now made thrall^o to your commandement, enslaved
Before that angry heavens list to lowre,^o scowl
And fortune false betraide me to your powre, 195 Was, (O what now availeth that I was!)
Borne the sole daughter of an Emperour,
He that the wide West under his rule has,
And high hath set his throne, where Tiberis doth pas.²

² where ... pas Rome (the seat of Roman Catholicism), through which the river Tiber runs. The prince to whom the lady claims to have been betrothed is Christ.

23

He in the first flowre of my freshest age,
 200 Betrothèd me unto the onely haire
 Of a most mighty king, most rich and sage;
 Was never Prince so faithfull and so faire,
 Was never Prince so meeke and debonaire;
 But ere my hopèd day of spousall shone,
 205 My dearest Lord fell from high honours staire,
 Into the hands of his accursèd fone,^o
 And cruelly was slaine, that shall I ever mone.

24

His blessed body spoild of lively breath,
 Was afterward, I know not how, convoid
 210 And fro me hid: of whose most innocent death
 When tidings came to me unhappy maid,
 O how great sorrow my sad soule assaid.^o
 Then forth I went his woefull corse to find,
 And many yeares throughout the world I straid,
 215 A virgin widow, whose deepe wounded mind
 With love, long time did languish as the stricken

25

At last it chauncèd this proud Sarazin
 To meete me wandring, who perforce^o me led 220 With him away, but yet could never win
 The Fort, that Ladies hold in soveraigne dread.
 There lies he now with foule dishonour dead,
 Who whiles he liv'd, was callèd proud Sans foy,
 The eldest of three brethren, all three bred
 Of one bad sire, whose youngest is Sans joy,^o
 225 And twixt them both was borne the bloudy bold Sans

26

In this sad plight, friendlesse, unfortunate,
 Now miserable I Fidessa¹ dwell,
 Craving of you in pittie of my state,
 To do none ill, if please ye not do well.
 230 He in great passion all this while did dwell,
 More busying his quicke eyes, her face to view,
 Then his dull eares, to heare what she did tell;

And said, Faire Lady hart of flint would rew
 The undeservèd woes and sorrowes, which ye shew.

27

Henceforth in safe assuraunce may ye rest,
 235 Having both found a new friend you to aid,
 And lost an old foe, that did you molest:
 Better new friend then an old foe is said.
 With chaunge of cheare the seeming simple maid
 240 Let fall her eyen, as shamefast to the earth,
 And yeelding soft, in that she nought gain-said,
 So forth they rode, he feining seemely merth,
 And she coy lookes: so dainty^o they say maketh derth.^o

*valuable

28

Long time they thus together travellèd,
 245 Till weary of their way, they came at last,
 Where grew two goodly trees, that faire did spred
 Their armes abroad, with gray mosse overcast,
 And their greene leaves trembling with every blast,^o
 Made a calme shadow far in compasse round:
 250 The fearefull Shepheard often there aghast^o
 Under them never sat, ne wont there sound
 His mery oaten pipe, but shund th'unlucky ground.

gust of windfrightened

29

But this good knight soone as he them can^o spie,
 For the coole shade him thither hastily got:
 255 For golden Phoebus now ymounted hie,
 From fiery wheelles of his faire chariot
 Hurlèd his beame so scorching cruell hot,
 That living creature mote it not abide;
 And his new Lady it endured not.
 260 There they alight, in hope themselves to hide
 From the fierce heat, and rest their weary limbs a tide.

did

30

Faire seemely pleasaunce^o each to other makes, 265 With goodly purposes there as they sit:
 And in his falsèd^o fancy he her takes
 To be the fairest wight, that livèd yit;
 Which to expresse, he bends his gentle wit,
 And thinking of those braunches greene to frame

pleasantrydeceived

A girlond for her dainty forehead fit,
 He pluckt a bough; out of whose rift there came 270 Small drops of gory bloud, that trickled downe the same.

31

Therewith a piteous yelling voyce was heard,
 Crying, O spare with guilty hands to teare
 My tender sides in this rough rynd embard,^o enclosed
 But fly, ah fly far hence away, for feare
 275 Least^o to you hap, that happened to me heare, lest
 And to this wretched Lady, my deare love,
 O too deare love, love bought with death too deare.
 Astond he stood, and up his haire did hove,^o raise
 And with that suddein horror could no member move.

32

At last whenas the dreadfull passion
 Was overpast, and manhood well awake,
 Yet musing at the straunge occasiön,
 And doubting much his sence, he thus bespake;
 What voyce of damndèd Ghost from Limbo lake,¹
 285 Or guilefull spright wandring in empty aire,
 Both which fraile men do oftentimes mistake,^o mislead
 Sends to my doubtfull eares these speaches rare,
 And ruefull plaints, me bidding guiltlesse bloud to spare?

33

Then groning deepe, Nor damned Ghost, (quoth he,) 290 Nor guilefull sprite, to thee these wordes doth speake,
 But once a man Fradubio,² now a tree,
 Wretched man, wretched tree; whose nature weake,
 A cruell witch her cursèd will to wreake,
 Hath thus transformd, and plast in open plaines,
 295 Where Boreas³ doth blow full bitter bleake,
 And scorching Sunne does dry my secret vaines:
 For though a tree I seeme, yet cold and heat me paines.

34

Say on Fradubio then, or man, or tree,
 Quoth then the knight, by whose mischievous arts
 300 Art thou misshapèd thus, as now I see?

He oft finds med'cine, who his grieve imparts;
 But double griefs afflict concealing harts,
 As raging flames who striveth to suppress.
 The author then (said he) of all my smarts,
 305 Is one Duessa⁴ a false sorceresse,
 That many errant^o knights hath brought to wandering wretchednesse.

35

In prime of youthly yeares, when corage hot
 The fire of love and joy of chevalree
 First kindled in my brest, it was my lot
 310 To love this gentle Lady, whom ye see,
 Now not a Lady, but a seeming tree;
 With whom as once I rode accompanye,
 Me chauncèd of a knight encountred bee,
 That had a like faire Lady by his syde,
 315 Like a faire Lady, but did fowle Duessa hyde.

36

Whose forgèd beauty he did take in hand,⁵
 All other Dames to have exceeded farre;
 I in defence of mine did likewise stand,
 Mine, that did then shine as the Morning starre:
 320 So both to battell fierce arraungèd arre,
 In which his harder fortune was to fall
 Under my speare: such is the dye of warre:
 His Lady left as a prise martiall,
 Did yield her comely person, to be at my call.

37

So doubly lov'd of Ladies unlike^o faire, differently
 Th'one seeming such, the other such indeede,
 One day in doubt I cast^o for to compare, resolved
 Whether in beauties glorie did excede;
 A Rosy girlond was the victors meede:
 330 Both seemde to win, and both seemde won to bee,
 So hard the discord was to be agreede.
 Frælissa⁶ was as faire, as faire mote bee,
 And ever false Duessa seemde as faire as shee.

¹ Limbo lake Afterlife realm to which the unbaptized are sent.

² Fradubio Italian: literally, Brother Doubt.

³ Boreas North wind.

⁴ Duessa Implies two, doubleness.

⁵ take in hand Maintain.

⁶ Frælissa Frailty.

38

The wicked witch now seeing all this while 335 The doubtfull ballaunce equally to sway,
 What not by right, she cast to win by guile,
 And by her hellish science raisd streightway
 A foggy mist, that overcast the day,
 And a dull blast, that breathing on her face,
 340 Dimmed her former beauties shining ray,
 And with foule ugly forme did her disgrace:
 Then was she faire alone, when none was faire in place.

39

Then cride she out, Fye, fye, deformèd wight,
 Whose borrowed beautie now appeareth plaine
 345 To have before bewitchèd all mens sight;
 O leave her soone, or let her soone be slaine.
 Her loathly visage viewing with disdaine,
 Eftsoones I thought her such, as she me told,
 And would have kild her; but with faignèd paine,
 350 The false witch did my wrathfull hand with-hold;
 So left her, where she now is turnd to treen mould.

40

Thensforth I tooke Duessa for my Dame,
 And in the witch unweeting^o joyd long time, unknowingly
 Ne ever wist, but that she was the same,
 355 Till on a day (that day is every Prime,¹
 When Witches wont do penance for their crime)
 I chaunst to see her in her proper hew,
 Bathing her selfe in origane and thyme:
 A filthy foule old woman I did vew,
 360 That ever to have toucht her, I did deadly rew.

41

Her neather partes misshapen, monstrous,
 Were hidd in water, that I could not see,
 But they did seeme more foule and hideous,
 Then womans shape man would beleewe to bee.
 365 Thensforth from her most beastly companie
 I gan refraine, in minde to slip away,
 Soone as appeard safe opportunitie:
 For danger great, if not assur'd decay
 I saw before mine eyes, if I were knowne to stray.

42

370 The divelish hag by chaunges of my cheare
 Perceiv'd my thought, and drownd in sleepe night,
 With wicked herbes and ointments did besmeare
 My bodie all, through charmes and magicke might,
 That all my senses were bereavèd quight:
 375 Then brought she me into this desert waste,
 And by my wretched lovers side me pight,^o planted
 Where now enclosd in wooden wals full faste,
 Banisht from living wights, our wearie dayes we waste.

43

But how long time, said then the Elfin knight,
 380 Are you in this misformèd house to dwell?
 We may not chaunge (quoth he) this evil plight,
 Till we be bathèd in a living well;²
 That is the terme prescribed by the spell.
 O how, said he, mote I that well out find,
 385 That may restore you to your wonted well?^o well-being
 Time and suffisèd^o fates to former kind satisfied
 Shall us restore, none else from hence may us unbynd.

44

The false Duessa, now Fidessa hight,^o called
 Heard how in vaine Fradubio did lament,
 390 And knew well all was true. But the good knight
 Full of sad feare and ghastly dreriment,^o gloom
 When all this speech the living tree had spent,
 The bleeding bough did thrust into the ground,
 That from the bloud he might be innocent,
 395 And with fresh clay did close the wooden wound:
 Then turning to his Lady, dead with feare her found.

45

Her seeming dead he found with feignèd feare,
 As all unweeting^o of that well she knew, unknowing
 And paynd himselfe with busie care to reare
 400 Her out of carelesse^o swowne. Her eylids blew unconscious
 And dimmèd sight with pale and deadly hew
 At last she up gan lift: with trembling cheare
 Her up he tooke, too simple and too trew,
 And oft her kist. At length all passèd feare,
 405 He set her on her steede, and forward forth did beare.

¹ Prime First day of a new moon.

² Till... well See 1 John 4.14, which describes Christ as the Well of Life, a "well of water, springing up into eternal life," for those who believe in Christ and follow his teachings.

Nought there under heav'ns wilde hollownesse,
That moves more deare compassion of mind,
Then beautie brought t' unworthy wretchednesse
Through envies snares or fortunes freakes unkind:
5 I, whether lately through her brightness blind,
Or through alleageance and fast fealtie,
Which I do owe unto all woman kind,
Feele my heart perst with so great agonie,
When such I see, that all for pittie I could die.

2

10 And now it is empassionèd so deepe,
For fairest Unaes sake, of whom I sing,
That my fraile eyes these lines with teares do steepe,
To thinke how she through guilefull handeling,
Though true as touch, though daughter of a king,
15 Though faire as ever living wight was faire,
Though nor in word nor deede ill meriting,
Is from her knight divorcèd in despaire
And her due loves deriv'd to that vile witches share.

3

20 Yet she most faithfull Ladie all this while Forsaken, wofull, solitarie mayd
Farre from all peoples prease,^o as in exile,
In wilderness and wastfull deserts strayd,
To seeke her knight; who subtilly betrayd
Through that late vision, which th'Enchaunter wrought,
25 Had her abandond. She of nought affrayd,
Through woods and wastnesse wide him daily sought;
Yet wishèd tydings none of him unto her brought.

4

30 One day nigh wearie of the yrkesome way,
From her unhastie beast she did alight,
And on the grasse her daintie limbes did lay
In secret shadow, farre from all mens sight:

From her faire head her fillet^o she undight,^o

headband undid

And laid her stole aside. Her angels face
As the great eye of heaven shyned bright,
And made a sunshine in the shadie place;
Did never mortall eye behold such heavenly grace.

5

It fortunèd out of the thickest wood
A ramping Lyon rushed suddainly,
Hunting full greedie after salvage^o blood;
40 Soone as the royall virgin he did spy,
With gaping mouth at her ran greedily,
To have attonce devour'd her tender corse:
But to the pray when as he drew more ny,
His bloudie rage asswaged with remorse,
45 And with the sight amazd, forgot his furious forse.

6

In stead thereof he kist her wearie feet,
And lickt her lilly hands with fawning tong,
As he her wrongèd innocence did weet.^o
50 O how can beautie maister the most strong,
And simple truth subdue avenging wrong?
Whose yeelded pride and proud submission,
Still dreading death, when she had markèd long,
Her hart gan melt in great compassion,
And drizling teares did shed for pure affection.

55 The Lyon Lord of everie beast in field,
Quoth she, his princely puissance doth abate,
And mightie proud to humble weake does yield,
Forgetfull of the hungry rage, which late
Him prickt, in pittie of my sad estate:^o
60 But he my Lyon, and my noble Lord,
How does he find in cruell hart to hate
Her that him lov'd, and ever most adord,
As the God of my life? why hath he me abhord?

state

8

Redounding^o teares did choke th'end of her plaint,
65 Which softly ecchoed from the neighbour wood;
And sad to see her sorrowfull constraint overflowing

The kingly beast upon her gazing stood;
 With pittie calmd, downe fell his angry mood.
 At last in close hart shutting up her paine,
 70 Arose the virgin borne of heavenly brood,
 And to her snowy Palfrey got againe,
 To seeke her strayed Champion, if she might attaine.^o overtake

9

The Lyon would not leave her desolate,
 But with her went along, as a strong gard
 75 Of her chast person, and a faithfull mate
 Of her sad troubles and misfortunes hard:
 Still^o when she slept, he kept both watch and ward, always
 And when she wakt, he waited diligent,
 With humble service to her will prepard:
 80 From her faire eyes he tooke commaundement,
 And ever by her lookes conceivèd her intent.

10

Long she thus traveilèd through deserts wyde,
 By which she thought her wandring knight shold pas,
 Yet never shew of living wight espyde;
 85 Till that at length she found the troden gras,
 In which the tract of peoples footing was,
 Under the steepe foot of a mountaine hore;^o grey
 The same she followes, till at last she has
 A damzell spyde slow footing her before,
 90 That on her shoulders sad^o a pot of water bore. stooped

11

To whom approching she to her gan call,
 To weet, if dwelling place were nigh at hand;
 But the rude wench her answer'd nought at all,
 She could not heare, nor speake, nor understand;¹
 95 Till seeing by her side the Lyon stand,
 With suddaine feare her pitcher downe she threw,
 And fled away: for never in that land
 Face of faire Ladie she before did vew,
 And that dread Lyons looke her cast in deadly hew.

12

100 Full fast she fled, ne ever lookt behynd,
 As if her life upon the wager lay,

And home she came, whereas her mother blynd
 Sate in eternall night: nought could she say,
 But suddaine catching hold, did her dismay
 105 With quaking hands, and other signs of feare:
 Who full of ghastly fright and cold affray,^o fear
 Gan shut the dore. By this arrivèd there Dame Una, wearie Dame, and entrance did requere.^o request

13

Which when none yeelded, her unruly Page
 110 With his rude^o claws the wicket open rent, rough
 And let her in; where of his cruell rage
 Nigh dead with feare, and faint astonishment,
 She found them both in darkesome corner pent;
 Where that old woman day and night did pray
 115 Upon her beades devoutly penitent;
 Nine hundred *Pater nosters*² every day,
 And thrise nine hundred Aves she was wont to say.

14

And to augment her painefull pennance more,
 Thrise every weeke in ashes she did sit,
 120 And next her wrinkled skin rough sackcloth wore,
 And thrise three times did fast from any bit:
 But now for feare her beads she did forget.
 Whose needlesse dread for to remove away,
 Faire Una framèd words and count'nance fit:
 125 Which hardly^o doen, at length she gan with difficulty
 them pray,
 That in their cotage small, that night she rest her may.

15

The day is spent, and commeth drowsie night,
 When every creature shrowded is in sleepe;
 Sad Una downe her laies in wearie plight,
 130 And at her feet the Lyon watch doth keepe:
 In stead of rest, she does lament, and weepe
 For the late losse of her deare lovèd knight,
 And sighes, and grones, and evermore does steepe
 Her tender brest in bitter teares all night,
 135 All night she thinks too long, and often looks for light.

¹ She ... understand The girl is both deaf and mute.

² Pater nosters Latin: Our Fathers; i.e., repetitions of the Lord's Prayer.

16

Now when Aldeboran was mounted hie
 Above the shynie Cassiopeias chaire,¹
 And all in deadly sleepe did drowned lie,
 One knockèd at the dore, and in would fare;
 140 He knockèd fast,^o and often curst, and sware, vigorously
 That readie entrance was not at his call:
 For on his backe a heavy load he bare
 Of nightly stelths and pillage severall,
 Which he had got abroad by purchase criminall.

17

145 He was to weete^o a stout and sturdie thiefe, wit
 Wont to robbe Churches of their ornaments,
 And poore mens boxes of their due reliefe,
 Which given was to them for good intents;
 The holy Saints of their rich vestiments
 150 He did disrobe, when all men carelesse slept,
 And spoild the Priests of their habiliments,^o robes
 Whiles none the holy things in safety kept;
 Then he by cunning sleights in at the window crept.

18

And all that he by right or wrong could find,
 155 Unto this house he brought, and did bestow
 Upon the daughter of this woman blind,
 Abessa daughter of Corceca² slow,
 With whom he whoredome usd, that few did know,
 And fed her fat with feast of offerings,
 160 And plentie, which in all the land did grow;
 Ne sparèd he to give her gold and rings:
 And now he to her brought part of his stolen things.

19

Thus long the dore with rage and threats he bet,^o beat
 Yet of those fearefull women none durst rize,
 165 The Lyon frayèd^o them, him in to let: frightened
 He would no longer stay him to advize,^o consider
 But open breakes the dore in furious wize,

² Abessa ... Corceca Abessa's name derives from the word abess and associates her with Roman Catholic abbies, monasteries, and absence (from the Latin abesse, to be absent). Corceca suggests blindness of heart.

And entring is; when that disdainfull^o beast indignant
 Encountring fierce, him suddaine doth surprize,
 170 And seizing cruell clawes on trembling brest,
 Under his Lordly foot him proudly hath supprest.

20

Him booteth not resist,³ nor succour call,
 His bleeding hart is in the vengers hand,
 Who streight him rent in thousand peeces small,
 175 And quite dismembred hath: the thirstie land
 Drunke up his life; his corse^o left on the body
 strand.^o ground
 His fearefull friends weare out the wofull night,
 Ne dare to weepe, nor seeme to understand
 The heavie hap,^o which on them is alight, occurrence
 180 Affraid, least to themselves the like mishappen might.⁴

21

Now when broad day the world discovered has,
 Up Una rose, up rose the Lyon eke,
 And on their former journey forward pas,
 In wayes unknowne, her wandring knight to seeke,
 185 With paines farre passing that long wandring Greeke,
 That for his love refusèd deitie;⁵
 Such were the labours of this Lady meeke,
 Still seeking him, that from her still did flie,
 Then furthest from her hope, when most she weenèd^o nie. believed

22

190 Soone as she parted thence, the fearefull twaine,^o pair
 That blind old woman and her daughter deare
 Came forth, and finding Kirkrapine⁶ there slaine,
 For anguish great they gan to rend their heare,^o hair
 And beat their brests, and naked flesh to teare.
 195 And when they both had wept and wayld their fill,
 Then forth they ranne like two amazed deare,

³ Him ... resist It did no good for him to resist.

⁴ least ... might I.e., lest the same mishap befall them.

⁵ that long ... deitie Odysseus, King of Ithaca who, according to Homer's Odyssey, wandered for ten years seeking his home after the Trojan War. On the way, he was detained by the sea nymph Calypso, who offered him immortality if he would stay with her.

⁶ Kirkrapine Church robber.

Halfe mad through malice, and revenging will,
To follow her, that was the causer of their ill.

23

Whom overtaking, they gan loudly bray,
200 With hollow howling, and lamenting cry,
Shamefully at her rayling° all the way, insulting
And her accusing of dishonesty,° lewdness
That was the flowre of faith and chastity;
And still amidst her rayling, she° did pray, Corceca
205 That plagues, and mischiefs, and long misery
Might fall on her, and follow all the way,
And that in endlesse error° she might ever stray. roaming

24

But when she saw her prayers nought prevaile,
She backe returnèd with some labour lost;
210 And in the way as she did weepe and waile,
A knight her met in mighty armes embost,° covered
Yet knight was not for all his bragging bost,° boast
But subtrill Archimag, that Una sought
By traynes into new troubles to have tost:
215 Of that old woman tydings he besought,
If that of such a Ladie she could tellen ought.° anything

25

Therewith she gan her passion to renew,
And cry, and curse, and raile, and rend her heare,
220 Saying, that harlot she too lately knew,
That causd her shed so many a bitter teare,
And so forth told the story of her feare:
Much seemèd he to mone her haplesse chaunce,
And after for that Ladie did inquire;
Which being taught, he forward gan advaunce
225 His fair enchanted steed, and eke his charmèd launce.

26

Ere long he came, where Una traveild slow,
And that wilde Champion wayting her besyde:
Whom seeing such, for dread he durst not show
Himselfe too nigh at hand, but turnèd wyde
230 Unto an hill; from whence when she him spyde,
By his like seeming shield, her knight by name
She weend it was, and towards him gan ryde:
Approching nigh, she wist it was the same,

And with faire fearefull humblesse° towards humility
him shee came.

27

235 And weeping said, Ah my long lackèd Lord,
Where have ye bene thus long out of my sight?
Much fearèd I to have bene quite abhord,
Or ought° have done, that ye displeasen might, aught
That should as death unto my deare° hart heavy light:° descend
240 For since mine eye your joyous sight did mis,
My chearefull day is turnd to chearelesse night,
And eke my night of death the shadow is;
But welcome now my light, and shining lampe of blis.

28

He thereto meeting¹ said, My dearest Dame, 245 Farre be it from your thought, and fro my will,
To thinke that knighthood I so much should shame,
As you to leave, that have me lovèd still,
And chose in Faery court of meere° goodwill, absolute
Where noblest knights were to be found on earth:
250 The earth shall sooner leave her kindly° skill natural
To bring forth fruit, and make eternall derth,° famine
Then I leave you, my lief,° yborne of beloved heavenly berth.

29

And sooth to say, why I left you so long,
Was for to seeke adventure in strange place,
255 Where Archimago said a felon strong
To many knights did daily worke disgrace;
But knight he now shall never more deface:
Good cause of mine excuse; that mote° ye please may
Well to accept, and evermore embrace
260 My faithfull service, that by land and seas
Have vowd you to defend. Now then your plaint appease.° cease

30

His lovely words her seemd due recompence
Of all her passèd paines: one loving howre° hour
For many yeares of sorrow can dispençe:° compensate

265 A dram of sweet is worth a pound of sowre:
 She has forgot, how many a wofull stowre° time of turmoil
 For him she late endur'd; she speakes no more
 Of past: true is, that true love hath no powre
 To looken backe; his eyes be fixt before.

270 Before her stands her knight, for whom she toyld° so sore. toiled

31
 Much like, as when the beaten marinere,
 That long hath wandred in the Ocean wide,
 Oft soust° in swelling Tethys saltish teare, soaked
 And long time having tand his tawney hide
 275 With blustering breath of heaven, that none can bide,
 And scorching flames of fierce Orions hound,¹
 Soone as the port from farre he has espide,
 His chearefull whistle merrily doth sound,
 And Nereus crownes with cups;² his mates him
 pledg° around. toast

32
 280 Such joy made Una, when her knight she found;
 And eke th'enchauter joyous seemd no lesse,
 Then the glad marchant, that does vew from ground
 His ship farre come from watrie wilderness,
 He hurles out vowes, and Neptune oft doth blesse:
 285 So forth they past, and all the way they spent
 Discoursing of her dreadfull late distresse,
 In which he askt her, what the Lyon ment:
 Who told her all that fell in journey as she went.

33
 They had not ridden farre, when they might see 290 One pricking° towards them with hastie heat, galloping
 Full strongly armd, and on a courser free,
 That through his fiercenesse fomed all with sweat,
 And the sharpe yron° did for anger eat, bit
 When his hot ryder spurd his chauffed° side; chafed

295 His looke was sterne, and seemèd still to threat
 Cruell revenge, which he in hart did hyde,
 And on his shield Sans loy in bloudie lines was dyde.

34
 When nigh he drew unto this gentle payre
 And saw the Red-crosse, which the knight did beare,
 300 He burnt in fire, and gan eftsoones prepare
 Himselfe to battell with his couchèd speare.
 Loth was that other, and did faint through feare,
 To taste th'untryed dint of deadly steele;
 But yet his Lady did so well him cheare,
 305 That hope of new good hap he gan to feelee;
 So bent his speare, and spurd his horse with yron heele.

35
 But that proud Paynim° forward came so fierce, pagan
 And full of wrath, that with his sharp-head speare
 Through vainely crossèd shield³ he quite did pierce,
 310 And had his staggering steede not shrunke for feare,
 Through shield and bodie eke he should him beare:
 Yet so great was the puissance of his push,
 That from his saddle quite he did him beare:
 He tombling rudely downe to ground did rush,
 315 And from his gorèd wound a well of bloud did gush.

36
 Dismounting lightly from his loftie steed,
 He to him lept, in mind to reave° his life, take
 And proudly said, Lo there the worthie meed° recompense
 Of him, that slew Sans foy with bloudie knife;
 320 Henceforth his ghost freed from repining strife,
 In peace may passen over Lethe⁴ lake,
 When morning altars purgd with enemies life,
 The blacke infernall Furies⁵ doen aslake:° appease
 Life from Sansfoy thou tookst, Sansloy shall from thee take.

¹ Orions hound Sirius, the dog star, brightest star in the constellation Canis Major. The ancient Egyptians, who observed the star shining for most of the summer months, believed its rays caused the extreme heat, hence the "dog days" of summer.

² Nereus ... cups He toasts Nereus, a sea god.

³ vainely... shield "Vainely" bearing the mere image of a cross and not accompanied by true faith, the shield does not offer Archimago protection.

⁴ Lethe River in Hades whose waters bring forgetfulness.

⁵ Furies Three terrible winged goddesses who punish those who commit unavenged crimes.

37

325 Therewith in haste his helmet gan unlace,
 Till Una cride, O hold that hevie hand,
 Deare Sir, what ever that thou be in place:
 Enough is, that thy foe doth vanquisht stand
 Now at thy mercy: Mercie not withstand:
 330 For he is one the truest knight alive,
 Though conquered now he lie on lowly land,
 And whilest him fortune favourd, faire did thrive
 In bloudie field: therefore of life him not deprive.

38

Her piteous words might not abate his rage,
 335 But rudely rending up his helmet, would
 Have slaine him straight: but when he sees his age,
 And hoarie head of Archimago old,
 His hastie hand he doth amazed hold,
 And halfe ashamèd, wondred at the sight:
 340 For the old man well knew he, though untold,¹
 In charmes and magicke to have wondrous might,
 Ne ever wont in field, ne in round lists² to fight.

39

And said, Why Archimago, lucklesse syre,
 What doe I see? what hard mishap is this,
 345 That hath thee hither brought to taste mine yre?
 Or thine the fault, or mine the error is,
 In stead of foe to wound my friend amis?
 He answered nought, but in a traunce still lay,
 And on those guilefull dazed eyes of his 350 The cloud of death did sit. Which doen away,
 He left him lying so, ne would no lenger stay.

40

But to the virgin comes, who all this while Amasèd stands, her selfe so mockt to see
 By him, who has the guerdon^o of his guile, recompense
 355 For so misfeigning her true knight to bee:
 Yet is she now in more perplexitie,
 Left in the hand of that same Paynim bold,
 From whom her booteth not at all to flie;
 Who by her cleany^o garment catching hold, pure
 360 Her from her Palfrey pluckt, her visage to behold.

¹ though untold I.e., without being told.² round lists Arenas in which tournaments were held.

41

But her fierce servant full of kingly awe
 And high disdaine, whenas his soveraine Dame
 So rudely handled by her foe he sawe,
 With gaping jawes full greedy at him came,
 365 And ramping^o on his shield, did weene^o charging / hope
 the same
 Have reft away with his sharpe rending clawes:
 But he was stout, and lust did now inflame
 His corage more, that from his griping pawes
 He hath his shield redeem'd, and foorth his sword he drawes.

42

370 O then too weake and feeble was the forse
 Of salvage beast, his puissance to withstand:
 For he was strong, and of so mightie corse,
 As ever wielded speare in warlike hand,
 And feates of armes did wisely understand.
 375 Eftsoones he perced through his chaufed^o chest angry
 With thrilling^o point of deadly yron brand, piercing
 And launcht^o his Lordly hart: with death opprest slit
 He roar'd aloud, whiles life forsooke his stubborne brest.

43

Who now is left to keepe the forlorne maid
 380 From raging spoile of lawlesse victors will?
 Her faithfull gard remov'd, her hope dismaid,
 Her selfe a yeelded pray to save or spill.^o ruin
 He now Lord of the field, his pride to fill,
 With foule reproches, and disdainfull spight
 385 Her vildly^o entertaines, and will or nill,³ vilely
 Beares her away upon his courser light:^o quick
 Her prayers nought prevaile, his rage is more of might.

44

And all the way, with great lamenting paine,
 And piteous plaints she filleth his dull^o eares, deaf
 390 That stony hart could riven have in twaine,
 And all the way she wets with flowing teares:
 But he enrag'd with rancor, nothing heares.
 Her servile beast⁴ yet would not leave her so,

³ will or nill Expression meaning willingly or not; i.e., whether she will or won't.⁴ Her ... beast I.e., her palfrey.

395 But followes her farre off, ne ought he feares,
 To be partaker of her wandring woe,
 More mild in beastly kind,^o then that her beastly
 foe. nature

CANTO 4

*To sinfull house of Pride, Duessa
 Guides the faithfull knight,
 Where brothers death to wreak^o Sansjoy avenge
 Doth challenge him to fight.*

1
 Y^oung knight, what ever that dost armes professe,
 And through long labours huntest after fame,
 Beware of fraud, beware of ficklenesse,
 In choice, and change of thy deare lovèd Dame,
 5 Least thou of her beleewe too lightly blame,
 And rash misweening doe thy hart remove:
 For unto knight there is no greater shame,
 Then lightnesse and inconstancie in love;
 That doth this Redcrosse knights ensample^o example plainly prove.

2
 10 Who after that he had faire Una lorne,^o deserted
 Through light misdeeming of her loialtie,
 And false Duessa in her sted had borne,
 Called Fidess', and so supposd to bee;
 Long with her traveild, till at last they see 15 A goodly building, bravely garnishèd,
 The house of mightie Prince it seemd to bee:
 And towards it a broad high way that led,
 All bare through peoples feet, which thither traveild.

3
 20 Great troupes of people traveild thitherward
 Both day and night, of each degree and place,
 But few returnèd, having scapèd hard,^o with difficulty
 With balefull^o beggerie, or foule disgrace, miserable
 Which ever after in most wretched case,
 Like loathsome lazars,^o by the hedges lay. lepers
 25 Thither Duessa bad him bend his pace:
 For she is wearie of the toilesome way,
 And also nigh consumèd is the lingring day.

4
 A stately Pallace built of squarèd bricke,
 Which cunningly was without morter laid,
 30 Whose wals were high, but nothing strong, nor thick,
 And golden foile¹ all over them displaid,
 That purest skye with brightnesse they dismaid:
 High lifted up were many loftie towres,
 And goodly galleries farre over laid,
 35 Full of faire windowes, and delightfull bowres;
 And on the top a Diall^o told the timely clock, timepiece
 howres.

5
 It was a goodly heape^o for to behould, edifice
 And spake the praises of the workmans wit;
 But full great pittie, that so faire a mould
 40 Did on so weake foundation ever sit:
 For on a sandie hill, that still did flit,^o shift
 And fall away, it mounted was full hie,
 That every breath of heaven shakèd it:
 And all the hinder parts, that few could spie,
 45 Were ruinous and old, but painted cunningly.

6
 Arrivèd there they passèd in forth right;
 For still to all the gates stood open wide,
 Yet charge of them was to a Porter high^o designated
 Cald Maluenù, who entrance none denide:
 50 Thence to the hall, which was on every side
 With rich array and costly arras dight:^o decorated
 Infinite sorts of people did abide
 There waiting long, to win the wishèd sight
 Of her, that was the Lady of that Pallace bright.

7
 55 By them they passe, all gazing on them round,
 And to the Presence² mount; whose glorious vew
 Their frayle amazèd senses did confound:
 In living Princes court none ever knew
 Such endlesse riches, and so sumptuous shew;
 60 Ne Persia selfe, the nourse^o of pompous pride nurse
 Like ever saw. And there a noble crew

¹ golden foile Thin layer of gold.

² Presence Presence-chamber, where members of the royalty receive guests.

Of Lordes and Ladies stood on every side
Which with their presence faire, the place much beautifide.

8

High above all a cloth of State was spred,
65 And a rich throne, as bright as sunny day,
On which there sate most brave^o embellished handsomely
With royall robes and gorgeous array,
A mayden Queene, that shone as Titans ray,
In glistring gold, and peerelesse pretious stone:
70 Yet her bright blazing beautie did assay
To dim the brightnesse of her glorious throne,
As envying her selfe, that too exceeding shone.

9

Exceeding shone, like Phoebus fairest childe,¹
That did presume his fathers firie wayne,^o chariot
75 And flaming mouthes of steedes unwonted^o unusually wilde
Through highest heaven with weaker hand to rayne;
Proud of such glory and advancement vaine,
While flashing beames do daze his feeble eyen,
He leaves the welkin^o way most beaten plaine, heavenly
80 And rapt with whirling wheelles, inflames the skyen,
With fire not made to burne, but fairely for to shyne.

10

So proud she shyned in her Princely state,
Looking to heaven; for earth she did disdayne,
And sitting high; for lowly she did hate:
85 Lo underneath her scornefull feete, was layne
A dreadfull Dragon with an hideous trayne,^o tail
And in her hand she held a mirrhour bright,
Wherein her face she often vewèd fayne,^o gladly
And in her selfe-lov'd semblance tooke delight;
90 For she was wondrous faire, as any living wight.

11

Of griesly Pluto she the daughter was,
And sad Proserpina the Queene of hell;
Yet did she thinke her pearelesse worth to pas
That parentage, with pride so did she swell,

¹ Phoebus ... childe Phaeton, son of Apollo, tried to drive his father's chariot (by which the sun was pulled across the sky), but he lost control of the horses and was hurled down by Jove.

95 And thundring Jove, that high in heaven doth dwell,
And wield the world, she claymèd for her syre,
Or if that any else did Jove excell:
For to the highest she did still aspyre,
Or if ought higher were then that, did it desyre.

12

100 And proud Lucifera men did her call,
That made her selfe a Queene, and crownd to be,
Yet rightfull kingdome she had none at all,
Ne heritage of native soveraintie,
But did usurpe with wrong and tyrannie
105 Upon the scepter, which she now did hold:
Ne ruld her Realmes with lawes, but pollicie,^o political cunning
And strong advizement of six wisards old,
That with their counsels bad her kingdome did uphold.

13

Soone as the Elfin knight in presence came,
110 And false Duessa seeming Lady faire,
A gentle Husher,^o Vanitie by name usher
Made rowme, and passage for them did prepaire:
So goodly brought them to the lowest staire
Of her high throne, where they on humble knee
115 Making obeyssance, did the cause declare,
Why they were come, her royall state to see,
To prove^o the wide report of her great Majestee. confirm

14

With loftie eyes, halfe loth to looke so low,
She thankèd them in her disdaine full wise,^o fashion
120 Ne other grace vouchsafed them to show
Of Princesse worthy, scarce them bad arise.
Her Lordes and Ladies all this while devise^o prepare
Themselves to setten forth to straungers sight:
Some frounce^o their curlèd haire in courtly guise, frizz
125 Some prancke^o their ruffes, and others trimly dight pleat
Their gay attire: each others greater pride does spight.

15

Goodly they all that knight do entertaine,
Right glad with him to have increast their crew:
But to Duess' each one himselfe did paine
130 All kindnesse and faire courtesie to shew;

For in that court whylome^o her well they knew: previously
 Yet the stout Faerie mongst the middest^o crowd central
 Thought all their glorie vaine in knightly vew,
 And that great Princesse too exceeding prowld,
 135 That to strange knight no better countenance allowd.

16
 Suddein upriseth from her stately place
 The royall Dame, and for her coche doth call:
 All hurtlen^o forth, and she with Princely pace, rush
 As faire Aurora in her purple^o pall,^o crimson / robe
 140 Out of the East the dawning day doth call:
 So forth she comes: her brightnesse brode^o doth abroad
 blaze;
 The heapes of people thronging in the hall,
 Do ride each other, upon her to gaze:
 Her glorious glitterand light doth all mens eyes amaze.

17
 145 So forth she comes, and to her coche does clyme,
 Adornèd all with gold, and girlonds gay,
 That seemd as fresh as Flora in her prime,
 And strove to match, in royall rich array,
 Great Junoes golden chaire, the which they say
 150 The Gods stand gazing on, when she does ride
 To Joves high house through heavens bras-pavèd way
 Drawne of faire Pecoocks, that excell in pride,
 And full of Argus eyes¹ their tailes dispredden wide.

18
 But this was drawne of six unequall beasts,²
 155 On which her six sage Counsellours did ryde,
 Taught to obay their bestiall beheasts,
 With like conditions to their kinds^o applyde: natures
 Of which the first, that all the rest did guyde,
 Was sluggish Idlenesse the nourse of sin;
 160 Upon a slouthfull Asse he chose to ryde,

¹ full of Argus eyes The monster Argus, who had one hundred eyes, was sent by Juno to watch Io, who was loved by Juno's husband, Jove. When Argus was killed, Juno placed his eyes in the tail-feathers of a peacock.

² six unequall beasts Lucifera, the personification of Pride, worst of the Seven Deadly Sins, leads her counselors, who personify the other six. They ride symbolically relevant animals.

Arayd in habit blacke, and amis³ thin,
 Like to an holy Monck, the service to begin.

19
 And in his hand his Portesse^o still he bare, prayer book
 That much was worne, but therein little red,
 165 For of devotion he had little care,
 Still drownd in sleepe, and most of his dayes ded;
 Scarse could he once uphold his heavie hed,
 To looken, whether it were night or day:
 May seeme the wayne was very evill led,
 170 When such an one had guiding of the way,
 That knew not, whether right he went, or else astray.

20
 From worldly cares himselfe he did esloyne,^o remove
 And greatly shunnèd manly exercise,
 From every worke he challengèd^o claimed
 essoyne,^o exemption
 175 For contemplation sake: yet otherwise,
 His life he led in lawlesse riotise;^o riot
 By which he grew to grievous malady;
 For in his lustlesse limbs through evill guise
 A shaking fever raignd continually:
 180 Such one was Idlenesse, first of this company.

21
 And by his side rode loathsome Gluttony,
 Deformèd creature, on a filthie swyne,
 His belly was up-blowne with luxury,^o indulgence
 And eke with fatnesse swollen were his eyne,
 185 And like a Crane⁴ his necke was long and fyne,
 With which he swallowd up excessive feast,
 For want whereof poore people oft did pyne;
 And all the way, most like a brutish beast,
 He spuèd^o up his gorge, that^o all did vomited / so that him deteast.

22
 190 In greene vine leaves he was right fitly clad;
 For other clothes he could not weare for heat,
 And on his head an yvie girland had,

³ amis I.e., amice, priestly vestment.

⁴ Crane Symbol of gluttony; it was thought the crane's long neck gave it increased pleasure in swallowing.

From under which fast trickled downe the sweat:
 Still as he rode, he somewhat still did eat,
 195 And in his hand did beare a bouzing^o can, drinking
 Of which he supt so oft, that on his seat
 His dronken corse he scarce upholden can,
 In shape and life more like a monster, then a man.

23

Unfit he was for any worldly thing,
 200 And eke unhable once to stirre or go,
 Not meet to be of counsell to a king,
 Whose mind in meat and drinke was drownèd so,
 That from his friend he seldome knew his fo:
 Full of diseases was his carcas blew,
 205 And a dry dropsie¹ through his flesh did flow:
 Which by misdiet daily greater grew:
 Such one was Gluttony, the second of that crew.

24

And next to him rode lustfull Lechery,
 Upon a bearded Goat, whose rugged haire,
 210 And whally^o eyes (the signe of gelosy,) glaring
 Was like the person selfe, whom he did beare:
 Who rough, and blacke, and filthy did appeare,
 Unseemely man to please faire Ladies eye;
 Yet he of Ladies oft was lovèd deare,
 215 When fairer faces were bid standen by:^o away
 O who does know the bent of womens fantasy?

25

In a greene gowne he clothèd was full faire,
 Which underneath did hide his filthinesse,
 And in his hand a burning hart he bare,
 220 Full of vaine follies, and new fanglenesse:
 For he was false, and fraught with ficklenesse,
 And learnèd had to love with secret looks,
 And well could daunce, and sing with ruefulness^o, dejection
 And fortunes tell, and read in loving^o bookes, erotic
 225 And thousand other wayes, to bait his fleshly hookes.

26

Inconstant man, that lovèd all he saw,
 And lusted after all, that he did love,
 Ne would his looser life be tide to law,
 But joyd weake wemens hearts to tempt, and prove^o test
 230 If from their loyall loves he might then move;
 Which lewdnesse fild him with reprochfull paine
 Of that fowle evill, which all men reprove,
 That rots the marrow, and consumes the braine:²
 Such one was Lecherie, the third of all this traine.

27

And greedy Avarice by him did ride,
 235 Upon a Camell loaden all with gold;
 Two iron coffers hong on either side,
 With precious mettall full, as they might hold,
 And in his lap an heape of coine he told;^o counted
 240 For of his wicked pelfe^o his God he made, riches
 And unto hell him selfe for money sold;
 Accursèd usurie was all his trade,
 And right and wrong ylike in equall ballaunce waide.

28

His life was nigh unto deaths doore yplast,
 245 And thred-bare cote, and cobled shoes he ware,
 Ne scarce good morsell all his life did tast,
 But both from backe and belly still did spare,
 To fill his bags, and riches to compare;^o obtain
 Yet chylde ne kinsman living had he none
 250 To leave them to; but thorough daily care
 To get, and nightly feare to lose his owne,
 He led a wretched life unto him selfe unknowne.

29

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffice,
 Whose greedy lust did lacke in greatest store,^o plenty
 255 Whose need had end, but no end covetise,^o covetousness
 Whose wealth was want, whose plenty made him pore,
 Who had enough, yet wishèd ever more;
 A vile disease, and eke in foote and hand
 A grievous gout tormented him full sore,
 260 That well he could not touch, nor go, nor stand:
 Such one was Avarice, the fourth of this faire band.

¹ dropsie I.e., dropsy, disease in which fluid accumulates in the bodily tissue and causes bloating.

² that fowle ... braine I.e., syphilis.

30

And next to him malicious Envie rode,
 Upon a ravenous wolfe, and still did chaw° chew
 Betweene his cankred° teeth a venomous tode, infected
 265 That all the poison ran about his chaw;° jaw
 But inwardly he chawèd his owne maw° guts
 At neighbours wealth, that made him ever sad;
 For death it was, when any good he saw,
 And wept, that cause of weeping none he had,
 270 But when he heard of harme, he wexèd wondrous glad.

31

All in a kirtle° of discolourd° say¹ tunic / multicolored
 He clothed was, ypainted full of eyes;
 And in his bosome secretly there lay
 An hatefull Snake, the which his taile uptyes
 275 In many folds, and mortall sting implyes.
 Still as he rode, he gnasht his teeth, to see
 Those heapes of gold with griple° grasping
 Covetyse,° avarice
 And grudgèd at the great felicitie
 Of proud Lucifera, and his owne companie.

32

280 He hated all good workes and vertuous deeds,
 And him no lesse, that any like did use,° perform
 And who with gracious bread the hungry feeds,
 His almes for want of faith he doth accuse;²
 So every good to bad he doth abuse:° misrepresent
 285 And eke the verse of famous Poets witt
 He does backebite, and spightfull poison spues
 From leprous mouth on all, that ever writt:
 Such one vile Envie was, that fite in row did sitt.

33

290 And him beside rides fierce revenging Wrath,
 Upon a Lion, loth for to be led;
 And in his hand a burning brond° he hath, sword
 The which he brandisheth about his hed;
 His eyes did hurle forth sparkles fiery red,
 And starèd sterne on all, that him beheld,

295 As ashes pale of hew and seeming ded;
 And on his dagger still his hand he held,
 Trembling through hasty rage, when choler° anger
 in him sweld.

34

His ruffin° raiment all was stained with blood, disordered
 Which he had spilt, and all to rags yrent,
 300 Through unadvised rashnesse woxen° grew
 wood;° mad
 For of his hands he had no government,° control
 Ne car'd for bloud in his avengement:
 But when the furious fit was overpast,
 His cruell facts° he often would repent; deeds
 305 Yet wilfull man he never would forecast,° foresee
 How many mischieves should ensue his heedlesse hast.

35

Full many mischiefes follow cruell Wrath;
 Abhorred bloudshed, and tumultuous strife,
 Unmanly murder, and unthrifty° scath,° wasteful / damage
 310 Bitter despight,° with rancours rusty knife, contempt
 And fretting griefe the enemy of life;
 All these, and many evils moe haunt ire,
 The swelling Splene,³ and Frenzy raging rife,
 The shaking Palsey, and Saint Fraunces fire:⁴
 315 Such one was Wrath, the last of this ungodly tire.° procession

36

And after all, upon the wagon beame
 Rode Sathan, with a smarting whip in hand,
 With which he forward lasht the laesie teme,
 So oft as Slowth still in the mire did stand.
 320 Huge routs° of people did about them band, crowds
 Showing for joy, and still° before their way always
 A foggy mist had covered all the land;
 And underneath their feet, all scattered lay
 Dead sculs & bones of men, whose life had gone astray.

¹ say Fine cloth, usually made of a mixture of silk and wool.

² His almes ... accuse Envy accuses those who give to the poor of doing so in an attempt to hide their lack of faith.

³ Splene I.e., spleen, ill-humor or violent temper.

⁴ Saint Fraunces fire Erysipelas; also known as wildfire or St. Anthony's fire, an inflammatory disease of the skin which produces a red rash.

37

325 So forth they marchen in this goodly sort,
 To take the solace of the open aire,
 And in fresh flowring fields themselves to sport;
 Emongst the rest rode that false Lady faire,
 The fowle Duessa, next unto the chaire
 330 Of proud Lucifera, as one of the traine:
 But that good knight would not so nigh repaire,^o approach
 Him selfe estraunging from their joyaunce vaine,
 Whose fellowship seemd far unfit for warlike swaine.

38

So having solacèd themselves a space
 335 With pleasaunce of the breathing^o fields yfed fragrant
 They backe returned to the Princely Place;
 Whereas^o an errant knight in armes yceled, where
 And heathnish shield, wherein with letters red
 Was writ Sans joy, they new arrivèd find:
 340 Enflam'd with fury and fiers hardy-hed,^o hardihood
 He seemd in hart to harbour thoughts unkind,
 And nourish bloody vengeance in his bitter mind.

39

Who when the shamèd shield of slaine Sans foy
 He spide with that same Faery champions page,
 345 Bewraying him, that did of late destroy
 His eldest brother, burning all with rage
 He to him leapt, and that same envious^o envied
 gage^o token
 Of victors glory from him snatcht away:
 But th'Elfin knight, which ought^o that owned warlike^o wage,^o of war / spoil
 350 Disdained to loose the meed^o he wonne in fray, prize
 And him rencountring fierce, reskewd^o the rescued
 noble pray.

40

Therewith they gan to hurtlen^o greedily, rush
 Redoubted battaile ready to darrayne,^o engage
 And clash their shields, and shake their swords on hy,
 355 That with their sturre they troubled all the traine;
 Till that great Queene upon eternall paine
 Of high displeasure, that ensewen might,
 Commaunded them their fury to refraine,

And if that either to that shield had right,
 360 In equall lists they should the morrow next it fight.

41

Ah dearest Dame, (quoth then the Paynim bold,)
 Pardon the errour of enragèd wight,
 Whom great griefe made forget the raines to hold
 Of reasons rule, to see this recreant^o knight, faint-hearted
 365 No knight, but treachour^o full of false despight traitor
 And shamefull treason, who through guile hath slayn
 The prowest knight, that ever field did fight,
 Even stout Sans foy (O who can then refrayn?)
 Whose shield he beares renverst, the more to heape disdayn.¹

42

And to augment the glorie of his guile,
 His dearest love the faire Fidessa loe^o look
 Is there possessèd of^o the traytour vile, by
 Who reapes the harvest sowen by his foe,
 Sowen in bloody field, and bought with woe:
 375 That brothers hand shall dearely well requight
 So be,² O Queene, you equall favour showe.
 Him litle answerd th'angry Elfin knight;
 He never meant with words, but swords to plead his right.

43

But threw his gauntlet as a sacred pledge,
 380 His cause in combat the next day to try:
 So been they parted both, with harts on edge,
 To be aveng'd each on his enemy.
 That night they pas in joy and jollity,
 Feasting and courting both in bowre and hall;
 385 For Steward was excessive Gluttonie,
 That of his plenty poured forth to all:
 Which doen, the Chamberlain Slowth did to rest them call.

44

Now whenas darkesome night had all displayd
 Her coleblacke curtein over brightest skye,

² So be If.

390 The warlike youthes on dayntie couches layd,
 Did chace away sweet sleepe from sluggish eye,
 To muse on meanes of hopèd victory.
 But whenas Morpheus had with leaden mace
 Arrested¹ all that courtly company,
 395 Up-rose Duessa from her resting place,
 And to the Paynims lodging comes with silent pace.

45

Whom broad awake she finds, in troublous fit,
 Forecasting, how his foe he might annoy,[°] harm
 And him amoves[°] with speaches seeming fit: arouses
 400 Ah deare Sans joy, next dearest to Sans foy,
 Cause of my new griefe, cause of my new joy,
 Joyous, to see his ymage in mine eye,
 And greev'd, to thinke how foe did him destroy,
 That was the flowre of grace and chevalrye;
 405 Lo his Fidessa to thy secret faith I flye.

46

With gentle wordes he can[°] her fairely greet, did
 And bad[°] say on the secret of her hart. bade
 Then sighing soft, I learne that litle sweet
 Oft tempred is (quoth she) with muchell[°] much smart:[°] pain
 410 For since my brest was launcht with lovely[°] dart of love
 Of deare Sans foy, I never joyèd howre,
 But in eternall woes my weaker[°] hart too weak
 Have wasted, loving him with all my powre,
 And for his sake have felt full many an heaue
 stowre.[°] turmoil

47

415 At last when perils all I weened past,
 And hop'd to reape the crop of all my care,
 Into new woes unweeting I was cast,
 By this false faytor,[°] who unworthy ware imposter
 His worthy shield, whom he with guilefull snare
 420 Entrappèd slew, and brought to shamefull grave.
 Me silly[°] maid away with him he bare, helpless
 And ever since hath kept in darksome cave,
 For that I would not yeeld, that to Sans-foy I gave.

48

But since faire Sunne hath sperst[°] that lowring dispersed
 clowd,
 425 And to my loathèd life now shewes some light,
 Under your beames I will me safely shrowd,
 From dreaded storme of his disdainfull spight:
 To you th'inheritance belongs by right
 Of brothers prayse, to you eke longs[°] his love. belongs
 430 Let not his love, let not his restlesse spright[°] spirit
 Be unreveng'd, that calles to you above
 From wandring Stygian shores,² where it doth endlesse move.

49

Thereto said he, Faire Dame be nought dismaid
 For sorrowes past; their griefe is with them gone:
 435 Ne yet of present perill be affraid;
 For needlesse feare did never vantage none,
 And helplesse hap it booteth not to mone.[°] bemoan
 Dead is Sans-foy, his vitall[°] paines are past, living
 Though greevèd ghost for vengeance deepe do grone:
 440 He lives, that shall him pay his dewties[°] last, rites
 And guiltie Elfin bloud shall sacrifice in hast.

50

O but I feare the fickle[°] freakes[°] unpredictable / whims
 (quoth shee)
 Of fortune false, and oddes[°] of armes in field. advantages
 Why dame (quoth he) what oddes can ever bee,
 445 Where both do fight alike, to win or yield?
 Yea but (quoth she) he beares a charmed shield,
 And eke enchaunted armes, that none can perce,
 Ne none can wound the man, that does them wield.
 Charmd or enchaunted (answerd he then ferce)[°] fiercely
 450 I no whit reck,[°] ne you the like need to care
 reherce.[°] recount

51

But faire Fidessa, sithens fortunes guile,
 Or enimies powre hath now captivèd you,
 Returne from whence ye came, and rest a while

¹ Arrested I.e., put to sleep.

² Stygian shores Shores of the river Styx, across which (according to classical mythology) all souls had to travel to reach Hades. Those who were not given a proper funeral were condemned to wander the banks of the river for one hundred years.

455

Till morrow next, that I the Elfe subdew,
 And with Sans-foyes dead dowry you endew.
 Ay me, that is a double death (she said)
 With proud foes sight my sorrow to renew:
 Where ever yet I be, my secrete aid
 Shall follow you. So passing forth she him obaid.

CANTO 5: SUMMARY

The Redcrosse knight and Sans joy commence battle. Sans joy, enraged by the sight of his brother Sans foy's bloody shield (which Duessa has hung from a tree), nearly kills the Redcrosse knight, but he recovers and is about to deal a fatal blow when Sans joy suddenly vanishes in an enchanted dark cloud summoned by Duessa. The Redcrosse knight, bewildered, is nevertheless celebrated as the victor of the fight. He is taken back to the castle to have his wounds tended to. When darkness falls, Duessa leaves to meet Night, the queen of darkness, and enlists her help in avenging Sans foy and Sans joy (who are grandsons of Night). Night and Duessa retrieve Sans joy from where he lies hidden. They bring him to Hades, the underworld, where they seek out Aesculapius, a celebrated and immortal physician whom Jove has condemned to Hades as punishment for bringing Hippolytus, a wrongly murdered boy, back to life. The two treacherous women convince Aesculapius to heal Sans joy. Meanwhile, Redcrosse's companion, the dwarf, discovers Lucifera's dungeon of pride, in which the bodies of the proud lie in heaps, and reports his discovery to the knight. The two flee in the night, and Duessa returns to find them gone.

CANTO 6: SUMMARY

Sans loy attempts to seduce Una; when she refuses his advances he resolves to rape her. Her cries of terror bring to her rescue a group of fauns and satyrs (mythological woodland creatures who are men from the waist up, goats from the waist down). The fauns and satyrs rescue Una and take her to their forest dwelling. Although Una tries to teach them true religion, they assume her to be a goddess and begin to worship her. Eventually she is discovered by Satyrane, a virtuous knight who was born of a human mother and a satyr father. At her request, he helps her to escape the idolatrous fauns and satyrs. After having fled the forest, Una and the knight meet a pilgrim on the road. They ask him for news of the Redcrosse knight, and the pilgrim (who is really Archimago in disguise) tells them he has seen that knight killed in combat by a pagan knight. Una and Satyrane seek out the pagan, who remains at a nearby fountain washing his wounds. The Satyrane begins to fight the pagan, who is actually Sans loy. Una flees in terror and is pursued by Archimago, still disguised as a pilgrim.

CANTO 7: SUMMARY

Duessa leaves the House of Pride to find Redcrosse, seeing him by a stream divested of his armor. The nymph who resides in the fountain is out of favor with Diana, and thus the water of her fountain leaves the drinker faint and enfeebled. The Redcrosse drinks from the stream and is left defenseless and unarmored when a giant appears from the nearby woods. The giant, child of a mortal woman and the Greek god of the winds, carries an oak tree as his weapon. Redcrosse attempts to stand against the giant but is so weak he can barely hold his blade. He dodges the giant's first attack and the giant goes to strike again, but Duessa calls him by his name—Orgoglio—and asks him to hold his blow. Orgoglio does, picking up Redcrosse and carrying him to his dungeon; he takes Duessa as his queen and gives her a great seven-headed serpent as a mount.

The Dwarf sees this, gathers the now-abandoned armor, and seeks Una. He finds her and brings both news and attempts at comfort, but Una is insensible with grief. The Dwarf tells the whole story of Redcrosse's travels and Una vows to go after him. On her travels, she meets a noble and well-appointed knight who bears a diamond shield; this knight will soon be revealed to be King Arthur. He speaks with Una and hears her grief in her responses. He asks that she share her story, so she explains how the diabolic Dragon has taken over her homeland and enslaved her parents. She tells of Redcrosse and what has befallen him, and Arthur offers his service to help her rescue Redcrosse from Orgoglio.

CANTO 8: SUMMARY

Una, the Dwarf, Arthur, and his Squire arrive at Orgoglio's castle, and the Squire plays a magical hunting horn, calling open the doors and shaking the castle. Orgoglio hears this and comes out, leaving Duessa, to see what has challenged his power. Duessa appears after him, mounted on her terrible beast, with each head crowned and each mouth bloody and spitting fire. The giant challenges Arthur, but Arthur dodges and avoids the thunderous blow of Orgoglio's club. The club strikes so hard it sticks in the ground, so Arthur takes the advantage and cuts off Orgoglio's left arm. Duessa rushes in to attack Arthur, but the Squire stands between her and his lord. Duessa is enraged by such an inferior foe fighting back, and she charms him with her golden cup; her charms rob him of his courage and he is struck down by her mount. Arthur intervenes and strikes off one of the mount's heads, but before he can attack another, he is driven back by the giant. The giant goes to strike Arthur, but his shield's covering falls off and reveals its shining beauty; at the sight of this shield, the giant lowers his club and Duessa's mount is struck blind and dazed. Duessa calls to Orgoglio for help and defense—a call which he heeds. As he turns to attack Arthur, his leg is struck off at the knee and he falls to the ground with dreadful force, whereupon he is decapitated by Arthur. Duessa tries to flee, casting aside her crown and cup, but is captured by the Squire and brought to Arthur. Una thanks Arthur for his great service, reminding him of Redcrosse's suffering and imprisonment. She asks that Duessa not be set free, as she enthralled Redcrosse. Duessa is left with the Squire and the two enter the castle to find Redcrosse. They call through the house until they meet Ignaro, the keeper of the castle and foster-father to Orgoglio. Ignaro speaks without sense and cannot answer Arthur's questions, so they take his keys and begin opening the doors of the castle. They discover great wealth and evidence of the brutal sacrifice of children and Christian martyrs. They arrive at an iron door for which there is no key. Arthur calls to the prisoner—who, we will learn, is Red-crosse—and, hearing Redcrosse speak of his suffering, tears open the iron door to free him. Redcrosse is released from his shackles and brought into the sun to lay judgment upon Duessa. Una declares that she should be stripped naked and set free. Upon the removal of her rich garments, Duessa's true horrible shape is revealed and she flees to the wilderness.

CANTO 9: SUMMARY (STANZAS I–20)

Una and Redcrosse prepare to leave Arthur and ask of him his history and lineage. He reveals that he does not know his true lineage, but was raised by Timon and instructed by Merlin. Una asks how he came to be in Faery, and he explains how he was drawn to pursue the Faerie Queene after he saw her in a dream. The two knights exchange gifts: Arthur presents Redcrosse with a diamond box containing a healing liquid, and Redcrosse presents a testament of God. Arthur leaves to continue his pursuit of the Faerie Queene, and Una and Redcrosse return to their quest, departing for Una's homeland. Una travels slowly, wary of Redcrosse's weakened state.

21

- So as they traveild, lo they gan espy
 An armèd knight towards them gallop fast,
 That seemèd from some fearèd foe to fly,
 Or other griesly thing, that him agast.
 185 Still as he fled, his eye was backward cast,
 As if his feare still followed him behind;
 Als flew his steed, as he his bands had brast,^o burst
 And with his wingèd heeles did tread the wind,
 As he had beene a fole^o of Pegasus his kind. foal

22

- 190 Nigh as he drew, they might perceive his head
 To be unarmd, and curld uncombèd heares
 Upstaring stiffe, dismayd with uncouth^o dread; unknown
 Nor drop of bloud in all his face appears
 Nor life in limbe: and to increase his feares,
 195 In fowle reproch^o of knighthoods faire degree, disgrace
 About his neck an hempen rope he weares,
 That with his glistring armes does ill agree;
 But he of rope or armes has now no memoree.

23

The Redcrosse knight toward him crossed fast,
 200 To weet, what mister^o wight was so dismayd:
 There him he finds all sencelesse and aghast,
 That of him selfe he seemd to be afayd;
 Whom hardly he from flying forward stayd,
 Till he these wordes to him deliver might;
 205 Sir knight, aread who hath ye thus arayd,^o
 And eke from whom make ye this hasty flight:
 For never knight I saw in such misseeming^o plight.

24

He answerd nought at all, but adding new
 Feare to his first amazment, staring wide
 210 With stony^o eyes, and hartlesse hollow hew,
 Astonisht stood, as one that had aspide
 Infernall furies, with their chaines untide.
 Him yet againe, and yet againe bespake
 The gentle knight; who nought to him replide,
 215 But trembling every joynt did inly quake,
 And foltring tongue at last these words seemd forth to shake.

25

For Gods deare love, Sir knight, do me not stay;
 For loe he comes, he comes fast after mee.
 Eft^o looking backe would faine have runne away;
 220 But he him forst to stay, and tellen free
 The secret cause of his perplexitie:^o
 Yet nathemore^o by his bold hartie speach,
 Could his bloud-frozen hart emboldned bee,
 But through his boldnesse rather feare did reach,
 225 Yet forst, at last he made through silence suddein breach.

26

And am I now in safetie sure (quoth he)
 From him, that would have forcèd me to dye?
 And is the point of death now turnd fro mee,
 That I may tell this haplesse history?
 230 Feare nought: (quoth he) no daunger now is nye.
 Then shall I you recount a ruefull cace,^o
 (Said he) the which with this unlucky eye
 I late beheld, and had not greater grace
 Me reft from it, had bene partaker of the place.

27

I lately chaunst (Would I had never chaunst)
 235 With a faire knight to keepeen companee,
 Sir Terwin hight,^o that well himselfe advaunst
 In all affaires, and was both bold and free,
 But not so happie as mote happie bee:
 240 He lov'd, as was his lot, a Ladie gent,
 That him againe lov'd in the least degree:¹
 For she was proud, and of too high intent,
 And joyd to see her lover languish and lament.

28

From whom returning sad and comfortlesse,
 245 As on the way together we did fare,
 We met that villen (God from him me blesse^o)
 That cursèd wight, from whom I scapt whyleare,^o
 A man of hell, that cals himselfe Despaire:
 Who first us greets, and after faire areedes^o
 250 Of tydings strange, and of adventures rare:
 So creeping close, as Snake in hidden weedes,
 Inquireth of our states, and of our knightly deedes.

29

Which when he knew, and felt our feeble harts
 Embost^o with bale, and bitter byting griefe, 255 Which love had launchèd^o with his deadly darts,
 With wounding words and termes of foule reprieft
 He pluckt from us all hope of due relieft,
 That earst^o us held in love of lingring life;
 Then hopelesse hartlesse, gan the cunning thiefe
 260 Perswade us die, to stint^o all further strife:
 To me he lent this rope, to him a rustie knife.

30

With which sad instrument of hastie death,
 That wofull lover, loathing lenger light,
 A wide way made to let forth living breath.
 265 But I more fearefull, or more luckie wight,
 Dismayd with that deformèd dismall sight,
 Fled fast away, halfe dead with dying feare:^o
 Ne yet assur'd of life by you, Sir knight,
 Whose like infirmitie like chaunce may beare:
 270 But God you never let his charmèd speeches heare.

¹ That him ... degree I.e., did not return his love.

31

How may a man (said he) with idle speach
 Be wonne, to spoyle the Castle of his health?
 I wote (quoth he) whom triall late did teach,
 That like would not for all this worldes wealth:
 275 His subtill tongue, like dropping honny, mealt' th° melts
 Into the hart, and searcheth every vaine,
 That ere one be aware, by secret stealth
 His powre is reft, and weaknesse doth remaine.
 O never Sir desire to try° his guilefull traine.° test / deceit

32

280 Certes° (said he) hence shall I never rest, certainly
 Till I that treachours art have heard and tride;
 And you Sir knight, whose name mote I request,
 Of grace° do me unto his cabin° guide. a favor / cave
 I that hight Trevisan (quoth he) will ride
 285 Against my liking backe, to doe you grace:
 But nor for gold nor glee° will I abide song
 By you, when ye arrive in that same place;
 For lever° had I die, then see his deadly face. rather

33

Ere long they come, where that same wicked wight
 290 His dwelling has, low in an hollow cave,
 Farre underneath a craggie clift ypyght,° placed
 Darke, dolefull, drearie, like a greedie grave,
 That still for carrion carcasses doth crave:
 On top whereof aye° dwelt the ghastly Owle,¹ ever
 295 Shrieking his balefull note, which ever drave
 Farre from that haunt all other chearefull fowle;
 And all about it wandring ghostes did waile and howle.

34

And all about old stockes° and stubs of trees, stumps
 Whereon nor fruit, nor leafe was ever seene,
 300 Did hang upon the ragged rocky knees;° craggs
 On which had many wretches hangèd beene,
 Whose carcasses were scattered on the greene,
 And throwne about the cliffs. Arrivèd there,
 That bare-head knight for dread and dolefull
 teene,° suffering
 305 Would faine have fled, ne durst approchen neare,
 But th'other forst him stay, and comforted in feare.

35

That darkesome cave they enter, where they find
 That cursèd man, low sitting on the ground,
 Musing full sadly in his sullein mind;
 310 His griesie° lockes, long growen, and unbound, grizzled
 Disordred hong about his shoulders round,
 And hid his face; through which his hollow eyne
 Lookt deadly dull, and starèd as astound;
 His raw-bone cheekes through penurie° and poverty
 pine,° starvation
 315 Were shronke into his jawes, as he did never dine.

36

His garment nought but many ragged clouts,° rags
 With thornes together pind and patchèd was,
 The which his naked sides he wrapt abouts;
 And him beside there lay upon the gras
 320 A drearie corse, whose life away did pas,
 All wallowd in his owne yet luke-warme blood,
 That from his wound yet wellèd fresh alas;
 In which a rustie knife fast fixèd stood,
 And made an open passage for the gushing flood.

37

325 Which piteous spectacle, approving° trew proving
 The wofull tale that Trevisan had told,
 When as the gentle Redcrosse knight did vew,
 With firie zeale he burnt in courage bold,
 Him to avenge, before his bloud were cold,
 330 And to the villein said, Thou damnèd wight,
 The author of this fact,° we here behold, act
 What justice can but judge against thee right,
 With thine owne bloud to price° his bloud, pay for here shed in sight.

38

What franticke fit (quoth he) hath thus distraught
 335 Thee, foolish man, so rash a doome to give?
 What justice ever other judgement taught,
 But he should die, who merites not to live?
 None else to death this man despayring drive,° drove
 But his owne guiltie mind deserving death.
 340 Is then unjust to each his due to give?
 Or let him die, that loatheth living breath?
 Or let him die at ease, that liveth here uneath?° with difficulty

¹ Owle Owls were believed to bring tidings of death.

39

Who travels by the wearie wandring way,
 To come unto his wishèd home in haste,
 345 And meetes a flood, that doth his passage stay,
 Is not great grace to helpe him over past,
 Or free his feet, that in the myre sticke fast?
 Most envious man, that grieves at neighbours good,
 And fond,^o that joyest in the woe thou hast, foolish
 350 Why wilt not let him passe, that long hath stood
 Upon the banke, yet wilt thy selfe not passe the flood?

40

He there does now enjoy eternall rest
 And happie ease, which thou doest want and crave,
 And further from it daily wanderest:
 355 What if some litle paine the passage have,
 That makes fraile flesh to feare the bitter wave?
 Is not short paine well borne, that brings long ease,
 And layes the soule to sleepe in quiet grave?
 Sleepe after toyle, port after stormie seas,
 360 Ease after warre, death after life does greatly please.

41

The knight much wondred at his suddaine wit,^o intelligence
 And said, The terme of life is limited,
 Ne may a man prolong, nor shorten it;
 The souldier may not move from watchfull sted,
 365 Nor leave his stand, untill his Captaine bed.^o bid
 Who life did limit by almightie doome,
 (Quoth he) knowes best the termes establishèd;
 And he, that points the Centonell his roome,^o position
 Doth license him depart at sound of morning
 droome.^o drum

42

Is not his deed, what ever thing is donne,
 In heaven and earth? did not he all create
 To die againe? all ends that was begonne.
 Their times in his eternall booke of fate
 Are written sure, and have their certaine date.
 375 Who then can strive with strong necessitie,
 That holds the world in his still chaunging state,
 Or shunne the death ordaynd by destinie?
 When houre of death is come, let none aske whence,
 nor why.

43

The lenger life, I wote the greater sin,
 380 The greater sin, the greater punishment:
 All those great battels, which thou boasts to win,
 Through strife, and bloud-shed, and avengement,
 Now praysd, hereafter deare thou shalt repent:
 For life must life, and bloud must bloud repay.
 385 Is not enough thy evill life forespent?^o spent previously
 For he, that once hath missed the right way,
 The further he doth goe, the further he doth stray.

44

Then do no further goe, no further stray,
 But here lie downe, and to thy rest betake,
 390 Th'ill to prevent, that life ensewen may.
 For what hath life, that may it lovèd make,
 And gives not rather cause it to forsake?
 Feare, sicknesse, age, losse, labour, sorrow, strife,
 Paine, hunger, cold, that makes the hart to quake;
 395 And ever fickle fortune rageth rife,
 All which, and thousands mo^o do make a more loathsome life.

45

Thou wretched man, of death hast greatest need,
 If in true ballance thou wilt weigh thy state:
 For never knight, that darèd warlike deede,
 400 More lucklesse disaventures^o did misfortunes
 amate:^o dismay
 Witnesse the dongeon deepe, wherein of late
 Thy life shut up, for death so oft did call;
 And though good lucke prolonged hath thy date,
 Yet death then, would the like mishaps forestall,
 405 Into the which hereafter thou maiest happen fall.

46

Why then doest thou, O man of sin, desire
 To draw thy dayes forth to their last degree?
 Is not the measure of thy sinfull hire^o work
 High heaped up with huge iniquitie,^o sin
 410 Against the day of wrath,¹ to burden thee?
 Is not enough, that to this Ladie milde
 Thou falsèd^o hast thy faith with perjurie, betrayed

And sold thy selfe to serve Duessa vilde,^o vile
 With whom in all abuse thou hast thy selfe defilde?

47

415 Is not he just, that all this doth behold
 From highest heaven, and beares an equall^o eye? impartial
 Shall he thy sins up in his knowledge fold,
 And guiltie be of thine impietie?
 Is not his law, Let every sinner die:
 420 Die shall all flesh? what then must needs be donne,
 Is it not better to doe willingly,
 Then linger, till the glasse be all out ronne?
 Death is the end of woes: die soone, O faeries sonne.

48

The knight was much enmovèd with his speach,
 425 That as a swords point through his hart did perse,
 And in his conscience made a secret breach,
 Well knowing true all, that he did reherse,^o recount
 And to his fresh remembrance did reverse^o recall
 The ugly vew of his deformèd crimes,
 430 That all his manly powres it did disperse,
 As^o he were charmed with inchaunted rimes, as if
 That oftentimes he quakt, and fainted oftentimes.

49

In which amazement, when the Miscreant
 Perceivèd him to waver weake and fraile,
 435 Whiles trembling horror did his conscience dant,^o daunt
 And hellish anguish did his soule assaile,
 To drive him to despaire, and quite to quaile,
 He shew'd him painted in a table^o plaine, picture
 The damnèd ghosts, that doe in torments waile,
 440 And thousand feends that doe them endlesse paine
 With fire and brimstone, which for ever shall remaine.

50

The sight whereof so throughly him dismaid,
 That nought but death before his eyes he saw,
 And ever burning wrath before him laid,
 445 By righteous sentence of th'Almighties law:
 Then gan the villain him to overcraw,^o overpower
 And brought unto him swords, ropes, poison, fire,
 And all that might him to perdition draw;

And bad him choose, what death he would desire:
 450 For death was due to him, that had provokt Gods ire.

51

But when as none of them he saw him take,
 He to him raught^o a dagger sharpe and keene, reached
 And gave it him in hand: his hand did quake,
 And tremble like a leafe of Aspin greene,
 455 And troubled bloud through his pale face was seene
 To come, and goe with tydings from the hart,
 As it a running messenger had beene.
 At last resolv'd to worke his finall smart,
 He lifted up his hand, that backe againe did start.

52

460 Which when as Una saw, through every vaine
 The crudled^o cold ran to her well of life,¹ curdled
 As in a swowne: but soone reliv'd^o againe, revived
 Out of his hand she snatcht the cursèd knife,
 And threw it to the ground, enragèd rife,^o deeply
 465 And to him said, Fie, fie, faint harted knight,
 What meanest thou by this reprochfull strife?
 Is this the battell, which thou vauntst to fight
 With that fire-mouthèd Dragon, horrible and bright?

53

Come, come away, fraile, seely, fleshly wight,
 470 Ne let vaine words bewitch thy manly hart,
 Ne divelish thoughts dismay thy constant spright.
 In heavenly mercies hast thou not a part?
 Why shouldst thou then despeire, that chosen art?
 Where justice growes, there grows eke greater grace,
 475 The which doth quench the brond of hellish smart,
 And that accurst hand-writing doth deface,
 Arise, Sir knight arise, and leave this cursèd place.

54

So up he rose, and thence amounted^o streight. mounted
 Which when the carle^o beheld, and saw his guest villain
 480 Would safe depart, for^o all his subtill sleight, in spite of
 He chose an halter from among the rest,
 And with it hung himselfe, unbid^o unblest. unprayed for
 But death he could not worke himselfe thereby;
 For thousand times he so himselfe had drest,^o prepared

Yet nathelesse it could not doe^o him die,
Till he should die his last, that is eternally.

CANTO II

*The knight with that old Dragon fights
Two dayes incessantly:
The third him overthrowes, and gayns
Most glorious victory.*

CANTO 10: SUMMARY

Concerned about Redcrosse's weakness, Una brings him to the House of Holiness. Una and Redcrosse arrive and are greeted by the porter, Humilta, who brings them on the straight and narrow way into the central court. They meet Zeal, Reverence, and soon Dame Coelia, the matron of the House. Two of Coelia's daughters, Fidelia and Speranza (Faith and Hope), approach and converse with Una and greet Redcrosse. Una asks after Charissa (Charity), Coelia's other daughter, who has just given birth to a son. Coelia calls Obedience to guide Redcrosse to a bed to rest and restore his strength. Fidelia agrees to teach Redcrosse celestial discipline, and upon hearing her, he begins to loathe the mortal world. Speranza provides comfort, teaching Redcrosse how to be grounded by her silver anchor. Coelia calls the doctor Patience to help Redcrosse deal with his grief and sin. He is treated by Amendment, Penance, Remorse, and Repentance. Una then brings Redcrosse to meet Charissa, who is nursing her children. She instructs Redcrosse in love and righteousness, and he goes on to see Mercy, who brings him to the holy hospital to be treated for his physical pain. He meets the seven attendants: the steward; the almner; the garment attendant; the minister to prisoners; the minister to the sick; the undertaker; and the minister to the grieving. Mercy stays with Redcrosse until he goes on to a nearby hermitage to meet Contemplation. Contemplation guides Redcrosse to a vision of New Jerusalem, which Redcrosse declares to be the most beautiful city, even above that of Cleopolis, the home of the Faerie Queene. Contemplation tells Redcrosse that New Jerusalem is in heaven, and to reach it he must complete the quest given him by the Faerie Queene. Contemplation tells Redcrosse of his lineage and destiny: he is not a fairy but a human of royal Saxon heritage, taken by the fairies as a changeling, and he will one day become Saint George, the patron saint of England. Redcrosse then returns to Una to continue their quest.

1

High time now gan it wex¹ for Una faire,
To thinke of those her captive Parents deare,
And their forwasted kingdome to repaire:
Whereto whenas they now approchèd neare,
5 With hartie words her knight she gan to cheare,
And in her modest manner thus bespake;
Deare knight, as deare, as ever knight was deare,
That all these sorrowes suffer for my sake,
High heaven behold the tedious toyle, ye for me take.

2

10 Now are we come unto my native soyle,
And to the place, where all our perils dwell;
Here haunts that feend, and does his dayly spoyle,
Therefore henceforth be at your keeping well,²
And ever ready for your foeman fell.
15 The sparke of noble courage now awake,
And strive your excellent selfe to excell;
That shall ye evermore renownmèd make,
Above all knights on earth, that batteill undertake.

3

And pointing forth, lo yonder is (said she)
20 The brasen towre in which my parents deare
For dread of that huge feend emprisond be
Whom I from far see on the walles appeare
Whose sight my feeble soule doth greatly cheare:
And on the top of all I do espye
25 The watchman wayting tydings glad to heare,
That O my parents might I happily
Unto you bring, to ease you of your misery.

4

With that they heard a roaring hideous sound,
That all the ayre with terroure fillèd wide,

¹ gan it wex It began to grow.

² at your keeping well Well on your guard.

30 And seemd uneth° to shake the stedfast ground. almost Eftsoones that dreadfull Dragon they espide,
 Where stretcht he lay upon the sunny side
 Of a great hill, himselfe like a great hill.

But all so soone, as he from far descride
 35 Those glistring armes, that heaven with light did fill,
 He rousd himselfe full blith,° and hastned them gladly untill.° towards

5
 Then bad the knight his Lady yede° aloofe, go
 And to an hill her selfe with draw aside,
 From whence she might behold that battailles proof° outcome

40 And eke be safe from daunger far descryde:° observed
 She him obayd, and turnd a little wyde.
 Now O thou sacred Muse, most learnèd Dame,
 Faire ympe of Phoebus, and his agèd bride,¹
 The Nourse of time, and everlasting fame,
 45 That warlike hands ennoblest with immortall name;

6
 O gently come into my feeble brest,
 Come gently, but not with that mighty rage,
 Wherewith the martiall troupes thou doest infest,° arouse
 And harts of great Heroës doest enrage,
 50 That nought their kindled courage may aswage,
 Soone as thy dreadfull trompe° begins to sownd; trumpet
 The God of warre with his fiers equipage
 Thou doest awake, sleepe never he so sownd,
 And scarèd nations doest with horreur sterne astownd.° astonish

7
 55 Faire Goddess lay that furious fit° aside, music
 Till I of warres and bloody Mars do sing,
 And Briton fields with Sarazin bloud bedyde,
 Twixt that great faery Queene and Paynim king,
 That with their horreur heaven and earth did ring,
 60 A worke of labour long, and endlesse prayse:
 But now a while let downe that haughtie string,
 And to my tunes thy second tenor rayse,

That I this man of God his godly armes may blaze.° proclaim

8
 By this the dreadfull Beast drew nigh to hand,
 65 Halfe flying, and halfe footing in his hast,
 That with his largenesse measurèd much land,
 And made wide shadow under his huge wast;° girth
 As mountaine doth the valley overcast.
 Approching nigh, he rearèd high afore
 70 His body monstrous, horrible, and vast,
 Which to increase his wondrous greatnesse more,
 Was swolne with wrath, & poyson, & with bloody gore.

9
 And over, all with brasen scales was armd,
 Like plated coate of steele, so couchèd° neare,° set / closely
 75 That nought mote perce, ne might his corse be harmd
 With dint of sword, nor push of pointed speare;
 Which as an Eagle, seeing pray appeare,
 His aery plumes doth rouze, full rudely° dight, roughly
 So shakèd he, that horreur was to heare,
 80 For as the clashing of an Armour bright,
 Such noyse his rousèd scales did send unto the knight.

10
 His flaggy° wings when forth he did display, pendulous
 Were like two sayles, in which the hollow wynd
 Is gathered full, and worketh speedy way:
 85 And eke the pennies,° that did his pineons° quills / wings
 bynd,
 Were like mayne-yards, with flying canvas lynd,
 With which whenas him list the ayre to beat,
 And there by force unwonted° passage find, unaccustomed
 The cloudes before him fled for terroure great,
 90 And all the heavens stood still amazèd with his threat.

11
 His huge long tayle wound up in hundred foldes,
 Does overspred his long bras-scaly backe,
 Whose wreathèd boughts° when ever he unfolds, coils
 And thicke entangled knots adown does slacke.
 95 Bespotted all with shields° of red and blacke, scales
 It sweepeth all the land behind him farre,

¹ his agèd bride Mnemosyne, or Memory, the mother of the Muses.

And of three furlongs¹ does but litle lacke;
 And at the point two stings in-fixèd arre,
 Both deadly sharpe, that sharpest steele exceeden farre.

12

100 But stings^o and sharpest steele did far exceed spears
 The sharpnesse of his cruell rending clawes;²
 Dead was it sure, as sure as death in deed,
 What ever thing does touch his ravenous pawes,
 Or what within his reach he ever drawes.
 105 But his most hideous head my tounge to tell
 Does tremble: for his deepe devouring jawes
 Wide gapèd, like the griesly mouth of hell,
 Through which into his darke abisse all ravin^o fell. prey

13

And that more wondrous was, in either jaw
 110 Three ranckes of yron teeth enraungèd were,
 In which yet trickling bloud and gobbets^o raw chunks
 Of late devourèd bodies did appeare,
 That sight thereof bred cold congealèd feare:
 Which to increase, and as atonce to kill,
 115 A cloud of smothering smoke and sulphur seare^o searing
 Out of his stinking gorge forth steemèd still,
 That all the ayre about with smoke and stench did fill.

14

His blazing eyes, like two bright shining shields,
 Did burne with wrath, and sparkled living fyre;
 120 As two broad Beacons, set in open fields,
 Send forth their flames farre off to every shyre,^o district
 And warning give, that enemies conspyre,
 With fire and sword the region to invade;
 So flam'd his eyne with rage and rancorous yre:
 125 But farre within, as in a hollow glade,
 Those glaring lampes were set, that made a dreadfull shade.

15

So dreadfully he towards him did pas,
 Forelifting up aloft his speckled brest,

And often bounding on the brusèd gras,
 130 As for great joyance of his newcome guest.
 Eftsoones he gan advance his haughtie crest,
 As chauffed^o Bore his bristles doth upreare, angered
 And shoke his scales to battell readie drest;
 That made the Redcrosse knight nigh quake for feare, 135 As bidding^o bold defiance to his foeman neare. inviting

16

The knight gan fairely couch^o his steadie speare, aim
 And fiercely ran at him with rigorous might:
 The pointed steele arriving rudely theare,
 His harder hide would neither perce, nor bight,
 140 But glauncing by forth passèd forward right;
 Yet sore amovèd with so puissant push,
 The wrathfull beast about him turnèd light,^o swiftly
 And him so rudely passing by, did brush
 With his long tayle, that horse and man to ground did rush.

17

Both horse and man up lightly rose againe,
 And fresh encounter towards him address:
 But th'idle^o stroke yet backe recoyld in vaine, futile
 And found no place his deadly point to rest.
 Exceeding rage enflam'd the furious beast,
 150 To be avengèd of so great despight;^o outrage
 For never felt his imperceable brest
 So wondrous force, from hand of living wight;
 Yet had he prov'd the powre of many a puissant knight.

18

Then with his waving wings displayèd wyde,
 155 Himselfe up high he lifted from the ground,
 And with strong flight did forcibly divide
 The yielding aire, which nigh^o too feeble found almost
 Her flitting partes, and element unsound,
 To beare so great a weight: he cutting way
 160 With his broad sayles, about him soarèd round:
 At last low stouping with unweldie sway,^o force
 Snatcht up both horse & man, to beare them quite away.

¹ furlongs Agricultural measurement presently equal to 220 yards; originally the length of a furrow in a common field.

² But stings ... clawes I.e., the sharpness of his claws far exceeded that of spears and the sharpest steel.

19

Long he them bore above the subject plaine,
 So farre as Ewghen¹ bow a shaft may send,
 165 Till struggling strong did him at last constraîne,
 To let them downe before his flightès end:
 As hagarð° hauke presuming to contend wild
 With hardie fowle, above his hable° proper might,° strength
 His wearie pounces° all in vaine doth spend, talons
 170 To trusse the pray too heauië for his flight;
 Which comming downe to ground, does free it selfe
 by fight.

20

He so disseizèd° of his gryping° grosse,° freed / grip / heavy
 The knight his thrillant° speare againe assayd penetrating
 In his bras-plated body to embosse,° plunge
 175 And three mens strength unto the stroke he layd;
 Wherewith the stiffe beame quaked, as affrayd,
 And glauncing from his scaly necke, did glyde
 Close under his left wing, then broad displayd.
 The percing steele there wrought a wound full wyde, 180 That with the uncouth° smart the Monster unknown
 lowdly cryde.

21

He cryde, as raging seas are wont to rore,
 When wintry storme his wrathfull wreck does threat,
 The rolling billowes° beat the ragged shore, waves
 As they the earth would shoulder from her seat,
 185 And greedie gulfe does gape, as he would eat
 His neighbour element in his revenge:
 Then gin the blustering brethren° boldly threat, winds
 To move the world from off his stedfast henge,° hinge
 And boystrous battell make, each other to avenge.

22

190 The steely head stucke fast still in his flesh,
 Till with his cruell clawes he snatcht the wood,
 And quite a sunder broke. Forth flowèd fresh
 A gushing river of blacke goarie blood,
 That drownèd all the land, whereon he stood;
 195 The streame thereof would drive a water-mill.
 Trebly augmented was his furious mood

With bitter sense of his deepe rooted ill,° wound
 That flames of fire he threw forth from his large nosethrill.

23

His hideous taylor then hurlèd he about,
 200 And therewith all enwrapt the nimble thyès° thighs
 Of his froth-fomy steed, whose courage stout
 Striving to loose the knot, that fast him tyes, Himselfe in streighter° bandes too rash tighter
 implies,° entangles
 That to the ground he is perforce° constraýnd thereby
 205 To throw his rider: who can quickly ryse
 From off the earth, with durty bloud distaynd,° dirtied
 For that reprochfull fall right fowly he disdaynd.

24

And fiercely tooke his trenchand° blade in hand, cutting
 With which he stroke so furious and so fell,
 210 That nothing seemd the puissance could withstand:
 Upon his crest the hardned yron fell,
 But his more hardned crest was armd so well,
 That deeper dint therein it would not make;
 Yet so extremely did the buffe° him quell, blow
 215 That from thenceforth he shund the like to take,
 But when he saw them come, he did them still forsake.° avoid

25

The knight was wrath to see his stroke beguylde,° foiled
 And smote againe with more outrageous might;
 But backe againe the sparckling steele recoyld,
 220 And left not any marke, where it did light;
 As if in Adamant° rocke it had bene pight.° hardest / pitched
 The beast impatient of his smarting wound,
 And of so fierce and forcible despight,
 Thought with his wings to stye° above the ground; rise
 225 But his late wounded wing unserviceable found.

26

Then full of griefe and anguish vehement,
 He lowdly brayd, that like was never heard,
 And from his wide devouring oven sent
 A flake° of fire, that flashing in his beard, stream
 230 Him all amazd, and almost made affeard:
 The scorching flame sore swingèd° all his face, singed

¹ Ewghen Made of wood from the yew tree.

And through his armour all his bodie seard,
 That he could not endure so cruell cace,
 But thought his armes to leave, and helmet to unlace.

27

235 Not that great Champion¹ of the antique world,
 Whom famous Poetes verse so much doth vaunt,
 And hath for twelve huge labours high extold,
 So many furies and sharpe fits did haunt,
 When him the poysoned garment did enchaunt
 240 With Centaures bloud, and bloudie verses charm'd,
 As did this knight twelve thousand dolours daunt,
 Whom fyrie steele now burnt, that earst him arm'd,
 That erst him goodly arm'd, now most of all him harm'd.

28

Faint, wearie, sore, emboyled, grievèd, brent
 245 With heat, toyle, wounds, armes, smart, & inward fire
 That never man such mischiefes did torment;
 Death better were, death did he oft desire,
 But death will never come, when needes require.
 Whom so dismayd when that his foe beheld,
 250 He cast to suffer him no more respire,^o live
 But gan his sturdie sterne^o about to weld,^o tail / swing
 And him so strongly stroke, that to the ground him feld.

29

It fortunèd (as faire it then befell)
 Behind his backe unweeting, where he stood,
 255 Of auncient time there was a springing well,
 From which fast trickled forth a silver flood,
 Full of great vertues, and for med'cine good.
 Whylome, before that cursèd Dragon got
 That happie land, and all with innocent blood 260 Defyld those sacred waves, it rightly hot^o was called
 The well of life, ne yet his vertues had forgot.

30

For unto life the dead it could restore,
 And guilt of sinfull crimes cleane wash away,
 Those that with sicknesse were infected sore,
 265 It could recure,^o and agèd long decay heal
 Renew, as one were borne that very day.
 Both Silo this, and Jordan did excell,
 And th'English Bath, and eke the german Spau,
 Ne can Cephise, nor Hebrus match this well.²
 270 Into the same the knight backe overthrowèn, fell.

31

Now gan the golden Phoebus for to steepe
 His fierie face in billowes of the west,
 And his faint steedes watred in Ocean deepe,
 Whiles from their journall^o labours they did rest, daily
 275 When that infernall Monster, having kest^o cast
 His wearie foe into that living well,
 Can^o high advance his broad discoloured brest, did
 Above his wonted pitch,^o with countenance height fell,^o fierce
 And clapt his yron wings, as victor he did dwell.^o stay

32

280 Which when his pensive Ladie saw from farre,
 Great woe and sorrow did her soule assay,
 As weening that the sad end of the warre,
 And gan to highest God entirely^o pray, earnestly
 That feared chance from her to turne away;
 285 With folded hands and knees full lowly bent
 All night she watcht, ne once adowne would lay
 Her daintie limbs in her sad dreriment,^o peril
 But praying still did wake, and waking did lament.

33

The morrow next gan early to appeare,
 290 That Titan rose to runne his daily race:
 But early ere the morrow next gan reare

¹ that great Champion Hercules, who successfully completed twelve labors. His death occurred when his wife inadvertently presented him with a poisoned shirt. The pain was so intense that he caused a funeral pyre to be built so that he could cast himself upon it. He was, however, rescued from the pyre and brought to dwell on Mount Olympus, the home of the gods.

² Both Silo ... well These waters have all been said to have healing powers. In John 9.7 a blind man is cured in the waters of the Siloam; Christ was baptized in the river Jordan; the supposedly medicinal waters of Bath and Spa were visited by those suffering from a variety of ailments; the waters of Cephise and Hebrus are praised in classical mythology for their purifying powers.

Out of the sea faire Titans deawy face,
 Up rose the gentle virgin from her place,
 And lookèd all about, if she might spy
 295 Her lovèd knight to move his manly pace:
 For she had great doubt of his safety,
 Since late she saw him fall before his enemy.

34

At last she where he upstartèd brave
 Out of the well, wherein he drenchèd lay;
 300 As Eagle fresh out of the Ocean wave,
 Where he hath left his plumes all hoary gray,
 And deckt himselfe with feathers youthly gay,
 Like Eyas hauke^o up mounts unto the skies, young hawk
 His newly budded pineons to assay,
 305 And marveiles at himselfe, still as he flies:
 So new this new-borne knight to battell new did rise.

35

Whom when the damnèd feend so fresh did spy,
 No wonder if he wondred at the sight,
 And doubted, whether his late enemy
 310 It were, or other new supplièd knight.
 He, now to prove his late renewèd might,
 High brandishing his bright deaw-burning¹ blade,
 Upon his crested scalpe so sore did smite,
 That to the scull a yawning wound it made:
 315 The deadly dint his dullèd senses all dismaid.

36

I wote not, whether the revenging steele
 Were hardned with that holy water dew,
 Wherein he fell, or sharper edge did feele,
 Or his baptizèd hands now greater grew;
 320 Or other secret vertue^o did ensew; power
 Else never could the force of fleshly arme,
 Ne molten mettall in his bloud embrew:^o thrust
 For till that stownd^o could never wight him harme, time
 By subtilty, nor slight, nor might, nor mighty charme.

37

325 The cruell wound enragèd him so sore,
 That loud he yelded for exceeding paine;

¹ deaw-burning I.e., the sword is so bright that its light, like that of the sun, burns up the dew.

As hundred ramping Lyons seem'd to rore,
 Whom ravenous hunger did thereto constraine:
 Then gan he tosse aloft his stretchèd traine,^o tail
 330 And therewith scourge the buxome^o aire so pliant sore,^o violently
 That to his force to yeelden it was faine;
 Ne ought^o his sturdie strokes might stand afore, aught
 That high trees overthrew, and rocks in peeces tore.

38

The same advauncing high above his head,
 335 With sharpe intended^o sting so rude him smot, extended
 That to the earth him drove, as stricken dead,
 Ne living wight would have him life behot:^o expected
 The mortall sting his angry needle shot
 Quite through his shield, and in his shoulder
 seasd,^o fastened
 340 Where fast it stucke, ne would there out be got:
 The grieve thereof him wondrous sore diseasd,
 Ne might his ranckling paine with patience be appeasd.

39

But yet more mindfull of his honour deare,
 Then of the grievous smart, which him did wring,^o vex
 345 From loathèd soile he can him lightly reare,
 And strove to loose the farre infixèd sting:
 Which when in vaine he tryde with struggeling,
 Inflam'd with wrath, his raging blade he heft,^o raised
 And strooke so strongly, that the knotty string
 350 Of his huge taile he quite a sunder cleft,
 Five joynts thereof he hewd, and but the stump him left.

40

Hart cannot thinke, what outrage, and what cries,
 With foule enfouldred² smoake and flashing fire,
 The hell-bred beast threw forth unto the skyes,
 355 That all was coverèd with darknesse dire:
 Then fraught^o with rancour, and engorgèd ire, filled
 He cast at once him to avenge for all,
 And gathering up himselfe out of the mire,^o mud
 With his uneven wings did fiercely fall
 360 Upon his sunne-bright shield, and gript it fast withall.

² enfouldred Charged with lightning.

41

Much was the man encombred with his hold,
 In feare to lose his weapon in his paw,
 Ne wist yet, how his talants^o to unfold;
 Nor harder was from Cerberus greedie jaw
 365 To plucke a bone, then from his cruell claw
 To reave^o by strength the gripèd gage away:
 Thrise he assayd it from his foot to draw,
 And thrise in vaine to draw it did assay,
 It bootèd nought to thinke, to robbe him of his pray.

talonswrest

42

370 Tho^o when he saw no power might prevaile,
 His trustie sword he cald to his last aid,
 Wherewith he fiercely did his foe assaile,
 And double blowes about him stoutly laid,
 That glauncing fire out of the yron plaid;^o
 375 As sparckles from the Andvile^o use to fly,
 When heaveie hammers on the wedge^o are swaid;^o
 Therewith at last he forst him to unty^o
 One of his grasping feete, him to defend thereby.

thendancedanvili.e., anvilstruckrelease

43

380 The other foot, fast fixèd on his shield, Whenas no strength, nor stroks mote^o him constraine
 To loose, ne yet the warlike pledge to yield,
 He smot thereat with all his might and maine,
 That nought so wondrous puissance might sustaine;
 Upon the joynt the lucky steele did light,
 385 And made such way, that hewd it quite in twaine;
 The paw yet missèd not his minisht^o might,
 But hong still on the shield, as it at first was pight.^o

coulddiminishedplaced

44

390 For grieve thereof, and divelish despight,
 From his infernall founnace forth he threw
 Huge flames, that dimmèd all the heavens light, Enrold in duskish smoke and brimstone^o blew;^o
 As burning Aetna¹ from his boyling stew
 Doth belch out flames, and rockes in peeces broke,
 And ragged ribs of mountaines molten new,

sulphurblue

395 Enwrappt in coleblacke clouds and filthy smoke,
 That all the land with stench, and heaven with horror choke.

45

The heate whereof, and harmefull pestilence^o injury
 So sore him noyd,^o that forst him to retire vexed
 A little backward for his best defence,
 400 To save his bodie from the scorching fire,
 Which he from hellish entrailes did expire.^o exhale
 It chaunst (eternall God that chaunce did guide)
 As he recoylèd backward, in the mire
 His nigh forwearied feeble feet did slide,
 405 And downe he fell, with dread of shame sore terrifide.

46

There grew a goodly tree him faire beside,
 Loaden with fruit and apples rosie red,
 As they in pure vermilion had beene dide,
 Whereof great vertues over all were red:^o told
 410 For happie life to all, which thereon fed,
 And life eke everlasting did befall:
 Great God it planted in that blessed sted^o place
 With his almightie hand, and did it call
 The tree of life,² the crime of our first fathers fall.

47

415 In all the world like was not to be found,
 Save in that soile, where all good things did grow,
 And freely sprong out of the fruitfull ground,
 As incorrupted Nature did them sow,
 Till that dread Dragon³ all did overthrow.
 420 Another like faire tree eke grew thereby,
 Whereof who so did eat, eftsoones did know
 Both good and ill: O mornefull memory:
 That tree through one mans fault hath doen us all to dy.

48

From that first tree forth flowd, as from a well, 425 A trickling streame of Balme, most soveraine^o powerful
 And daintie^o deare,^o which on the particularly / precious ground still fell,

² tree of life This tree grows in the Garden of Eden, from which Adam and Eve were expelled for eating from the Tree of Knowledge.

³ that dread Dragon I.e., Satan.

And overflowèd all the fertill plaine,
 As it had deawèd bene with timely° raine: seasonal
 Life and long health that gracious° ointment pleasing gave,
 430 And deadly woundes could heale, and reare againe
 The senselesse corse appointed for the grave.
 Into that same he fell: which did from death him save.

49
 For nigh thereto the ever damnèd beast
 Durst not approach, for he was deadly° made, of death
 435 And all that life preservèd, did detest:
 Yet he it oft adventur'd to invade.
 By this the drouping day-light gan to fade
 And yeeld his roome to sad succeeding night,
 Who with her sable mantle gan to shade
 440 The face of earth, and wayes of living wight,
 And high her burning torch set up in heaven bright.

50
 When gentle Una saw the second fall
 Of her deare knight, who wearie of long fight,
 And faint through losse of blood, mov'd not at all,
 445 But lay as in a dreame of deepe delight,
 Besmeard with pretious Balme, whose vertuous might
 Did heale his wounds, and scorching heat alay,
 Againe she stricken was with sore affright,
 And for his safetie gan devoutly pray;
 450 And watch the noyous° night, and wait for harmful joyous day.

51
 The joyous day gan early to appeare,
 And faire Aurora from the deawy bed
 Of agèd Tithone gan her selfe to reare,
 With rosie cheekes, for shame as blushing red;
 455 Her golden lockes for haste were loosely shed
 About her eares, when Una her did marke
 Clymbe to her charet, all with flowers spred;
 From heaven high to chase the chearelesse darke,
 With merry note her loud salutes the mounting larke.

52
 460 Then freshly up arose the doughtie knight,
 All healèd of his hurts and woundès wide,

And did himselfe to battell readie dight;
 Whose early foe awaiting him beside
 To have devourd, so soone as day he spyde,
 465 When now he saw himselfe so freshly reare,
 As if late fight had nought him damnifyde,° hurt
 He woxe° dismayd, and gan his fate to feare; grew
 Nathlesse with wonted rage he him advauncèd neare.

53
 And in his first encounter, gaping wide,
 470 He thought attonce him to have swallowd quight,
 And rusht upon him with outrageous pride;
 Who him r'encountring fierce, as hauke in flight,
 Perforce° rebutted backe. The weapon bright forcibly
 Taking advantage of his open jaw,
 475 Ran through his mouth with so importune° exacting might,
 That deepe emperst his darksome hollow maw,° mouth
 And back retyrd,° his life blood forth with all withdrawn did draw.

54
 So downe he fell, and forth his life did breath,
 That vanisht into smoke and cloudès swift;
 480 So downe he fell, that th'earth him underneath
 Did grone, as feeble so great load to lift;
 So downe he fell, as an huge rockie clift,
 Whose false° foundation waves have washt away, defective
 With dreadfull poyse° is from the mayneland weight rift,
 485 And rolling downe, great Neptune doth dismay;
 So downe he fell, and like an heapèd mountaine lay.

55
 The knight himselfe even trembled at his fall,
 So huge and horrible a masse it seem'd;
 And his deare Ladie, that beheld it all, 490 Durst not approach for dread, which she misdeem'd,° misjudged
 But yet at last, when as the direfull feend
 She saw not stirre, off-shaking vaine° affright, empty
 She nigher drew, and saw that joyous end:
 Then God she praysd, and thankt her faithfull knight,
 That had atchiev'd so great a conquest by his might.

CONTAYNING THE LEGEND OF SIR GUYON, OR OF TEMPERAUNCE

from CANTO 12¹

42

370 Thence passing forth, they shortly do arrive, Whereas° the Bowre of Blisse was situate; where
A place pickt out by choice of best alive,
That natures worke by art can imitate;²
In which what ever in this worldly state
375 Is sweet, and pleasing unto living sense,
Or that may dayntiest fantasie aggrate,° please
Was poured forth with plentifull dispençe,° liberality
And made there to abound with lavish affluence.

43

380 Goodly it was enclosed round about,
Aswell their entred guestes to keepe within,
As those unruly beasts to hold without;
Yet was the fence thereof but weake and thin;
Nought° feard their force, that fortillage° naught / fortress
to win,
But wisdomes powre, and temperaunces might,
385 By which the mightiest things efforcèd° bin:° compelled / are
And eke° the gate was wrought of substaunce light, also
Rather for pleasure, then for battery or fight.

44

Yt° framèd was of precious yvory, it
That seemd a worke of admirable wit;° skill
390 And therein all the famous history
Of Jason and Medæa was ywrit;
Her mighty charmes, her furious loving fit,
His goodly conquest of the golden fleece,
His falsèd° faith, and love too lightly flit,° violated / changing

¹ CANTO 12 So far in Book 2, Sir Guyon has tried to exemplify Temperance. To do so he has had to exercise self-control in the face of all passions. Led by his guide, the Palmer, he travels to the Bower of Bliss, ruled by the murderous witch Acrasia, in order to destroy it. Palmers were those who wore palm leaf badges to show that they had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

² best alive ... imitate I.e., the best artists.

395 The wondred Argo, which in venturous° adventurous
peece° ship
First through the Euxine seas bore all the flowr of Greece.³

45

Ye might have seene the frothy billowes fry° foam
Under the ship, as thorough them she went,
That seemd the waves were into yvory,
400 Or yvory into the waves were sent;
And other where⁴ the snowy substaunce sprent° sprinkled
With vermell,° like the boyes bloud⁵ vermilion
therein shed,
A piteous spectacle did represent,
And otherwhiles° with gold besprinkelèd; elsewhere
405 Yt seemd th'enchanted flame, which did Creüsa wed.⁶

46

All this, and more might in that goodly gate
Be red; that ever open stood to all,
Which thither came: but in the Porch there sate
A comely personage of stature tall,
410 And semblaunce° pleasing, more then naturall, appearance
That travellers to him seemd to entize;° entice
His looser garment to the ground did fall,
And flew about his heeles in wanton wize,° manner
Not fit for speedy pace, or manly exercize.

47

415 They in that place him Genius did call:
Not that celestiaall powre,⁷ to whom the care
Of life, and generation of all
That lives, pertaines in charge particulare,
Who wondrous things concerning our welfare,

³ famous history ... Greece Jason sailed on his ship the Argo to steal the Golden Fleece, which belonged to the King of Colchis. The King's daughter, Medea, fell in love with Jason and used her magical powers to betray her father and assist Jason. After obtaining the fleece, Jason broke his promise of fidelity to Medea.

⁴ other where Elsewhere.

⁵ boyes bloud Referring to the blood of Medea's brother, whom she murdered and chopped into pieces. She then scattered the pieces to distract her father as she and Jason escaped with the Fleece.

⁶ Yt ... wed When Jason abandoned Medea in favor of Creüsa, the vengeful Medea sent Creüsa an enchanted dress that burned her to death when she put it on.

⁷ celestiaall powre God of birth and generation.

420 And straunge phantome° doth let us oft forsee, images
 And oft of secret ill bids us beware:
 That is our Selfe, whom though we do not see,
 Yet each doth in him selfe it well perceive to bee.

48
 Therefore a God him sage Antiquity
 425 Did wisely make, and good Agdistes¹ call:
 But this same was to that quite contrary,
 The foe of life, that good envyes° to all, begrudges
 That secretly doth us procure° to fall, arrange
 Through guilefull semblaunts,° which he illusions makes us see.

430 He of this Gardin had the governall,° rule
 And Pleasures porter was devizd to bee,
 Holding a staffe in hand for more formalitee.

49
 With diverse flowres he daintily was deckt,
 And strowèd° round about, and by his side strewn
 435 A mighty Mazer bowle° of wine was set, goblet
 As if it had to him bene sacrificide;
 Wherewith all new-come guests he gratifide:
 So did he eke Sir Guyon passing by:
 But he his idle curtesie defide,
 440 And overthrew his bowle disdainfully;
 And broke his staffe, with which he charmèd semblants sly.²

50
 Thus being entred, they behold around
 A large and spacious plaine, on every side
 Strowed with pleasauns,° whose faire pleasure-grounds
 grassy ground
 445 Mantled° with greene, and goodly beautified covered
 With all the ornaments of Floraes pride,³
 Wherewith her mother Art, as halfe in scorne
 Of niggard° Nature, like a pompous bride stingy
 Did decke her, and too lavishly adorne,
 450 When forth from virgin bowre she comes in th'early
 morne.

² his staffe ... sly His magic staff, with which he raised deceitful apparitions.

³ Floraes pride The pride of Flora, goddess of flowers.

51
 Thereto the Heavens alwayes Joviall, Lookt on them lovely,° still° in lovingly / always
 stedfast state,
 Ne suffred storme nor frost on them to fall,
 Their tender buds or leaves to violate,
 455 Nor scorching heat, nor cold intemperate
 T'afflict the creatures, which therein did dwell,
 But the milde air with season moderate
 Gently attempted,° and disposd so well, temperate
 That still it breathèd forth sweet spirit & holesome smell.

52
 460 More sweet and holesome, then the pleasaunt hill
 Of Rhodope, on which the Nimphe, that bore
 A gyaunt babe, her selfe for griefe did kill;
 Or the Thessalian Tempe, where of yore
 Faire Daphne Phoebus hart with love did gore;
 465 Or Ida, where the Gods lov'd to repaire,° retire
 When ever they their heavenly bowres forlore;⁴ left
 Or sweet Parnasse, the haunt of Muses faire;
 Or Eden selfe, if ought with Eden mote compaire.

53
 Much wondred Guyon at the faire aspect° appearance
 470 Of that sweet place, yet suffred no delight
 To sincke into his sence, nor mind affect,
 But passèd forth, and lookt still forward right,° straight
 Bridling his will, and maistering his might:
 Till that he came unto another gate,
 475 No gate, but like one, being goodly dight° decorated
 With boughes and braunches, which did broad dilate° spread
 Their clasping armes, in wanton wreathings intricate.

54
 So fashionèd a Porch with rare device,° design
 Archt over head with an embracing vine,
 480 Whose bounches° hanging downe, seemed bunches
 to entice

⁴ More sweet ... forlore References to Rhodope, a nymph who bore a child by Neptune and was turned into a mountain; Daphne, a nymph who was pursued by the god Phoebus Apollo, and who was turned into a laurel tree when she prayed to escape him; and Mount Ida, which was the location of Jupiter's rape of Ganymede and of the beauty contest among Juno, Venus, and Minerva.

All passers by, to tast their lushious wine,
 And did themselves into their hands incline,
 As freely offering to be gatherèd:
 Some deepe empurpled as the Hyacint,¹
 485 Some as the Rubine,^o laughing sweetly red, ruby
 Some like faire Emeraudes, not yet well ripenèd.

55
 And them amongst, some were of burnisht gold,
 So made by art, to beautifie the rest,
 Which did themselves emongst the leaves enfold,
 490 As lurking from the vew of covetous guest,
 That the weake bowes,^o with so rich load boughs
 opprest,
 Did bow adowne, as over-burdened.
 Under that Porch a comely dame did rest,
 Clad in faire weedes,^o but fowle disorderèd, garments
 495 And garments loose, that seemd unmeet^o for unsuitable
 womanhed.^o womanhood

56
 In her left hand a Cup of gold she held,
 And with her right the riper fruit did reach,
 Whose sappy liquor, that with fulnesse sweld,
 Into her cup she scruzd,^o with daintie squeezed breach^o breaking
 500 Of her fine fingers, without fowle empeach,^o injury
 That so faire wine-presse made the wine more sweet:
 Thereof she usd to give to drinke to each,
 Whom passing by she happenèd to meet:
 It was her guise,^o all Straungers goodly so to greet. habit

57
 505 So she to Guyon offred it to tast;
 Who taking it out of her tender hond,
 The cup to ground did violently cast,
 That all in peeces it was broken fond,^o found
 And with the liquor stainèd all the lond:
 510 Whereat Excesse exceedingly was wroth,
 Yet no'te^o the same amend, ne yet could not withstond,^o prevent
 But suffered him to passe, all were she loth;^o reluctant
 Who nought regarding her displeasure forward goth.

58
 There the most daintie Paradise on ground,
 515 It selfe doth offer to his sober eye,
 In which all pleasures plenteously abound,
 And none does others happinesse envye:
 The painted^o flowres, the trees upshooting variegated
 hye,
 The dales for shade, the hilles for breathing space,
 520 The trembling groves, the Christall^o clear water running by;
 And that, which all faire workes doth most aggrace,^o add grace
 The art, which all that wrought, appeared^o in was visible
 no place.

59
 One would have thought, (so cunningly, the rude,
 And scornèd parts were mingled with the fine,) 525 That nature had for wantonnesse ensude^o imitated
 Art, and that Art at nature did repine;^o fret
 So striving each th'other to undermine,
 Each did the others worke more beautifie;
 So diff'ring both in willes,^o agreed in wills
 fine:^o the conclusion
 530 So all agreed through sweete diversitie,
 This Gardin to adorne with all varietie.

60
 And in the midst of all, a fountaine stood,
 Of richest substaunce, that on earth might bee,
 So pure and shiny, that the silver flood
 535 Through every channell running one might see;
 Most goodly it with curious imagerie
 Was over-wrought, and shapes of naked boyes,
 Of which some seemd with lively jollitee,
 To fly about, playing their wanton toyes,^o games
 540 Whilest others did them selves embay^o in liquid bathe
 joyes.

61
 And over all, of purest gold was spred,
 A trayle of yvie in his native hew:
 For the rich mettall was so coloured,
 That wight,^o who did not well avis'd^o creature / attentively
 it vew,

545 Would surely deeme it to be yvie trew:
 Low his lascivious armes adown did creepe,
 That themselves dipping in the silver dew,
 Their fleecy flowres they tenderly did steepe,
 Which drops of Christall seemd for wantones^o to weepe. wantonness

62

550 Infinit streames continually did well
 Out of this fountaine, sweet and faire to see,
 The which into an ample laver^o fell, basin
 And shortly grew to so great quantitie,
 That like a little lake it seemd to bee;
 555 Whose depth exceeded not three cubits¹ hight,
 That through the waves one might the bottom see,
 All pav'd beneath with Jasper² shining bright,
 That seemd the fountaine in that sea did sayle upright.

63

And all the margent^o round about was set, border 560 With shady Laurell trees, thence to defend^o protect from
 The sunny beames, which on the billowes bet,^o beat
 And those which therein bathed, mote offend.^o bother
 As Guyon hapned by the same to wend,^o pass
 Two naked Damzelles he therein espyde,
 565 Which therein bathing, seemed to contend,
 And wrestle wantonly,^o ne car'd to hyde, lasciviously
 Their dainty parts from vew of any, which them eyde.

64

Sometimes the one would lift the other quight
 Above the waters, and then downe againe
 570 Her plong,^o as over maistered by might, plunge
 Where both awhile would covered remaine,
 And each the other from to rise restraine;
 The whiles their snowy limbes, as through a vele,
 So through the Christall waves appeared plaine:
 575 Then suddenly both would themselves unhele,^o display
 And th'amarous sweet spoiles to greedy eyes revele.

65

As that faire Starre, the messenger of morne,
 His deawy face out of the sea doth reare:

Or as the Cyprian goddesse,³ newly borne
 580 Of th'Oceans fruitfull froth, did first appeare:
 Such seemed they, and so their yellow heare
 Christalline^o humour^o dropped downe apace. clear / water
 Whom such when Guyon saw, he drew him neare,
 And somewhat gan^o relent his earnest pace, began
 585 His stubborne brest gan secret pleasaunce to embrace.

66

The wanton Maidens him espying, stood Gazing a while at his unwonted^o unfamiliar guise;^o appearance
 Then th'one her selfe low ducked in the flood,
 Abasht, that her a straunger did advise:^o observe
 590 But th'other rather higher did arise,
 And her two lilly paps^o aloft displayd, breasts
 And all, that might his melting hart entise
 To her delights, she unto him bewrayd:^o revealed
 The rest hid underneath, him more desirous made.

67

595 With that, the other likewise up arose,
 And her faire lockes, which formerly were bownd
 Up in one knot, he low adowne did lose:^o loosen
 Which flowing long and thick, her cloth'd arownd,
 And th'yvorie in golden mantle gownd:^o covered
 600 So that faire spectacle from him was reft,^o taken
 Yet that, which reft it, no lesse faire was fownd:
 So hid in lockes and waves from lookers theft,
 Nought but her lovely face she for his looking left.

68

Withall she laughèd, and she blusht withall,
 605 That blushing to her laughter gave more grace,
 And laughter to her blushing, as did fall:
 Now when they spide the knight to slacke his pace,
 Them to behold, and in his sparkling face
 The secret signes of kindled lust appeare,
 610 Their wanton meriments they did encrease,
 And to him beckned, to approch more neare,
 And shewd him many sights, that courage^o cold lust could reare.^o arouse

² Jasper Semi-precious stone.

³ that faire Starre ... Cyprian goddesse Venus, the morning star, referred to as the Cyprian goddess because one of her main shrines was on the island of Cyprus.

69

On which when gazing him the Palmer saw,
 He much rebukt those wandring eyes of his,
 615 And counsell'd well, him forward thence did draw.
 Now are they come nigh to the Bowre of blis
 Of her fond favorites so nam'd amis:
 When thus the Palmer; Now Sir, well advise;^o consider
 For here the end of all our travell is:
 620 Here wonnes^o Acrasia,¹ whom we must surprise, lives
 Else she will slip away, and all our drift^o despise. purpose

70

Eftsoones^o they heard a most melodious soon afterwards
 sound,
 Of all that mote delight a daintie eare,
 Such as attonce might not on living ground,
 625 Save in this Paradise, be heard elsewhere:
 Right hard it was, for wight, which did it heare,
 To read,^o what manner musicke that mote bee: interpret
 For all that pleasing is to living eare,
 Was there consorted^o in one harmonee, combined
 630 Birdes, voyces, instruments, windes, waters, all agree.

71

The joyous birdes shrouded in chearefull shade,
 Their notes unto the voyce attemptred^o sweet; attuned
 Th'Angelicall soft trembling voyces made
 To th'instruments divine respondence^o response meet:^o fitting
 635 The silver sounding instruments did meet^o join
 With the base murmure of the waters fall:
 The waters fall with difference discreet,^o distinct
 Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call:
 The gentle warbling wind low answerèd to all.

72

There, whence that Musick seemèd heard to bee,
 Was the faire Witch her selfe now solacing,^o entertaining
 With a new Lover, whom through sorcerie
 And witchcraft, she from farre did thither bring:
 There she had him now layd a slombering,
 645 In secret shade, after long wanton joyes:

Whilst round about them pleasauntly did sing
 Many faire Ladies, and lascivious boyes,
 That ever mixt their song with light licentious toys.

73

And all that while, right over him she hong,
 650 With her false^o eyes fast fixèd in his sight, treacherous
 As seeking medicine, whence she was stong,
 Or greedily depasturing^o delight: grazing on
 And oft inclining downe with kisses light,
 For feare of waking him, his lips bedewd,
 655 And through his humid eyes did sucke his spright,
 Quite molten into lust and pleasure lewd;
 Wherewith she sighèd soft, as if his case she rew.d.^o pitied

74

The whiles some one did chaunt this lovely lay;^o song
 Ah see, who so faire thing doest faine^o to see, desire
 660 In springing flowre the image of thy day;
 Ah see the Virgin Rose, how sweetly shee
 Doth first peepe forth with bashfull modestee,
 That fairer seemes, the lesse ye see her may;
 Lo see soone after, how more bold and free
 665 Her barèd bosome she doth broad display;
 Loe see soone after, how she fades, and falles away.

75

So passeth, in the passing of a day,
 Of mortall life the leafe, the bud, the flowre,
 Ne more doth flourish after first decay,
 670 That earst^o was sought to decke both bed formerly
 and bowre,
 Of many a Ladie, and many a Paramowre:^o lover
 Gather therefore the Rose, whilst yet is prime,^o spring
 For soone comes age, that will her pride deflowre:
 Gather the Rose of love, whilst yet is time,
 675 Whilst loving thou mayst lovèd be with equall crime.

76

He ceast, and then gan all the quire^o of birdes choir
 Their diverse notes t'attune unto his lay,
 As in approvance of his pleasing words.
 The constant paire heard all, that he did say,
 680 Yet swarvèd^o not, but kept their forward way, swerved
 Through many covert groves, and thickets close,

¹ Acrasia Meaning ill-tempered, or with a poor mix of humors in her body (from Greek: excess, or badly "tempered").

In which they creeping did at last display^o discover
 That wanton Ladie, with her lover lose,^o wanton
 Whose sleepe head she in her lap did soft dispose.^o place

77

685 Upon a bed of Roses she was layd,
 As faint through heat, or dight^o to^o prepared / for pleasant sin,
 And was arayd, or rather disarayd,
 All in a vele of silke and silver thin,
 That hid no whit her alabaster skin,
 690 But rather shewd more white, if more might bee:
 More subtile web Arachne¹ can not spin,
 Nor the fine nets, which oft we woven see
 Of scorched^o deaw, do not in th'aire more dried lightly flee.^o float

78

Her snowy brest was bare to readie spoyle
 695 Of hungry eies, which n'ote^o therewith be fild, could not
 And yet through languour^o of her late sweet toyle, fatigue
 Few drops, more cleare then Nectar, forth distild,^o gathered
 That like pure Orient perles adowne it trild,^o dripped
 And her faire eyes sweet smyling in delight, 700 Moystened their fierie beames, with which she thrild^o pierced
 Fraile harts, yet quenched^o not; like starry light killed
 Which sparckling on the silent waves, does seeme more bright.

79

The young man sleeping by her, seemd to bee
 Some goodly swayne^o of honorable young man
 place,^o rank
 705 That certès it great pittie was to see
 Him his nobilitie so foule deface;
 A sweet regard,^o and amiable grace, manner
 Mixèd with manly sternnesse did appeare
 Yet sleeping, in his well proportiond face,
 710 And on his tender lips the downy heare
 Did now but freshly spring, and silken blossomes beare.

80

His warlike armes, the idle instruments
 Of sleeping praise,^o were hong upon a tree, merit
 And his brave shield, full of old moniments,^o marks of honor
 715 Was fowly ra'st,^o that none the signes might see; erased
 Ne for them, ne for honour carèd hee,
 Ne ought, that did to his advauncement tend,
 But in lewd loves, and wastfull luxuree,^o licentiousness
 His dayes, his goods, his bodie he did spend:
 720 O horrible enchantment, that him so did blend.^o blind

81

The noble Elfe, and carefull Palmer drew
 So nigh them, minding nought, but lustfull game,
 That suddein forth they on them rusht, and threw
 A subtile net, which onely for the same
 725 The skilfull Palmer formally^o did frame. expressly
 So held them under fast, the whiles the rest
 Fled all away for feare of fowler^o shame. fouler
 The faire Enchauntresse, so unwares opprest,^o overwhelmed
 Tryde all her arts, & all her sleights, thence out to 82

730 And eke her lover strove: but all in vaine;
 For that same net so cunningly was wound,
 That neither guile, nor force might it distraine.^o rend
 They tooke them both, & both them strongly bound
 In captive bandes, which there they readie found:
 735 But her in chaines of adamant^o he tyde; diamond
 For nothing else might keepe her safe and sound;
 But Verdant (so he hight^o) he soone untyde, was called
 And counsell sage in steed² thereof to him applyde.

83

But all those pleasant bowres and Pallace brave,^o grand 740 Guyon broke downe, with rigour pittillesse;
 Ne ought their goodly workmanship might save
 Them from the tempest of his wrathfulnesse,
 But that their blisse he turn'd to balefulnesse:^o sadness
 745 Their groves he feld, their gardins did deface,
 Their arbers spoyle, their Cabinets^o suppresses, bowers

 And of the fairest late, now made the fowlest place.

84

Then led they her away, and eke that knight
 They with them led, both sorrowfull and sad:
 750 The way they came, the same retourn'd they right,
 Till they arrivèd, where they lately had
 Charm'd those wild-beasts, that rag'd with furie mad.
 Which now awaking, fierce at them gan fly,
 As in their mistresse reskew,^o whom they lad;^o rescue / led 755 But them the Palmer soone did pacify.
 Then Guyon askt, what meant those beastes, which there did ly.

85

Said he, These seeming beasts are men indeed,
 Whom this Enchauntresse hath transformèd thus,
 760 Whylome^o her lovers, which her lusts did feed, previously
 Now turned into figures hideous,
 According to their mindes like monstruous.
 Sad end (quoth he) of life intemperate,
 And mournfull meed^o of joyes delicious: reward
 But Palmer, if it mote^o thee so aggrate, may 765 Let them returnèd be unto their former state.

Streight way he with his vertuous^o staffe powerful
 them strooke,
 And streight of beasts they comely men became;
 Yet being men they did unmanly looke,
 And starèd ghastly, some for inward shame,
 770 And some for wrath, to see their captive Dame:
 But one above the rest in speciall,
 That had an hog beene late, hight Grille¹ by name,
 Repinèd^o greatly, and did him miscall,^o complained / abuse
 That had from hoggish forme him brought to naturall.

775 Said Guyon, See the mind of beastly man,
 That hath so soone forgot the excellence
 Of his creation, when he life began,

¹ Grille Fierce or cruel. In The Odyssey, Grille is one of Odysseus's men whom Circe turns into a pig. In one of Plutarch's dialogues, Grille then refuses to be returned to human form.

That now he chooseth, with vile difference,^o preference
 To be a beast, and lacke intelligence.

780 To whom the Palmer thus, The donghill kind
 Delights in filth and foule incontinence:
 Let Grill be Grill, and have his hoggish mind,
 But let us hence depart, whilst wether^o serves weather and wind.

Letter to Sir Walter Raleigh on The Faerie Queene

Spenser's letter to Sir Walter Raleigh, an important colleague in England's efforts to govern the often rebellious Irish, was first published, together with a large number of dedicatory sonnets, as an explanatory "annex" to the 1590 Faerie Queene. The 1596 edition dropped it, possibly because Raleigh had recently earned the queen's displeasure or perhaps because, or so think many scholars, what the letter says about the plot sits problematically alongside the poem itself. Nor is it clear how the "virtues" on which Spenser tells Raleigh he would base his projected twelve books in fact relate to those of Aristotle, particularly since Aristotelian tradition had been modified by a still lively Medieval Scholastic and Christian understanding of that Greek philosopher. The Letter reappeared near the end of the 1690 Faerie Queene, and since then it has been routinely printed with the poem, often as a preface even though Spenser wrote it as an appendix. Authorities on Spenser, who read the Letter with interest, caution, and sometimes puzzlement, disagree as to where it should be placed. In this edition we retain it as an "annex," but readers should remember that it is an anomaly—a prefatory afterword.

Letter to Sir Walter Raleigh on The Faerie Queene

A Letter of the author's expounding his whole intention in the course of this work: which, for that it giveth great light to the reader, for the better understanding is hereunto annexed.²

² annexed Added.

To the right noble, and valorous, Sir Walter Raleigh, knight, Lord Warden of the Stanneries,¹ and Her Majesty's lieutenant of the County of Cornwall.

Sir: Knowing how doubtfully all Allegories may be construed, and this book of mine, which I have entituled the Faery Queene, being a continued allegory, or dark conceit,² I have thought good, as well for avoiding of jealous opinions and misconstructions, as also for your better light in reading thereof (being so by you commanded), to discover unto you the general intention and meaning which in the whole course thereof I have fashioned, without expressing of any particular purposes or by-accidents³ therein occasioned. The general end therefore of all the book is to fashion a gentleman or noble person in virtuous and gentle⁴ discipline: which for that I conceived should be most plausible and pleasing being coloured with an historical fiction,⁵ the which the most part of men delight to read rather for variety of matter than for profit of the ensample,⁶ I chose the history of King Arthur, as most fit for the excellency of his person, being made famous by many men's former works, and also furthest from the danger of envy, and suspicion of present time.⁷ In which I have followed all the antique poets historical: first Homer, who in the persons of Agamemnon and Ulysses hath ensampled⁸ a good governor and a virtuous man, the one in his Ilias, the other in his Odysseus; then Virgil, whose like intention was to do⁹ in the person of Æneas; after him Ariosto comprised them both in his

Orlando; and lately Tasso¹⁰ dissevered them again and formed both parts in two persons, namely that part which they in philosophy call Ethice, or virtues of a private man, coloured¹¹ in his Rinaldo; the other named Politice in his Godfredo. By ensample of which excellent poets, I labour to portraiture¹² in Arthur, before he was king, the image of a brave knight perfected in the twelve private moral virtues as Aristotle hath devised, the which is the purpose of these first twelve books:¹³ which if I find to be well accepted, I may be perhaps encouraged to frame the other part of politic virtues in his person after that he came to be king. To some, I know, this method will seem unpleasant, who had rather have good discipline delivered plainly in way of precepts,¹⁴ or sermoned at large, as they use, than thus cloudily enwrapped in allegorical devises. But such, meseems, should be satisfied with the use¹⁵ of these days, seeing all things accounted by their shows and nothing esteemed of that is not delightful and pleasing to common sense.¹⁶ For this cause is Xenophon preferred before Plato,¹⁷ for that the one, in the exquisite depth of his judgement, formed a commonwealth such as it should be, but the other in the person of Cyrus and the Persians fashioned a government such as might best be: so much more profitable and gracious is doctrine by ensample than by rule. So have I laboured to do in the person of Arthur: whom I conceive, after his long education by Timon, to whom he was by Merlin

² dark conceit Semi-concealed or difficult poetic notion, plan, or conception.

³ by-accidents Secondary narratives or descriptions.

⁴ fashion Represent; also form, educate; gentle As befits the gentry class, the well-born.

⁵ historical fiction Imaginary narrative, fiction.

⁶ ensample Example, model.

⁷ suspicion of present time Potential accusations related to current political controversies or government censorship.

⁸ ensampled Exemplified.

⁹ like intention was to do I.e., "intention was to do something similar."

¹⁰ Ariosto Lodovico Ariosto (1474–1533) wrote the epic romance Orlando Furioso (1532); Tasso Torquato Tasso (1544–95) published Rinaldo, a chivalric romance, in 1562, and Gerusalemme Liberata (which follows the epic adventures of Count Godfredo) in 1581.

¹¹ coloured Illustrated, demonstrated.

¹² portraiture Portray.

¹³ first twelve books Evidently, Spenser planned for The Faerie Queene to comprise 12 books and then perhaps a sequel of another 12; so far as we know, he completed only six.

¹⁴ precepts Principles, advice.

¹⁵ use Custom.

¹⁶ shows Outward appearances; common sense Popular opinion, or less pejoratively, the consensus.

delivered to be brought up so soon as he was born of the Lady Igrayne, to have seen in a dream or vision the Faery Queene, with whose excellent beauty ravished, he awaking resolved to seek her out, and so being by Merlin armed, and by Timon thoroughly instructed, he went to seek her forth in Faery Land. In that Faery Queene I mean glory in my general intention, but in my particular I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our sovereign the Queene,¹ and her kingdom in Faery Land. And yet, in some places else² I do otherwise shadow³ her. For considering she beareth two persons, the one of a most royal queene or empress, the other of a most virtuous and beautiful lady, this latter part in some places I do express in Belphebe, fashioning her name according to your own excellent conceit of Cynthia⁴ (Phoebe and Cynthia being both names of Diana). So in the person of Prince Arthur I set forth magnificence⁵ in particular, which virtue for that (according to Aristotle and the rest) it is the perfection of all the rest and containeth in it them all, therefore in the whole course I mention the deeds of Arthur applicable to that virtue which I write of in that book. But of the 12 other virtues I make 12 other knights the patrons, for the more variety of the history: of which these three books contain three. The first of the Knight of the Redcrosse, in whom I express holiness. The second of Sir Guyon, in whom I set forth temperance.⁶ The third of Britomart, a lady knight, in whom I

² places else Other places.

³ shadow Indirectly represent.

⁴ Cynthia Probably as an effort to soften her anger, Raleigh's poem The Ocean to Cynthia (1592?) praises the still-offended Queen Elizabeth. Cynthia, Phoebe, and Diana were all names for the Greco-Roman virgin goddess of the hunt and the moon.

⁵ magnificence "Greatness in action," specifically a princely and protective liberality suiting a great ruler. How Magnificence relates to the Aristotelian "Magnanimity" (greatness of soul) has been debated, as has the relation of either virtue to Christian thinking, especially granted Medieval interpretations of Aristotle.

⁶ temperance Moderation and self restraint, but also the dynamic fusion of opposites (one "tempers" a sword with fire and cold water).

picture chastity.⁷ But because the beginning of the whole work seemeth abrupt and as depending upon other antecedents, it needs that ye know the occasion of these three knights' several adventures. For the method of a poet historical is not such as of an historiographer.⁸ For an historiographer discourseth⁹ of affairs orderly as they were done, accounting as well the times as the actions; but a poet thrusteth into the midst, even where it most concerneth him, and there recouring to the things forepast,¹⁰ and divining of things to come, maketh a pleasing analysis of all.

The beginning therefore of my history, if it were to be told by an historiographer, should be the twelfth book, which is the last, where I devise that the Faery Queene kept her annual feast 12 days, upon which 12 several¹¹ days, the occasions of the 12 several adventures happened, which being undertaken by 12 several knights, are in these 12 books severally handled and discoursed. The first was this: In the beginning of the feast, there presented himself a tall clownish¹² young man, who falling before the Queen of Faeries desired a boon¹³ (as the manner then was), which during that feast she might not refuse: which was that he might have the achievement of any adventure which during that feast should happen; that being granted, he rested him on the floor, unfit through his rusticity for a better place. Soon after entered a fair lady in mourning weeds,¹⁴ riding on a white ass, with a dwarf behind her leading a warlike steed that bore the arms of a knight, and his spear in the dwarf's hand. She, falling before the Queene of Faeries, complained that her father and mother, an ancient king and queene, had been by an huge dragon many years shut up in a brasen¹ castle, who thence suffered them not to issue;² and therefore besought the Faery Queene to assign her some one of her knights to take on him that exploit. Presently that clownish person, upstarting, desired that adventure, whereat the Queene much wondering and the lady much gainsaying,³ yet he earnestly importuned⁴ his desire. In the end the lady told him that unless that armour which she brought would serve him (that is, the armour of a Christian man specified by Saint Paul, vi Ephes.),⁵ that he could not succeed in that enterprise: which being forthwith put upon him with due furnitures⁶ thereunto, he seemed the goodliest man in all that company, and was well liked of the lady. And soon after taking on him knighthood, and mounting on that strange courser,⁷ he went forth with her on that adventure, where beginneth the first book, vz.⁸ "A gentle knight was pricking on the plain," &c.

The second day there came in a palmer⁹ bearing an infant with bloody hands, whose parents he complained to have been slain by an enchantress called Acrasia, and therefore craved of the Faery Queene to appoint him some knight to perform that adventure, which being assigned to Sir Guyon, he presently went forth with that same palmer, which is the beginning of the second book and the whole subject thereof. The third day there came in a groom,¹⁰ who complained before the Faery Queene, that a vile enchanter called Busirane had in hand a most fair lady, called Amoret, whom he kept in most grievous torment because she would not yield him the pleasure of her body. Whereupon Sir Scudamour, the lover of that lady, presently took on him that adventure. But being unable to perform it by reason of the hard¹¹ enchantments, after long sorrow, in the end met with Britomart, who succoured¹² him, and rescued his love.

But by occasion hereof, many other adventures are intermeddled, but rather as accidents than intendments,¹³ as the love of Britomart, the overthrow of Marinell, the misery of Florimell, the virtuousness of Belphebe, the lasciviousness¹⁴ of Hellenora, and many the like.

Thus much, Sir, I have briefly overrun¹⁵ to direct your understanding to the well-head of the history, that from thence gathering the whole intention of the conceit ye may, as in a handful, grip all the discourse, which otherwise may happily¹⁶ seem tedious and confused. So humbly craving the continuance of your honourable favour towards me, and th'eternal establishment of your happiness, I humbly take leave.

23 January, 1589¹⁷

Yours most humbly affectionate,

Ed. Spenser

 IN CONTEXT

The Redcrosse Knight

This illustration of the Redcrosse Knight is from the 1590 edition of The Faerie Queene.

Christian Armor

The opening stanza of Book 1 presents a riddle: how can Redcrosse Knight's armor be dented and battle scarred when the Knight has yet to see battle? Spenser expected his readers to realize that the Knight's armor is allegorical, the Christian armor specified by Saint Paul in Ephesians 6.11–17. The idea of spiritual armor for the spiritual warfare of everyday life was a popular trope in Renaissance theology and literature, and one of the best known treatments appeared in the Handbook of the Christian Soldier by the great Dutch humanist Desiderius Erasmus (c. 1469–1546).

from Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, 6.11–17 (Geneva Bible, modernized spelling)

Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the assaults of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, and against the worldly governors, the princess of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickednesses, which are in the high places.

For this cause take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to resist in the evil day, & having finished all things, stand fast.

Stand therefore, and your loins gird about with verity, & having on the breast plate of righteousness,

And your feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace.

Above all, take the shield of faith, wherewith ye may quench all the fiery darts of the wicked,

And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.

from Desiderius Erasmus, Enchiridion militis Christiani [Handbook of the Christian Soldier] (1504), first translated into English in 1533, probably by William Tyndale. The following excerpt is a modern spelling version of the 1533 translation.

ON THE ARMOR OF THE CHRISTIAN KNIGHT

Wilt thou hear the instruments or artillery of Christian men's war? And the zeal of him (saith scripture) shall take harness, and shall harness his creature to avenge his enemies; he will put on justice for his breast plate, and take for his helmet sure and true judgement; he will take a shield of equity impenetrable or that cannot be pierced, yea and he will sharpen or fashion cruel wrath into a spear. Thou readest also in Isaiah he is armed with justice as with an habergeon,¹ and a sallet² of health upon his head; he is clothed with the vestures³ of vengeance, and covered as it were with a cloak of zeal.

Now if thou list, go thee to the storehouse of Paul that valiant captain, certainly thou shalt also find there the armour of war, not carnal things but valiant in God to destroy fortresses and counsels, and every high thing that exalteth himself against the doctrine of God. Thou shalt find there the armour of God, by the which thou mayest resist in a woeful day. Thou shalt find the harness of justice on the right hand, and on the left thou shalt find the defense of thy sides' verity, and the habergeon of justice, the buckler⁴ of faith wherewith thou mayest quench all the hot and fiery weapons of thy cruel adversary. Thou shalt find also the helmet of health and the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, with the which all, if a man shall be diligently covered and fenced, he may boldly without fear bring forth the bold saying of Paul: who shall separate us from the love of God? shall tribulation? shall straitness or difficulty? shall hunger? shall nakedness? shall peril? shall persecution? shall a sword? Behold how mighty enemies and how much feared of all men he setteth at nought.

But hear also a certain greater thing, for it followeth. But in all things we have overcome by his help which loved us. And I am assured (saith he) that neither death nor life, nor angels, neither principates, neither virtues, neither present things, neither things to come, neither strength, neither highness, neither lowness, nor none other creature shall or may separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesu. O happy trust and confidence which the weapons or armour of light giveth to Paul, that is by interpretation a little man, which calleth himself the refuse or outcast of the world. Of such armour therefore abundantly shall holy scripture minister to thee, if thou wilt occupy thy time in it with all thy might: so that thou shalt not need our counsel or admonitions. Nevertheless, seeing it is thy mind, lest I should seem not to have obeyed thy request, I have forged for thee this little treatise called Enchiridion, that is to say, a certain little dagger, whom never lay out of thy hand, no not when thou art at meat, or in thy chamber. Insomuch that if at any time thou shalt be compelled to make a pilgrimage in these worldly occupations, and shalt be accumbered to bear about with the whole and complete armour and harness of holy scripture, yet commit not that the sutler¹ in wait at any season should come upon thee and find thee utterly unarmed, but at the least let it not grieve thee to have with them this little hanger,² which shall not be heavy to bear, nor unprofitable for thy defense, for it is very little, yet if thou use it wisely, and couple with it the buckler of faith, thou shalt be able to withstand the fierce and raging assault of thine enemy: so that thou shalt have no deadly wound.

Spirituality and The Faerie Queene

The Bible's Song of Solomon, a quasi-dialogue of lovers filled with sensuous metaphors, had long been read in both Jewish and Christian tradition as allegorizing the marriage between God and humanity, or God and the soul, or Christ and the Church (the body of all believers). For writers such as Spenser and Donne, the tradition further legitimized the crossover between the spiritual and the erotic found in much Renaissance art and literature.

Heading to the Song of Solomon (Geneva Bible, modernized spelling)

In this song, Salomon by most sweet and comfortable allegories and parables describeth the perfect love of Jesus Christ, the true Salomon and King of peace, and the faithful soul of his church which he hath sacrificed and appointed to be his spouse, holy, chaste, and without reprehension. So that here is declared the singular love of the bridegroom toward the bride, and his great and excellent benefits wherewith he doth enrich her of his pure bounty and grace without any of her deservings. Also the earnest affection of the church which is inflamed with the love of Christ desiring to be more and more joined to him in love, and not to be forsaken for any spot or blemish that is in her.

¹ sutler One who sells provisions to soldiers.

² hanger Short sword.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY

1554 – 1586

Sir Philip Sidney remains not only a famous writer but an example of the complete Renaissance courtier. He was the author of the sonnet sequence Astrophil and Stella, of the prose romance Arcadia and of An Apology for Poetry (also known as A Defence of Poesy), the first extended work of literary criticism in English. Sidney's writings are witty, eloquent, and imaginative in their marriage of English style and the Renaissance genres and ideals embraced by artists in Italy, France, and Spain. Sidney was also a courtier, diplomat, and gentleman-soldier renowned for his courtesy; according to a probably apocryphal story, when wounded on the battlefield and offered water, he saw a thirsty foot-soldier eying the bottle longingly and told him to take it, saying "Thy necessity is yet greater than mine."

Sidney was born on 30 November 1554, the eldest son of Sir Henry Sidney and Lady Mary Dudley. Although his family was not rich by the standards of the nobility, his birth placed him in an élite circle: his father, at one point Viceroy of Ireland, had been a friend of Edward VI; his godfather was Philip II of Spain, for whom he was named; and his uncle, Robert Dudley, was the powerful Earl of Leicester, the royal favorite who had courted Elizabeth and whom the Queen certainly loved. Sidney's education befitted one of his class. He entered Shrewsbury School in 1564, was taught there by the learned

Thomas Ashton, and in 1568 entered Christ Church, Oxford, where he remained until he was 17. He left without a degree, as was often done, and was sent on a tour of Europe to learn about the languages and circumstances of other countries. This trip was to be highly beneficial for the young Sidney: it sparked a fascination with Continental ideas, and the important figures he befriended in the political, philosophical, and scholarly worlds helped shape his mind and career.

Sidney's cosmopolitanism also earned him some favor at court. In 1572 he was a junior member of a special embassy to France's Charles IX. While in Paris, Sidney witnessed the horrifying St. Bartholomew's Day massacre in which many Huguenots (French Protestants) were slaughtered. The event left its mark on him, confirming his passionate, if hardly narrow-minded, Protestantism. He continued his travels around Europe, studying for a while at the University of Padua and visiting Vienna, Frankfurt, and Prague. He returned to England in May 1575, finding service with the Queen and gaining a reputation as an excellent diplomat.

Although Sidney's writing took second place to his political service, he influenced the literary world by encouraging other writers such as Edward Dyer, Fulke Greville (who later wrote his biography), and the young Edmund Spenser, who dedicated his Shepherd's Calendar (1579) to him. Sidney's own first known work is The Lady of May (1578), a masque he composed for a royal visit; it featured the Queen herself.

Knowing his talent as a persuasive writer, the political faction headed by the Earl of Leicester and Sir Francis Walsingham, an important royal advisor and director of the secret service whose daughter was to marry Sidney, asked Philip to write a letter to Elizabeth opposing her marriage plans. Throughout the 1570s Spain had been gathering political and military power, so as a counterbalance some in England and France suggested an alliance between the two nations to be cemented by a match between Elizabeth and the Duke of Alençon, brother of the French king (who had himself once courted the English queen). In his letter Sidney reminds the queen of the duke's role in the murder of Huguenots and urges her not to marry a foreign and Catholic prince. It used to be thought that Elizabeth was highly displeased at this gesture: John Stubbs, Puritan gentleman, printed a pamphlet that contained similar advice and was severely punished. Sidney, however, was doing his duty as a courtier, and there is no evidence that the Queen resented his letter. He did fall out with the Earl of Oxford in a tennis-court quarrel and, given the Earl's murderous proclivities, seems to have thought it safer to stay with his sister Mary and her husband, the Earl of Pembroke, at their Wiltshire manor for a year. There he composed verses, translated a few Huguenot texts and some psalms, and wrote A Defence of Poesy (published in 1595). In this last, Sidney sets out a more wide-ranging and substantial theory of literature and criticism than any that had yet appeared in English, lightened by urbane humor and touches of self-mockery and with elements of paradox (Sidney smilingly claims to prove the distorting power of self-love by showing how he, a poet, can praise poetry). By "poetry" Sidney means fictions, products of the imagination, which he insists are more psychologically compelling than the historian's facts or the philosopher's moral abstractions. He also comments on particular authors and works, and compares modern English literature to that of ancient Greece and Rome. His assessment of the English play Gorboduc is the first sustained critical discussion of a literary work in English.

In writing his poetic work Astrophil and Stella, and despite his claim not to be a "pickpurse of another's wit," Sidney had before him a major Continental model—the Petrarchan sonnet sequence. Although Sidney's own contribution to, and revision of, the genre was not printed until five years after his death, the sonnets had been circulating in manuscript. Their publication in 1591 launched a brief but intense fashion for sonnet sequences. Sidney's longest work, The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, a pastoral romance with elements of epic and drama, recounts the romantic and martial adventures of two Greek princes, Musidorus and Pyrocles. Mixed in with the five books of prose narrative are a number of pastoral poems that sometimes experiment with classical meters. Ostensibly begun as entertainment for the author's sister, Sidney revised what is now called "The Old Arcadia" (lost until 1908), increasing the work's epic possibilities and political significance; he was part way through this version, now called "The New Arcadia," when he died. In 1590 his sister Mary published The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, a hybrid volume with the revised first part and the unrevised later part; it was this version that became popular and influential in England and even on the Continent.

In the early 1580s Sidney was knighted, named Joint Master of the Ordnance, and later charged with helping the English prepare an expedition to aid the Dutch in their revolt against Spain. In 1585 he was appointed Governor of Flushing, a town in the Netherlands that the English used as a base of operations, where he participated in several successful armed forays against the Spanish. On 22 September 1586, during a skirmish with Spanish forces outside the Dutch town of Zutphen, Sidney was shot in the thigh. The wound became gangrenous, and Sidney died of the infection on 17 October 1586. A flurry of grieving poetry was to follow and in February 1587 the body was brought home and given a magnificent funeral—an occasion designed in part to stir public patriotism and encourage support for the struggle against Spain. A fine poet had died but a legend had been born.

Loving in truth, and fain^o in verse my love desiring to show,

That she, dear she,¹ might take some pleasure of my pain,

Pleasure might cause her read, reading might make her know,

Knowledge might pity win, and pity grace obtain,

5 I sought fit words to paint the blackest face of woe,
Studying inventions fine, her wits to entertain,
Oft turning others' leaves, to see if thence would flow
Some fresh and fruitful showers upon my sun-burned brain.

But words came halting forth, wanting Invention's stay;^o support

10 Invention, Nature's child, fled step-dame Study's blows,
And others' feet still seemed but strangers in my way.
Thus, great with child to speak, and helpless in my throes,
Biting my truant pen, beating myself for spite,
"Fool," said my Muse to me, "look in thy heart and write."

2

Not at first sight, nor with a dribbèd^o shot, faulty Love² gave the wound which while I breathe will bleed.

But known worth did in mine³ of time proceed,
'Till by degrees it had full conquest got.

5 I saw and liked, I liked but lovèd not,
I loved, but straight did not what Love decreed.
At length to Love's decrees I—forced—agreed,
Yet with repining at so partial^o lot. unequal

Now even that footstep of lost liberty

10 Is gone, and now like slave-born Muscovite.

I call it praise to suffer tyranny;
And now employ the remnant of my wit.
To make myself believe that all is well,
While with a feeling skill I paint my hell.

¹ That she, dear she In the 1591 edition, this phrase is "That the dear she."

² Love Cupid.

³ mine Subterranean passage dug under an enemy fortress.

7

When Nature made her chief work, Stella's eyes,

In colour black, why wrapped she beams so bright?

Would she in beamy black, like painter wise,
Frame daintiest lustre mixed of shades and light?

5 Or did she else that sober hue devise,
In object⁴ best to knit and strength our sight,
Lest if no veil these brave gleams did disguise,
They, sun-like, should more dazzle than delight?

Or would she her miraculous power show,
10 That whereas black seems beauty's contrary,
She e'en in black doth make all beauties flow?

Both so, and thus, she, minding^o Love, remembering should be Placed ever there, gave him this mourning weed^o garment

To honour all their deaths who for her bleed.

18

With what sharp checks I in myself am shent⁵

When into Reason's audit I do go,

And by just counts myself a bankrout^o know bankrupt
Of all those goods which Heaven to me hath lent.

5 Unable quite to pay even Nature's rent,
Which unto it by birthright I do owe.
And which is worse, no good excuse can show,
But that my wealth I have most idly spent.
My youth doth waste, my knowledge brings forth toys,⁶

10 My wit doth strive those passions to defend,
Which for reward spoil it with vain annoys.⁷

I see my course to lose myself doth bend.

I see, and yet no greater sorrow take

Than that I lose no more for Stella's sake.

20

Fly, fly, my friends, I have my death wound; fly!

See there that boy, that murdering boy^o I say, Cupid

Who like a thief, hid in dark bush doth lie,

Till bloody bullet get him wrongful prey.

5 So tyrant he no fitter place could spy,

⁴ In object With the goal.

⁵ sharp checks Reproaches; shent Disgraced.

⁶ toys Frivolous pieces of writing.

⁷ annoys Irritations.

Nor so fair level¹ in so secret stay,
 As that sweet black which veils the heav'nly eye:
 There himself with his shot he close doth lay.
 Poor passenger,^o pass now thereby I did, passer-by 10 And stayed pleased with the prospect of the place,
 While that black hue from me the bad guest hid:
 But straight I saw motions of lightning grace,
 And then descried the glist'ring of his dart:
 But ere I could fly hence, it pierced my heart.

21

Your words, my friend, (right healthful caustics²) blame
 My young mind marred, whom Love doth windlass^o so, ensnare
 That mine own writings like bad servants show
 My wits, quick in vain thoughts, in virtue lame;
 5 That Plato³ I read for nought, but if^o he tame unless Such doltish gyres;^o that to my birth I owe circles
 Nobler desires, lest else that friendly foe,
 Great expectation, were a train of shame.
 For since mad March great promise made of me,
 10 If now the May of my years much decline,
 What can be hoped my harvest time will be?
 Sure you say well, "Your wisdom's golden mine,
 Dig deep with learning's spade." Now tell me this,
 Hath this world aught so fair as Stella is?

22

In highest way of heav'n the Sun did ride,
 Progressing then from fair twins' golden place:⁴
 Having no scarf of clouds before his face,
 But shining forth of heat in his chief pride;
 5 When some fair ladies by hard promise tied,
 On horseback met him in his furious race,
 Yet each prepared with fan's well-shading grace
 From that foe's wounds^o their tender skins sunburn
 to hide.
 Stella alone with face unarmed marched.

¹ so fair level So well take aim.

² right healthful caustics Truly life-giving corrosives.

³ Plato Plato likened reason to a charioteer of the passions.

⁴ fair twins' golden place Gemini, the sign from which the sun emerges in June.

10 Either to do like him which open shone,
 Or careless of the wealth because her own:
 Yet were the hid and meaner beauties parch'd,
 Her daintiest bare went free; the cause was this,
 The Sun, which others burned, did her but kiss.

23

The curious wits seeing dull pensiveness
 Bewray^o itself in my long settled eyes, reveal
 Whence those same fumes of melancholy rise,
 With idle pains, and missing aim, do guess.
 5 Some that know how my spring I did address,
 Deem that my Muse some fruit of knowledge plies:
 Others, because the Prince^o my service tries, the Queen
 Think that I think state errors to redress.
 But harder judges judge ambition's rage,
 10 Scourge of itself, still climbing slipp'ry place,
 Holds my young brain cativ'd^o in golden cage. captive
 Oh fools, or over-wise, alas the race
 Of all my thoughts hath neither stop nor start,
 But only Stella's eyes and Stella's heart.

24

Rich fools there be, whose base and filthy heart
 Lies hatching still the goods wherein they flow:
 And damning their own selves to Tantal's smart,⁵ Wealth breeding want, more blist^o more blessed wretched grow.
 5 Yet to those fools heav'n such wit doth impart
 As what their hands do hold, their heads do know,
 And knowing love, and loving, lay apart,
 As sacred things, far from all danger's show.
 But that rich fool⁶ who by blind Fortune's lot
 10 The richest gem of love and life enjoys,
 And can with foul abuse such beauties blot;
 Let him, deprived of sweet but unfelt joys, (Exiled for aye^o from those high treasures, which ever
 He knows not) grow in only folly rich.

⁵ Tantal's smart The torment of Tantalus, the miser, who was condemned to perpetual thirst even amid water.

⁶ that rich fool Lord Rich, the husband of Penelope Devereaux (Sidney's Stella).

The wisest scholar¹ of the wight^o most wise man
 By Phoebus' doom,² with sugared sentence says,
 That Virtue, if it once met with our eyes,
 Strange flames of love it in our souls would raise;
 5 But for that man with pain his truth describes,
 While he each thing in sense's balance weighs,
 And so nor will, nor can behold those skies
 Which inward sun to heroic mind displays,
 Virtue of late with virtuous care to stir^o encourage 10 Love of herself, took Stella's shape, that she
 To mortal eyes might sweetly shine in her.
 It is most true, for since I her did see,
 Virtue's great beauty in that face I prove,
 And find th'effect, for I do burn in love.

26

Though dusty^o wits dare scorn astrology, earthbound
 And fools can think those lamps^o of purest light stars
 Whose numbers, ways, greatness, eternity,
 Promising wonders, wonder do invite,
 5 To have for no cause birthright in the sky,
 But for to spangle the black weeds of night:
 Or for some brawl,^o which in that country dance
 chamber high,
 They should still dance to please a gazer's sight;
 For me, I do Nature unidle know,
 10 And know great causes, great effects procure:
 And know those bodies high reign on the low.
 And if these rules did fail, proof^o makes me sure, experience
 Who oft fore-judge my after-following race,
 By only those two stars in Stella's face.

27

Because I oft in dark abstracted guise
 Seem most alone in greatest company,
 With dearth of words, or answers quite awry,
 To them that would make speech of speech arise,
 5 They deem, and of their doom the rumour flies,
 That poison foul of bubbling pride doth lie
 So in my swelling breast that only I
 Fawn on myself, and others do despise:

¹ wisest scholar Plato was the pupil of Socrates.

² By Phoebus' doom Judged most wise by the oracle of Apollo at Delphi.

Yet pride I think doth not my soul possess,
 10 Which looks too oft in his unflatt'ring glass:^o mirror
 But one worse fault, ambition, I confess,
 That makes me oft my best friends overpass,
 Unseen, unheard, while though to highest place
 Bends all his powers, even^o unto Stella's grace. only

31

With how sad steps, oh Moon, thou climb'st the skies,
 How silently, and with how wan^o a face. pale
 What, may it be, that even in heav'nly place
 That busy archer^o his sharp arrows tries? Cupid
 5 Sure, if that long-with-love-acquainted eyes
 Can judge of love, thou feel'st a lover's case;
 I read it in thy looks; thy languished grace
 To me that feel the like, thy state describes.^o reveals
 Then ev'n of fellowship, oh Moon, tell me
 10 Is constant love deemed there but want of wit?
 Are beauties there as proud as here they be?
 Do they above love to be loved, and yet
 Those lovers scorn whom that love doth possess?
 Do they call virtue there ungratefulness?

34

Come, let me write. "And to what end?" To ease
 A burdened heart. "How can words ease, which are
 The glasses of thy daily vexing care?"
 Oft cruel fights well-pictured forth do please.
 5 "Art not ashamed to publish³ thy disease?"
 Nay, that may breed my fame, it is so rare.
 "But will not wise men think thy words fond ware?"⁴
 Then be they close,^o and so none shall displease. concealed
 "What idler thing than speak and not be heard?"
 10 What harder thing than smart and not to speak?
 Peace, foolish wit, with wit my wit is marred.
 Thus write I while I doubt⁵ to write, and wreak
 My harms on ink's poor loss. Perhaps some find Stella's great pow'rs that so confuse my mind.

39

Come, Sleep! O Sleep, the certain knot of peace,
 The baiting place of wit, the balm of woe,

³ publish Make public.

⁴ fond ware Frivolities.

⁵ doubt Hesitate.

The poor man's wealth, the prisoner's release,
 Th' indifferent^o judge 'tween the high and low. impartial
 5 With shield of proof shield me from out the press
 Of those fierce darts Despair at me doth throw.
 O make in me those civil wars to cease;
 I will good tribute pay, if thou do so.
 Take thou of me smooth pillows, sweetest bed,
 10 A chamber deaf to noise and blind to light,
 A rosy garland, and a weary head.
 And if these things, as being thine by right,
 Move not thy heavy grace, thou shalt in me,
 Livelier than elsewhere, Stella's image see.

41

Having this day my horse, my hand, my lance
 Guided so well, that I obtained the prize,
 Both by the judgment of the English eyes,
 And of some sent from that sweet enemy France;¹
 5 Horsemen my skill in horsemanship advance,
 Town-folks my strength; a daintier^o more discerning
 judge applies
 His praise to sleight,^o which from good use dexterity
 doth rise;
 Some lucky wits impute it but to chance;
 Others, because of both sides I do take
 10 My blood from them who did excel in this,²
 Think Nature me a man of arms did make.
 How far they shot awry! The true cause is,
 Stella looked on, and from her heav'nly face
 Sent forth the beams, which made so fair my race.

45

Stella oft sees the very face of woe
 Painted in my beclouded stormy face,
 But cannot skill³ to pity my disgrace,
 Not though thereof the cause herself she know.
 5 Yet hearing late a fable which did show
 Of lovers never known a grievous case,

¹ that sweet enemy France French emissaries sent by the Duke of Anjou to negotiate a match with Queen Elizabeth. Sidney participated in a tournament at court to honor the delegation in April, 1581.

² both sides ... this Both sides of Sidney's family were distinguished in war and chivalry.

³ cannot skill Is unable.

Pity thereof gate^o in her breast such place got
 That, from that sea derived, tears' spring did flow.
 Alas, if fancy, drawn by imagined things,
 10 Though false, yet with free scope more grace doth breed
 Than servant's⁴ wrack, where new doubts honor brings,
 Then think, my dear, that you in me do read
 Of lover's ruin some sad tragedy:
 I am not I; pity the tale of me.

47

What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?
 Can those black beams such burning marks⁵ engrave
 In my free side? or am I born a slave,
 Whose neck becomes⁶ such yoke of tyranny?
 5 Or want^o I sense to feel my misery? lack
 Or sprite,^o disdain of such disdain to have, spirit
 Who for long faith, though daily help I crave,
 May get no alms but scorn of beggery?
 Virtue awake, beauty but beauty is;
 10 I may, I must, I can, I will, I do
 Leave following that, which it is gain to miss.
 Let her go. Soft, but here she comes. "Go to,
 Unkind, I love you not." Oh me, that eye
 Doth make my heart give to my tongue the lie.

48

Soul's joy, bend not those morning stars from me,
 Where Virtue is made strong by Beauty's might,
 Where Love is chasteness, Pain doth learn delight,
 And Humbleness grows one with Majesty.
 5 Whatever may ensue, oh let me be
 Copartner of the riches of that sight:
 Let not mine eyes be hell-driv'n from that light:
 Oh look, oh shine, oh let me die and see.
 For though I oft my self of them bemoan,
 10 That through my heart their beamy darts be gone,
 Whose cureless wounds ev'n now most freshly bleed:
 Yet since my death-wound is already got,
 Dear killer, spare not thy sweet cruel shot:
 A kind of grace it is to slay with speed.

⁴ servant's I.e., the lover's.

⁵ burning marks Permanent scars seared into him by Stella's eyes.

⁶ becomes Is suited to.

49

I on my horse, and Love on me doth try
 Our horsemanships, while by strange work I prove
 A horseman to my horse, a horse to Love;
 And now man's wrongs in me, poor beast, descry.^o discover

5 The reins wherewith my rider doth me tie,
 Are humbled thoughts, which bit of reverence move,
 Curbed in with fear, but with gilt boss¹ above
 Of hope, which makes it seem fair to the eye.

The wand^o is will; thou, fancy, saddle art,² crop

10 Girt^o fast by memory; and while I spur fastened

My horse, he spurs with sharp desire my heart:

He sits me fast, however I do stir:

And now hath made me to his hand so right,³

That in the manage⁴ myself takes delight.

50

Stella, the fullness of my thoughts of thee
 Cannot be stayed within my panting breast,
 But they do swell and struggle forth of me,
 Till that in words thy figure be expressed.

5 And yet as soon as they so formed be,
 According to my Lord Love's own behest:

With sad eyes I their weak proportion see,
 To portrait^o that which in this world is best.

portray

10 So that I cannot choose but write my mind,
 And cannot choose but put out what I write,
 While these poor babes⁵ their death in birth do find:

And now my pen these lines had dashed quite,

But that they stopped his fury from the same,

Because their forefront bare sweet Stella's name.⁶

51

Pardon mine ears, both I and they do pray,^o

ask earnestly

So may your tongue still fluently proceed,

To them that do such entertainment need,

So may you still have somewhat new to say.

5 On silly me do not the burden lay

Of all the grave conceits⁷ your brain doth breed;

But find some Hercules to bear, instead

Of Atlas tired, your wisdom's heav'nly sway.

For me, while you discourse of courtly tides,

10 Of cunning fishers in most troubled streams,⁸

Of straying ways, when valiant error guides:

Meanwhile my heart confers with Stella's beams,

And is even irked that so sweet comedy,⁹

By such unsuited speech should hindered be.

52

A strife is grown between Virtue and Love,

While each pretends^o that Stella must be his.

declares

Her eyes, her lips, her all, saith Love, do this

Since they do wear his badge, most firmly prove.

5 But Virtue thus that title doth disprove:

That Stella (oh dear name) that Stella is

That virtuous soul, sure heir of heav'nly bliss,

Not this fair outside, which our hearts doth move.

And therefore, though her beauty and her grace

10 Be Love's indeed, in Stella's self he may

By no pretense claim any manner^o place.

kind of

Well, Love, since this demur our suit doth stay,¹⁰

Let Virtue have that Stella's self; yet thus,

That Virtue but that body grant to us.

53

In martial sports I had my cunning tried,

And yet to break more staves^o did me address:

lances

While, with the people's shouts, I must confess,

Youth, luck, and praise, ev'n filled my veins with pride;

5 When Cupid having me his slave descried,^o discerned

In Mars's livery, prancing in the press:¹¹

"What now, Sir Fool," said he; I would no less.¹²

"Look here, I say." I look'd and Stella spied,

² thou, fancy, saddle art You, imagination, are the saddle.

³ to his hand so right Respond so sensitively to his hand.

⁴ the manage The process of training, management.

⁵ these poor babes The poems.

⁶ Because their ... name Because Stella is the first word of the sonnet, it preserves the poem from destruction.

⁷ grave conceits Serious ideas.

⁸ cunning fishers ... streams Courtiers currying favor amid political turmoil.

⁹ sweet comedy Pleasant reflections.

¹⁰ demur Objection; stay Halt.

¹¹ livery Uniform; press Throng.

¹² I would no less I would like the same attention that you give Mars.

Who hard by made a window send forth light.
 10 My heart then quaked, then dazzled were mine eyes;
 One hand forgot to rule,¹ th'other to fight.
 Nor trumpet's sound I heard, nor friendly cries;
 My foe came on, and beat the air for me,²
 Till that her blush taught me my shame to see.

54

Because I breathe not love to every one,
 Nor do not use set colours³ for to wear,
 Nor nourish special locks of vowed hair,⁴
 Nor give each speech the full point of a groan,
 5 The courtly nymphs,⁵ acquainted with the moan
 Of them, who in their lips Love's standard^o bear; distinctive flag
 "What he?" say they of me. "Now I dare swear,
 He cannot love. No, no, let him alone."
 And think so still, so Stella know my mind.
 10 Profess indeed I do not Cupid's art;
 But you, fair maids, at length this true shall find:
 That his right^o badge is worn but in the heart; true
 Dumb swans, not chatt'ring pies,⁶ do lovers prove;
 They love indeed, who quake to say they love.

55

Muses, I oft invoked your holy aid,
 With choicest flow'rs my speech t'engarland so
 That it, despised in true but naked show,⁷
 Might win some grace in your sweet skill arrayed.
 5 And oft whole troops of saddest words I stayed,^o held back
 Striving abroad a-foraging to go,
 Until by your inspiring I might know
 How their black banner^o might be best displayed. sad aspect
 But now I mean no more your help to try,
 10 Nor other sug'ring of my speech to prove,
 But on her name incessantly to cry:

¹ to rule To control the horse.

² beat the air for me Struck at the empty air instead of me.

³ set colours The usual colors of a lover.

⁴ nourish special ... hair Keep special locks of hair given as a pledge.

⁵ courtly nymphs Women at court.

⁶ Dumb Silent; pies Magpies.

⁷ despised in ... show Despised for being plain, though sincere.

For let me but name her whom I do love,
 So sweet sounds straight mine ear and heart do hit,
 That I well find no eloquence like it.

61

Oft with true sighs, oft with uncallèd tears,
 Now with slow words, now with dumb eloquence,
 I Stella's eyes assail, invade her ears,
 But this at last is her sweet-breathed defense:
 5 That who indeed in-felt affection bears,
 So captives to his saint both soul and sense,
 That wholly hers, all selfness^o he forbears; self-centeredness
 Thence his desires he learns, his life's course thence.
 Now, since her chaste mind hates this love in me,
 With chastened mind I straight must show that she Shall quickly me from what she hates remove.
 O Doctor⁸ Cupid, thou for me reply,
 Driven else to grant, by angel's sophistry,⁹
 That I love not without I leave to love.

69

O joy too high for my low style to show!
 O bliss fit for a nobler state than me!
 Envy, put out thine eyes, lest thou do see
 What oceans of delight in me do flow.
 5 My friend, that oft saw, through all masks, my woe,
 Come, come, and let me pour myself on thee.
 Gone is the winter of my misery,
 My spring appears, O see what here doth grow.
 For Stella hath with words where faith doth shine,
 10 Of her high heart given me the monarchy.
 I, I, O I may say that she is mine!
 And though she give but thus condition'ly
 This realm of bliss, while virtuous course I take,
 No kings be crowned but they some covenants make.

71

Who will in fairest book of Nature know
 How Virtue may best lodged in beauty be,
 Let him but learn of love to read in thee,
 Stella, those fair lines which true goodness show.
 5 There shall he find all vices' overthrow,
 Not by rude force, but sweetest sovereignty

⁸ Doctor One who is well educated and highly knowledgeable.

⁹ sophistry Clever but fallacious reasoning.

Of reason, from whose light those night-birds fly,
 That inward sun in thine eyes shineth so.
 And not content to be Perfection's heir,
 10 Thyself, dost strive all minds that way to move,
 Who mark in thee what is in thee most fair.
 So while thy beauty draws thy heart to love,
 As fast thy virtue bends that love to good.
 "But ah," Desire still cries, "Give me some food."

94

Grief find the words, for thou hast made my brain
 So dark with misty vapours, which arise
 From out thy heavy mould, that inbent¹ eyes
 Can scarce discern the shape of mine own pain.
 5 Do thou then (for thou canst), do thou complain,^o lament
 For my poor soul, which now that sickness tries,²
 Which ev'n to sense, sense of itself denies,
 Though harbingers of death lodge there his train.
 Or if thy love of plaint^o yet mine forbears, lamentation
 10 As of a caitiff³ worthy so to die,
 Yet wail thyself, and wail with causeful tears,
 That though in wretchedness thy life doth lie,
 Yet growest more wretched than thy nature bears,
 By being placed in such a wretch as I.

95

Yet Sighs, dear Sighs, indeed true friends you are,
 That do not leave your least friend at the worst,
 But as you with my breast I oft have nursed,
 So grateful now you wait upon my care.
 5 Faint coward Joy no longer tarry dare,
 Seeing Hope yield when this woe strake^o him first: struck
 Delight protests he is not for th'accursed,
 Though oft himself my mate-in-arms he sware.⁴
 Nay Sorrow comes with such main rage, that he 10 Kills his own children, Tears, finding that they
 By love were made apt to consort with me.
 Only, true Sighs, you do not go away;
 Thank may you have for such a thankful part,
 Thank-worthiest yet when you shall break my heart.

96

Thought, with good cause thou lik'st so well the Night,
 Since kind or chance gives both one livery,⁵
 Both sadly black, both blackly darkened be,
 Night barred from sun, thou from thy own sunlight;
 5 Silence in both displays his sullen might,
 Slow Heaviness in both holds one degree⁶—
That full of doubts, thou of perplexity;
 Thy tears express Night's native moisture right.⁷
 In both a mazel^o solitariness: bewildering
 10 In Night of sprites^o the ghastly powers to stir, spirits
 In thee, or sprites or sprited ghastliness.
 But, but (alas) Night's side the odds hath, fur,⁸ far
 For that^o at length yet doth invite some rest, night
 Thou, though still tired, yet still dost it^o detest. rest

97

Dian,⁹ that fain would cheer her friend the Night,
 Shows her oft at the full her fairest face,
 Bringing with her those starry nymphs, whose chase^o arrows
 From heav'nly standing hits each mortal wight.¹⁰
 5 But ah, poor Night, in love with Phoebus'¹¹ light,
 And endlessly despairing of his grace,
 Herself (to show no other joy hath place)
 Silent and sad in mourning weeds doth dight:¹²
 Ev'n so (alas) a lady, Dian's peer,
 10 With choice delights and rarest company
 Would fain^o drive clouds from out my heavy cheer. gladly
 But woe is me, though Joy itself were she,
 She could not show my blind brain ways of joy,
 While I despair my¹³ Sun's sight to enjoy.

⁵ kind Nature; livery Aspect.⁶ one degree Similar sway.⁷ Thy tears ... right Thought's tears reveal night's natural dampness.⁸ fur Far. (Spelled by Sidney this way to rhyme with "stir.")⁹ Dian Diana, goddess of the moon.¹⁰ standing Position; wight Man.¹¹ Phoebus' The sun god's.¹² weeds Clothes; dight Dress.¹³ despair my Despair of my.¹ inbent Inward-looking.² sickness tries Lovesickness triumphs.³ caitiff Despicable person.⁴ sware Swore he was.

Ah bed, the field where joy's peace some do see,
 The field where all my thoughts to war be trained,^o drawn
 How is thy grace by my strange fortune stained!
 How thy lee^o shores by my sighs stormed be! sheltered
 5 With sweet soft shades^o thou oft invitest me shadows
 To steal some rest, but wretch I am constrained (Spurred with Love's spur, though galled and shortly reined¹
 With Care's hard hand) to turn and toss in thee.
 While the black horrors of the silent night
 10 Paint woe's black face so lively to my sight,
 That tedious leisure marks each wrinkled line.
 But when Aurora leads out Phoebus' dance,²
 Mine eyes then only wink,^o for spite perchance, close
 That worms should have their Sun, and I want mine.

Stella is sick, and in that sickbed lies
 Sweetness, that breathes and pants as oft as she;
 And Grace, sick too, such fine conclusions⁷ tries
 That Sickness brags itself best graced to be.⁸

Oh absent presence, Stella is not here;
 False flattering Hope, that with so fair a face
 Bare me in hand,⁹ that in this orphan place,
 Stella, I say my Stella, should appear:

from The Defence of Poesy

... Poesy therefore is an art of imitation: for so Aristotle termeth it in the word μιμησις,⁷ that is to say, a representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth—to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture—with this end, to teach and delight.

Of this there have been three general kinds. The chief, both in antiquity and excellency, were they that did imitate the unconceivable excellencies of God. Such were David in his Psalms; Solomon in his Song of Songs, in his Ecclesiastes and Proverbs; Moses and Deborah in their Hymns; and the writer of Job: which, beside other, the learned Immanuel Tremellius and Franciscus Junius⁸ do entitle the poetical part of the Scripture. Against these none will speak that hath the Holy Ghost in due holy reverence. (In this kind, though in a full wrong divinity, were Orpheus, Amphion, Homer in his hymns, and many other, both Greeks and Romans.) And this poesy must be used by whosoever will follow St. James's counsel in singing psalms when they are merry,⁹ and I know is used with the fruit of comfort by some, when, in sorrowful pangs of their death-bringing sins, they find the consolation of the never-leaving goodness.

The second kind is of them that deal with matters philosophical; either moral, as Tyrtæus, Phocylides, Cato; or natural, as Lucretius and Virgil's Georgics; or astronomical, as Manilius and Pontanus; or historical, as Lucan:¹⁰ which who mislike, the fault is in their

⁷ μιμησις Greek: mimesis, the concept of poetry as primarily imitative. (See Aristotle's Poetics 1.2.)

⁸ Immanuel ... Junius Two theologians who produced a Latin translation of the Hebrew and Greek Bible first published in 1575.

⁹ whosoever ... merry "Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray. Is any merry? Let him sing psalms" (James 5.13).

¹⁰ Cato Dionysius Cato (234–149 BCE), author of The Distichs, a collection of proverbial wisdom used in moral education; Lucretius First-century BCE Epicurean poet, author of De Rerum Natura (On the Nature of Things); Georgics Virgil's instructive poems on farming; Manilius First-century CE Stoic, author of the Astronomica, an astrological poem; Pontanus Fifteenth-century Italian humanist Giovanni Pontano, author of an astrological poem entitled Urania; Lucan Roman poet of the first century CE who never finished his epic Pharsalia, on Rome's civil wars.

judgment quite out of taste, & not in the sweet food of sweetly uttered knowledge.

But because this second sort is wrapped within the fold of the proposed subject, and takes not the free course of his own invention, whether they properly be poets or no let grammarians dispute, and go to the third, indeed right poets, of whom chiefly this question ariseth: betwixt whom and these second is such a kind of difference as betwixt the meaner sort of painters, who counterfeit only such faces as are set before them, and the more excellent, who, having no law but wit, bestow that in colours upon you which is fittest for the eye to see: as the constant, though lamenting look of Lucretia¹ when she punished in herself another's fault, wherein he painteth not Lucretia whom he never saw, but painteth the outward beauty of such a virtue. For these third be they which most properly do imitate to teach & delight, and to imitate borrow nothing of what is, hath been, or shall be; but range, only reined with learned discretion, into the divine consideration of what may be and should be. These be they that, as the first and most noble sort may justly be termed vates, so these are waited on in the excellentest languages and best understandings with the fore-described name of poets. For these indeed do merely make to imitate; and imitate both to delight & teach; and delight, to move men to take that goodness in hand, which without delight they would fly as from a stranger; and teach, to make them know that goodness whereunto they are moved—which being the noblest scope to which ever any learning was directed, yet want there not idle tongues to bark at them.

These be subdivided into sundry more special denominations. The most notable be the heroic, lyric, tragic, comic, satiric, iambic, elegiac, pastoral, and certain others, some of these being termed according to the matter they deal with, some by the sort of verse they liked best to write in; for indeed the greatest part of poets have apparelled their poetical inventions in that numbrous kind of writing which is called verse—indeed but apparelled, verse being but an ornament and no cause to poetry, since there have been many most excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets. For Xenophon, who did imitate so excellently as to give us effigiem iusti imperii, the portraiture of a just empire, under the name of Cyrus (as Cicero saith of him), made therein an absolute heroical poem. So did Heliodorus in his sugared invention of that picture of love in Theagenes & Chariclea;² and yet both these wrote in prose, which I speak to show that it is not rhyming and versing that makes a poet (no more than a long gown makes an advocate,³ who, though he pleaded in armour, should be an advocate and no soldier). But it is that feigning notable images of virtues, vices, or what else, with that delightful teaching, which must be the right describing note to know a poet by. Although indeed the senate of poets hath chosen verse as their fittest raiment, meaning, as in matter they passed all in all, so in manner to go beyond them: not speaking (table-talk fashion or like men in a dream) words as they chanceably fall from the mouth, but peising⁴ each syllable of each word by just proportion, according to the dignity of the subject.

Now, therefore, it shall not be amiss first to weigh this latter sort of poetry by his works, and then by his parts; and if in neither of these anatomies he be condemnable, I hope we shall obtain a more favorable sentence.

This purifying of wit—this enriching of memory, enabling of judgment, and enlarging of conceit—which commonly we call learning, under what name soever it come forth, or to what immediate end soever it be directed, the final end is to lead and draw us to as high a perfection as our degenerate souls, made worse by their clayey lodgings, can be capable of.

This, according to the inclination of man, bred many-formed impressions. For some, that thought this felicity principally to be gotten by knowledge, and no knowledge to be so high or heavenly as acquaintance with the stars, gave themselves to astronomy. Others, persuading themselves to be demigods if they knew the causes of things, became natural and supernatural philosophers. Some an admirable delight drew to music, and some the certainty of demonstration to the mathematics. But all, one and other, having scope to know, & by knowledge to lift up the mind from the dungeon of the body to the enjoying his own divine essence.

But when by the balance of experience it was found that the astronomer, looking to the stars, might fall in a ditch, that the inquiring philosopher might be blind in himself, & the mathematician might draw forth a straight line with a crooked heart, then lo, did proof, the overruler of opinions, make manifest that all these are but serving sciences, which, as they have each a private end in themselves, so yet are they all directed to the highest end of the mistress-knowledge, by the Greeks called ἀρχιτεκτονική, which stands, as I think, in the knowledge of a man's self, in the ethic and politic consideration, with the end of well-doing and not of well-knowing only—even as the saddler's next end is to make a good saddle, but his further end to serve a nobler faculty, which is horsemanship, so the horseman's to soldiery, and the soldier not only to have the skill, but to perform the practise of a soldier. So that, the ending end of all earthly learning being virtuous action, those skills that most serve to bring forth that have a most just title to be princes over all the rest.

Wherein, if we can, show we the poet is worthy to have it before any other competitors, among whom principally to challenge it step forth the moral philosophers, whom me thinketh I see coming towards me with a sullen gravity, as though they could not abide vice by daylight, rudely clothed for to witness outwardly their contempt of outward things, with books in their hands against glory, whereto they set their names, sophistically speaking against subtlety, and angry with any man in whom they see the foul fault of anger. These men casting largess as they go, of definitions, divisions, and distinctions, with a scornful interrogative do soberly ask whether it be possible to find any path so ready to lead a man to virtue as that which teacheth what virtue is, & teacheth it not only by delivering forth his very being, his causes and effects, but also by making known his enemy, vice, which must be destroyed, and his cumbersome servant, passion, which must be mastered; by showing the generalities that containeth it and the specialties that are derived from it; lastly, by plain setting down how it extendeth itself out of the limits of a man's own little world to the government of families and maintaining of public societies.

The historian scarcely gives leisure to the moralist to say so much, but that he, laden with old mouse-eaten records, authorizing himself for the most part upon other histories, whose greatest authorities are built upon the notable foundation hearsay, having much ado to accord differing writers & to pick truth out of partiality; better acquainted with a thousand years ago than with the present age, and yet better knowing how this world goeth than how his own wit runneth; curious for antiquities and inquisitive of novelties; a wonder to young folks and a tyrant in table talk, denieth, in a great chafe,¹ that any man for teaching of virtue, and virtuous actions, is comparable to him. "I am testis temporum, lux veritatis, vita memoriae, magistra vitae, nuncia vetustatis."² The philosopher," saith he, "teacheth a disputative virtue, but I do an active. His virtue is excellent in the dangerless Academy of Plato, but mine showeth forth her honorable face in the battles of Marathon, Pharsalia, Poitiers, and Agincourt."³ He teacheth virtue by certain abstract considerations, but I only follow the footing of them that have gone before you. Old-aged experience goeth beyond the fine-witted philosopher, but I give the experience of many ages. Lastly, if he make the songbook, I put the learner's hand to the lute; and if he be the guide, I am the light." Then he would allege you innumerable examples, confirming story by stories, how much the wisest senators and princes have been directed by the credit of history, as Brutus, Alphonsus of

² testis ... vetustatis Latin: the witness of time, the light of truth, the life of memory, the instructor of life, the herald of old age (Cicero, De Oratore, 2.9.36).

³ Marathon Site of the Greeks' victory over the Persians in 490 BCE; Pharsalia Site of Pompey's loss to Caesar in 48 BCE; Poitiers Site of the French defeat by Edward, England's Black Prince, in 1356; Agincourt Battlefield on which the French were again defeated by the English in 1415.

Aragon,¹ and who not, if need be. At length the long line of their disputation maketh a point in this, that the one giveth the precept, & the other the example.

Now whom shall we find (since the question stands for the highest form in the school of learning) to be moderator? Truly as me seemeth, the poet; and if not a moderator, even the man that ought to carry the title from them both, & much more from all the other serving sciences. Therefore compare we the poet with the historian & with the moral philosopher; and if he go beyond them both, no other human skill can match him. For as for the divine, with all reverence it is ever to be excepted, not only for having his scope as far beyond any of these as eternity exceeds a moment, but even for passing each of these in themselves. And for the lawyer, though *Ius*² be the daughter of Justice, the chief of virtues, yet because he seeketh to make men good rather formidine poenae than virtutis amore;³ or, to say righter, doth not endeavour to make men good, but that their evil hurt not others; having no care so he be a good citizen, how bad a man he might be. Therefore, as our wickedness maketh him necessary, and necessity maketh him honorable, so he is not in the deepest truth to stand in rank with these who all endeavour to take naughtiness away and plant goodness even in the secretest cabinet of our souls. And these four are all that any way deal in the consideration of men's manners, which being the supreme knowledge, they that best breed it deserve the best commendation.

The philosopher, therefore, and the historian are they which would win the goal, the one by precept, the other by example. But both, not having both, do both halt.⁴ For the philosopher, setting down with thorny arguments the bare rule, is so hard of utterance and so misty to be conceived, that one that hath no other guide but him shall wade in him till he be old before he shall find sufficient cause to be honest. For his knowledge standeth so upon the abstract and general that happy is that man who may understand him, and more happy that can apply what he doth understand. On the other side, the historian, wanting the precept, is so tied, not to what should be but to what is, to the particular truth of things and not to the general reason of things, that his example draweth no necessary consequence, and therefore a less fruitful doctrine.

Now doth the peerless poet perform both: for whatsoever the philosopher says should be done, he gives a perfect picture of it by someone by whom he presupposes it was done, so as he coupleth the general notion with the particular example. A perfect picture I say, for he yieldeth to the powers of the mind an image of that whereof the philosopher bestoweth but a wordish description, which doth neither strike, pierce, nor possess the sight of the soul so much as that other doth. For as in outward things, to a man that had never seen an elephant or a rhinoceros, who should tell him most exquisitely all their shape, colour, bigness, and particular marks, or of a gorgeous palace an architect, who, declaring the full beauties, might well make the hearer able to repeat, as it were by rote, all he had heard, yet should never satisfy his inward conceit with being witness to itself of a true lively knowledge; but the same man, as soon as he might see those beasts well painted, or that house well in model, should straightaways grow without need of any description, to a judicial comprehending of them: so no doubt the philosopher with his learned definitions—be it of virtues or vices, matters of public policy or private government—replenisheth the memory with many infallible grounds of wisdom, which, notwithstanding, lie dark before the imaginative and judging power, if they be not illuminated or figured forth by the speaking picture of poesy. ...

For conclusion, I say the philosopher teacheth, but he teacheth obscurely, so as the learned only can understand him; that is to say, he teacheth them that are already taught. But the poet is the food for the tenderest stomachs; the poet is indeed the right popular philosopher, whereof Aesop's tales give good proof, whose pretty allegories, stealing under the formal tales of beasts, makes many, more beastly than beasts, begin to hear the sound of virtue from those dumb speakers.

⁴ halt Limp; proceed unsteadily or imperfectly.

But now it may be alleged that if this imagining of matters be so fit for the imagination, then must the historian needs surpass, who bringeth you images of true matters, such as indeed were done, and not such as fantastically or falsely may be suggested to have been done. Truly Aristotle himself, in his discourse of poesy, plainly determines this question, saying that poetry is φιλοσοφωτερον and σπουδαιοτερον that is to say, it is more philosophical and more studiously serious than history. His reason is, because poesy dealeth with καθόλου; that is to say, with the universal consideration, and the history with καθ' ἑκάστον, the particular. Now, saith he, the universal ways what is fit to be said or done, either in likelihood or necessity (which the poesy considers in his imposed names), and the particular only marketh whether Alcibiades¹ did, or suffered, this or that. Thus far Aristotle: which reason of his (as all his) is most full of reason. For indeed, if the question were whether it were better to have a particular act truly or falsely set down, there is no doubt which is to be chosen, no more than whether you had rather have Vespasian's² picture right as he was, or, at the painter's pleasure, nothing resembling. But if the question be for your own use and learning, whether it be better to have it set down as it should be, or as it was, then certainly is more doctrinable the feigned Cyrus in Xenophon than the true Cyrus in Justin, and the feigned Aeneas in Virgil than the right Aeneas in Dares Phrygius:³ as to a lady that desired to fashion her countenance to the best grace, a painter should more benefit her to portraiture a most sweet face, writing Canidia upon it, than to paint Canidia as she was, who, Horace sweareth, was full ill-favored.⁴

If the poet do his part aright, he will show you in Tantalus,⁵ Atreus, and such like, nothing that is not to be shunned; in Cyrus, Aeneas, Ulysses, each thing to be followed; where the historian, bound to tell things as things were, cannot be liberal (without he will be poetical) of a perfect pattern, but, as in Alexander or Scipio himself, show doings, some to be liked, some to be disliked. And then how will you discern what to follow but by your own discretion, which you had without reading Quintus Curtius.⁶ And whereas a man may say, though in universal consideration of doctrine the poet prevaieth, yet that the history, in his saying such a thing was done, doth warrant a man more in that he shall follow—the answer is manifest: that, if he stand upon that was (as if he should argue, because it rained yesterday, therefore it should rain today), then indeed hath it some advantage to a gross conceit. But if he know an example only informs a conjectured likelihood, and so go by reason, the poet doth so far exceed him as he is to frame his example to that which is most reasonable (be it in warlike, politic, or private matters), where the historian in his bare was hath many times that which we call fortune to overrule the best wisdom. Many times he must tell events whereof he can yield no cause; or, if he do, it must be poetically.

For that a feigned example hath as much force to teach as a true example (for as for to move, it is clear, since the feigned may be tuned to the highest key of passion) let us take one example wherein an historian and a poet did concur. Herodotus and Justin doth both testify that Zopirus, King Darius's faithful servant, seeing his master long resisted by the rebellious Babylonians, feigned himself in extreme disgrace of his king; for verifying of which he caused his own nose and ears to be cut off, and so flying to the Babylonians was received, and for his known valour so far credited that he did find means to deliver them over to Darius. Much like matter doth Livy record of Tarquinius and his son.¹ Xenophon excellently feigneth such another stratagem performed by Abradates in Cyrus' behalf.² Now would I fain know, if occasion be presented unto you to serve your prince by such an honest dissimulation, why you do not as well learn it of Xenophon's fiction as of the others verity; and truly so much the better, as you shall save your nose by the bargain: for Abradates did not counterfeit so far. So then the best of the historian is subject to the poet; for whatsoever action, or faction, whatsoever counsel, policy, or war stratagem the historian is bound to recite, that may the poet (if he list³) with his imitation make his own, beautifying it both for further teaching, and more delighting, as it please him: having all, from Dante's heaven to his hell, under the authority of his pen.⁴ Which if I be asked what poets have done so, as I might well name some, so yet say I, and say again, I speak of the art, and not of the artificer.

³ Justin Marcus Justinus, whose c. second-century BCE Histories provide an account of Cyrus' actions; Dares Phrygius Supposed author of an account of the Trojan War, probably in fact written after the second century CE.

⁴ Horace ... ill-favored Cf. Epodes 5, in which Horace attacks the Roman prostitute Canidia; she had apparently rejected him.

⁶ Quintus Curtius Roman historian who wrote a multi-volume biography of Alexander the Great.

Now to that which commonly is attributed to the praise of history, in respect of the notable learning, is got by marking the success, as though therein a man should see virtue exalted & vice punished—truly that commendation is peculiar to poetry, and far off from history. For indeed poetry ever sets Virtue so out in her best colours, making Fortune her well-waiting handmaid, that one must needs be enamoured of her. Well may you see Ulysses in a storm and in other hard plights, but they are but exercises of patience and magnanimity, to make them shine the more in the near following prosperity. And of the contrary part, if evil men come to the stage, they ever go out (as the tragedy writer answered to one that misliked the show of such persons) so manacled as they little animate folks to follow them. But the history, being captived to the truth of a foolish world, is many times a terror from well-doing, and an encouragement to unbridled wickedness. For see we not valiant Miltiades⁵ rot in his fetters? The just Phocion⁶ and the accomplished Socrates put to death like traitors? The cruel Severus⁷ live prosperously? The excellent Severus⁸ miserably murdered? Sulla and Marius⁹ dying in their beds? Pompey and Cicero¹⁰ slain then, when they would have thought exile a happiness? See we not virtuous Cato¹¹ driven to kill himself, and rebel Caesar so advanced that his name yet, after 1600 years, lasteth in the highest honor? And mark but even Caesar's own words of the forenamed Sulla (who in that only did honestly, to put down his dishonest tyranny), litteras nescivet,¹² as if want of learning caused him to do well. He meant it not by poetry, which, not content with earthly plagues, deviseth new punishments in hell for tyrants, nor yet by philosophy, which teacheth occidendos esse; but no doubt by skill in history, for that indeed can afford you Cypselus, Periander, Phalaris, Dionysius,¹³ and I know not how many more of the same kennel, that speed well enough in their abomi-

I conclude, therefore, that he excelleth history, not only in furnishing the mind with knowledge, but in setting it forward to that which deserves to be called and accounted good: which setting forward, and moving to well-doing, indeed setteth the laurel crown upon the poets as victorious, not only of the historian, but over the philosopher, howsoever in teaching it may be questionable. ...

That imitation whereof poetry is, hath the most conveniency to nature of all other, insomuch that, as Aristotle saith, those things which in themselves are horrible, as cruel battles, unnatural monsters, are made in poetical imitation delightful.¹ Truly, I have known men that even with reading *Amadis de Gaule*² (which God knoweth wanteth much of a perfect poesy) have found their hearts moved to the exercise of courtesy, liberality, and especially courage. Who readeth Aeneas carrying old Anchises on his back, that wisheth not it were his fortune to perform so excellent an act? Whom doth not those words of Turnus move, the tale of Turnus having planted his image in the imagination,

*Fugientam haec terra videbit?
Usque adeone mori miserum est?*³

Where the philosophers, as they scorn to delight, so must they be content little to move—saving wrangling whether *virtus*⁴ be the chief or the only good, whether the contemplative or the active life do excel—which Plato and Boethius well knew, and therefore made mistress Philosophy very often borrow the masking raiment of poesy.⁵ For even those hard-hearted evil men who think virtue a school name, and know no other good but indulgere genio,⁶ and therefore despise the austere admonitions of the philosopher, and feel not the inward reason they stand upon, yet will be content to be delighted—which is all the good-fellow poet seemeth to promise—and so steal to see the form of goodness, (which seen, they cannot but love) ere themselves be aware, as if they took a medicine of cherries. ...

Now in his parts, kinds, or species (as you list to term them), it is to be noted that some poesies have coupled together two or three kinds, as the tragical and comical, whereupon is risen the tragicomical. Some, in the manner, have mingled prose and verse, as Sannazaro⁷ and Boethius; some have mingled matters heroical and pastoral. But that cometh all to one in this question; for, if severed they be good, the conjunction cannot be hurtful. Therefore, perchance forgetting some and leaving some as needless to be remembered, it shall not be amiss in a word to cite the special kinds, to see what faults may be found in the right use of them.

Is it then the Pastoral poem which is disliked? (For perchance where the hedge is lowest⁸ they will soonest leap over.) Is the poor pipe⁹ disdained, which sometimes out of Meliboeus' mouth can show the misery of people under hard lords and ravening soldiers, and again, by Tityrus,¹⁰ what blessedness is derived to them that lie lowest from the goodness of them that sit highest; sometimes, under the pretty tales of wolves and sheep, can include the whole considerations of wrongdoing and patience; sometimes show that contentions for trifles can get but a trifling victory: where perchance a man

Or is it the lamenting Elegiac, which in a kind heart would move rather pity than blame; who bewails with the great philosopher Heraclitus² the weakness of mankind and the wretchedness of the world; who surely is to be praised either for compassionate accompanying just causes of lamentations, or for rightly painting out how weak be the passions of woefulness? Is it the bitter but wholesome Iambic,³ who rubs the galled mind, in making shame the trumpet of villainy, with bold and open crying out against naughtiness? Or the Satiric, who

No, perchance it is the Comic, whom naughty play-makers and stage-keepers have justly made odious. To the arguments of abuse I will after answer. Only thus much now is to be said, that the comedy is an imitation of the common errors of our life, which he representeth in the most ridiculous and scornful sort that may be, so as it is impossible that any beholder can be content to be such a one. Now, as in geometry the oblique must be known as well as the right, and in arithmetic the odd as well as the even, so in the actions of our life who seeth not the filthiness of evil wanteth a great folly to perceive the beauty of virtue. This doth the comedy handle so in our private and domestical matters as with hearing it we get, as it were, an experience what is to be looked for of a niggardly Demea, of a crafty Davus, of a flattering Gnatho, of a vain-glorious Thraso;⁷ and not only to know what effects are to be expected, but to know who be such, by the signifying badge given them by the comedian. And little reason hath any man to say that men learn the evil by seeing it so set out, since, as I said before, there is no man living but, by the force truth hath in nature, no sooner seeth these men play their parts, but wisheth them in pistrinum,⁸ although perchance the sack of his own faults lie so behind his back that he seeth not himself to dance the same measure;⁹ whereto yet nothing can more open his eyes than to see his own actions contemptibly set forth.

So that the right use of comedy will, I think, by nobody be blamed; and much less of the high and excellent Tragedy, that openeth the greatest wounds,

From Virgil, Eclogues 7.69–70, in which the pastoral poets Thyrsis and Corydon challenge one another to a singing contest—an event which, Sidney says, is comparable to the victory of Alexander the Great over Darius of Persia.

³ Iambic Verse form typically used in satire and direct attacks.

and showeth forth the ulcers that are covered with tissue; that maketh kings fear to be tyrants, and tyrants manifest their tyrannical humours; that, with stirring the affects of admiration and commiseration, teacheth the uncertainty of this world, and upon how weak foundations gilded roofs are builded; that maketh us know

... But it is not the tragedy they do dislike; for it were too absurd to cast out so excellent a representation of whatsoever is most worthy to be learned.

Is it the Lyric that most displeaseth, who with his tuned lyre and well-accorded voice giveth praise, the reward of virtue, to virtuous acts; who gives moral precepts, and natural problems; who sometimes raiseth up his voice to the height of the heavens in singing the lauds of the immortal God? Certainly I must confess mine own barbarousness, I never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas² that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet. ...

There rests the Heroical³—whose very name, I think, should daunt all backbiters. For by what conceit can a tongue be directed to speak evil of that which draweth with him no less champions than Achilles, Cyrus, Aeneas, Turnus, Tydeus, Rinaldo⁴—who doth not only teach and move to a truth, but teacheth and moveth to the most high and excellent truth; who maketh magnanimity and justice shine through all misty fearfulness and foggy desires. ...

But truly I imagine it falleth out with these poet-whippers, as with some good women, who often are sick, but in faith they cannot tell where; so the name of poetry is odious to them, but neither his cause nor effects, neither the sum that contains him, nor the particularities descending from him, give any fast handle to their carping dispraise. ...

But because we have ears as well as tongues, and that the lightest reasons that may be will seem to weigh greatly, if nothing be put in the counterbalance, let us hear, and, as well as we can, ponder what objections be made against this art, which may be worthy either of yielding or answering.

First, truly I note not only in these μισομουσι, poet-haters, but in all that kind of people who seek a praise by dispraising others, that they do prodigally spend a great many wandering words in quips and scoffs, carping and taunting at each thing which, by stirring the spleen, may stay the brain from a thorough-beholding the worthiness of the subject. Those kind of objections, as they are full of a very idle easiness, since there is nothing of so sacred a majesty but that an itching tongue may rub itself upon it, so deserve they no other answer, but, instead of laughing at the jest, to laugh at the jester. ... Marry, these other pleasant fault-finders, who will correct the verb before they understand the noun, and confute others knowledge before they confirm their own, I would have them only remember that scoffing cometh not of wisdom; so as the best title in true English they get with their merriments is to be called good fools, for so have our grave forefathers ever termed that humorous kind of jesters.

But that which giveth greatest scope to their scorning humour is rhyming and versing. It is already said (and, as I think, truly said) it is not rhyming and versing that makes poesy. One may be a poet without versing, and a versifier without poetry. But yet, presuppose it were inseparable (as indeed it seemeth Scaliger⁵ judgeth), truly it were an inseparable commendation. For if oratio next to ratio, speech next to reason, be the greatest gift bestowed upon mortality, that cannot be praiseless which doth most polish that blessing of speech; which considers each word, not only (as a man may say) by his forcible quality, but by his best measured quantity, carrying even in themselves a harmony—without, perchance, number, measure, order, proportion be in our time grown odious. But lay aside the just praise it hath by being the only fit speech for music (music, I say, the most divine striker of the senses), thus much is undoubtedly true, that if reading be foolish without remembering, memory being the only treasure of knowledge, those words which are fittest for memory are likewise most convenient for knowledge. Now, that verse far exceedeth prose in the knitting up of the memory, the reason is manifest: the words (besides their delight, which hath a great affinity to memory) being so set as one cannot be lost but the whole work fails; which accusing itself, calleth the remembrance back to itself, and so most strongly confirmeth it. ...

Now then go we to the most important imputations laid to the poor poets. For aught I can yet learn, they are these. First, that there being many other more fruitful knowledges, a man might better spend his time in them than in this. Secondly, that it is the mother of lies. Thirdly, that it is the nurse of abuse, infecting us with many pestilent desires; with a siren's sweetness drawing the mind to the serpent's tail of sinful fancies (and herein, especially, comedies give the largest field to ear,¹ as Chaucer saith); how, both in other nations and in ours, before poets did soften us, we were full of courage, given to martial exercises, the pillars of man-like liberty, and not lulled asleep in shady idleness with poets' pastimes. And lastly and chiefly, they cry out with open mouth, as if they had shot Robin Hood, that Plato banished them out of his commonwealth. Truly this is much, if there be much truth in it.

First, to the first. That a man might better spend his time, is a reason indeed; but it doth, as they say, but petere principium.² For if it be as I affirm, that no learning is so good as that which teacheth and moveth to virtue; and that none can both teach and move thereto so much as poesy, then is the conclusion manifest that ink and paper cannot be to a more profitable purpose employed. And certainly, though a man should grant their first assumption, it should follow (methinks) very unwillingly, that good is not good, because better is better. But I still and utterly deny that there is sprung out of the earth a more fruitful knowledge.

To the second, therefore, that they should be the principal liars, I answer paradoxically, but truly, I think truly, that of all writers under the sun, the poet is the least liar; and, though he would, as a poet can scarcely be a liar. The astronomer, with his cousin the geometrician, can hardly escape, when they take upon them to measure the height of the stars. How often, think you, do the physicians lie, when they aver things good for sicknesses, which afterwards send Charon³ a great number of souls drowned in a potion before they come to his ferry? And no less of the rest, which take upon them to affirm. Now, for the poet, he nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth. For, as I take it, to lie is to affirm that to be true which is false. So as the other artists, and especially the historian, affirming many things, can, in the cloudy knowledge of mankind, hardly escape from many lies. But the poet, as I said before, never affirmeth. The poet never maketh any circles about your imagination, to conjure you to believe for true what he writes. He citeth not authorities of other histories, but even for his entry calleth the sweet Muses to inspire unto him a good invention; in truth, not labouring to tell you what is or is not, but what should or should not, be. And therefore, though he recount things not true, yet because he telleth them not for true, he lieth not—without we will say that Nathan lied in his speech before alleged to David; which as a wicked man durst scarce say, so think I none so simple would say that Aesop lied in the tales of his beasts; for who thinks Aesop wrote it for actually true were well worthy to have his name chronicled among the beasts he writeth of. What child is there that, coming to a play and seeing "Thebes" written in great letters upon an old door, doth believe that it is Thebes? If then a man can arrive to the child's age to know that the poets' persons and doings are but pictures what should be, and not stories what have been, they will never give the lie to things not affirmatively but allegorically and figuratively written. And therefore, as in history, looking for truth, they may go away full fraught with falsehood, so in poesy, looking but for fiction, they shall use the narration but as an imaginative ground-plot of a profitable invention. But hereto is replied that the poets give names to men they write of, which argueth a conceit of an actual truth, and so, not being true, proves a falsehood. And doth the lawyer lie then, when under the names of John-a-stiles and *John-a-nokes*¹ he putteth his case? But that is easily answered. Their naming of men is but to make their picture the more lively, and not to build any history: painting men, they cannot leave men nameless. We see we cannot play at chess but that we must give names to our chessmen; and yet, methinks, he were a very partial champion of truth that would say we lied for giving a piece of wood the reverend title of a bishop. The poet nameth Cyrus and Aeneas no other way than to show what men of their fames, fortunes, and estates should do.

Their third is, how much it abuseth men's wit, training it to wanton sinfulness and lustful love. For indeed that is the principal, if not only, abuse I can hear alleged. They say the comedies rather teach than reprehend amorous conceits. They say the lyric is larded with passionate sonnets, the elegiac weeps the want of his mistress, and that even to the heroical, Cupid hath ambitiously climbed. Alas, Love, I would thou couldst as well defend thyself as thou canst offend others. I would those on whom thou doest attend could either put thee away, or yield good reason why they keep thee. But grant love of beauty to be a beastly fault (although it be very hard, since only man, and no beast, hath that gift to discern beauty); grant that lovely name of Love to deserve all hateful reproaches (although even some of my masters the philosophers spent a good deal of their lamp-oil in setting forth the excellency of it); grant, I say, whatsoever they will have granted, that not only love, but lust, but vanity, but (if they list) scurrility, possesseth many leaves of the poets' books; yet, think I, when this is granted, they will find their sentence may with good manners put the last words foremost, and not say that poetry abuseth man's wit, but that man's wit abuseth poetry.

For I will not deny but that man's wit may make poesy, which should be εἰκαστική² (which some learned have defined, "figuring forth good things"), to be φανταστική³ (which doth, contrariwise, infect the fancy with unworthy objects), as the painter should give to the eye either some excellent perspective, or some fine picture fit for building or fortification, or containing in it some notable example (as Abraham sacrificing his son Isaac, Judith killing Holofernes, David fighting with Goliath),⁴ may leave those, and please an ill-pleased eye with wanton shows of better hidden matters. But what, shall the abuse of a thing, make the right use odious? Nay, truly, though I yield that poesy may not only be abused, but that, being abused, by the reason of his sweet charming force, it can do more hurt than any other army of words: yet shall it be so far from concluding that the abuse should give reproach to the abused, that, contrariwise, it is a good reason that whatsoever, being abused, doth most harm, being rightly used (and upon the right use, each thing receives his title), doth most good. Do we not see skill of physic, the best rampire⁵ to our often-assaulted bodies, being abused, teach poison, the most violent destroyer? Doth not knowledge of law, whose end is to even & right all things, being abused, grow the crooked fosterer of horrible injuries? Doth not (to go to the highest) God's word, abused, breed heresy, and his name, abused, become blasphemy? Truly, a needle cannot do much hurt, and as truly (with leave of ladies be it spoken) it cannot do much good: with a sword thou mayst kill thy father, and with a sword thou mayst defend thy prince and country. So that, as in their calling poets fathers of lies they said nothing, so in this their argument of abuse they prove the commendation.

They allege herewith, that before poets began to be in price, our nation had set their hearts' delight upon action, and not imagination: rather doing things worthy to be written, than writing things fit to be done. What that before-time was, I think scarcely Sphinx¹ can tell, since no memory is so ancient that hath not the precedent of poetry. And certain it is that, in our plainest homeliness, yet never was the Albion nation² without poetry. Marry, this argument, though it be levelled against poetry, yet is it indeed a chainshot³ against all learning, or “bookishness,” as they commonly term it. ...

But now indeed my burden is great, that Plato's name is laid upon me, whom, I must confess, of all philosophers, I have ever esteemed most worthy of reverence; and with good reason, since of all philosophers he is the most poetical. Yet if he will defile the fountain out of which his flowing streams have proceeded, let us boldly examine with what reasons he did it. First, truly, a man might maliciously object that Plato, being a philosopher, was a natural enemy of poets. For indeed, after the philosophers had picked out of the sweet mysteries of poetry the right discerning true points of knowledge, they forthwith, putting it in method, and making a school-art of that which the poets did only teach by a divine delightfulness, beginning to spurn at their guides like ungrateful apprentices, were not content to set up shop for themselves, but sought by all means to discredit their masters; which by the force of delight being barred them, the less they could overthrow them, the more they hated them. For indeed, they found for Homer seven cities strove who should have him for their citizen; where so many cities banished philosophers as not fit members to live among them. ...

St. Paul himself setteth a watch-word upon philosophy, indeed upon the abuse.⁴ So doth Plato upon the abuse, not upon poetry. Plato found fault that the poets of his time filled the world with wrong opinions of the gods, making light tales of that unspotted essence, and therefore would not have the youth depraved with such opinions. Herein may much be said. Let this suffice: the poets did not induce such opinions, but did imitate those opinions already induced; for all the Greek stories can well testify that the very religion of that time stood upon many, and many-fashioned, gods, not taught so by poets, but followed according to their nature of imitation. Who list may read in Plutarch the discourses of Isis and Osiris, of the cause why Oracles ceased, of the divine providence, & see whether the theology of that nation stood not upon such dreams which the poets indeed superstitiously observed—and truly (since they had not the light of Christ) did much better in it than the philosophers, who, shaking off superstition, brought in atheism. Plato therefore (whose authority I had much rather justly construe than unjustly resist) meant not in general of poets, in those words of which Julius Scaliger saith, Qua autoritate barbari quidam atque hispidi abuti velint ad poetas e republica exigendos;⁵ but only meant to drive out those wrong opinions of the Deity (whereof now, without further law, Christianity hath taken away all the hurtful belief), perchance (as he thought) nourished by then-esteemed poets. ...

Of the other side, who would show the honors have been by the best sort of judgments granted them, a whole sea of examples would present themselves: Alexanders, Caesars, Scipios, all favorers of poets; Laelius,⁶ called the Roman Socrates, himself a poet, so as part of Heautontimorumenos in Terence was supposed to be made by him; and even the Greek Socrates, whom Apollo confirmed to be the only wise man, is said to have spent part of his old time in putting Aesop's fables into verses. And therefore, full evil should it become his scholar Plato to put such words in his master's mouth against poets. But what need more? Aristotle writes the Art of Poesy; and why, if it should not be written? Plutarch teacheth the use to be gathered of them;⁷ and how, if they should not be read? And who reads Plu-tarch's either history or philosophy shall find he trimmeth both their garments with guards of poesy. But I list not to defend poesy with the help of his underling historiography. Let it suffice to have showed it is a fit soil for praise to dwell upon; and what dispraise may set upon it, is either easily overcome, or transformed into just commendation.

So that, since the excellencies of it may be so easily and so justly confirmed, and the low-creeping objections so soon trodden down—it not being an art of lies, but of true doctrine; not of effeminateness, but of notable stirring of courage; not of abusing man's wit, but of strengthening man's wit; not banished, but honored, by Plato—let us rather plant more laurels for to engarland the poets' heads (which honor of being laureate, as besides them only triumphant captains were, is a sufficient authority to show the price they ought to be held in) than suffer the ill-favored breath of such wrong-speakers once to blow upon the clear springs of poesy.

But since I have run so long a career in this matter, methinks, before I give my pen a full stop, it shall be but a little more lost time to enquire why England, the mother of excellent minds, should be grown so hard a stepmother to poets, who certainly in wit ought to pass all other, since all only proceedeth from their wit, being indeed makers of themselves, not takers of others. How can I but exclaim

*Musa, mihi causas memoria, quo numine laeso?*¹

Sweet poesy, that hath anciently had kings, emperors, senators, great captains, such as—besides a thousands others—David, Adrian, Sophocles, Germanicus, not only to favor poets, but to be poets; and of our nearer times can present for her patrons a Robert, King of Sicily, the great King Francis of France, King James of Scotland; such cardinals as Bembus and Bibbiena; such famous preachers and teachers as Beza and Melancthon; so learned philosophers as Fracastorius and Scaliger; so great orators as Pontanus and Muretus; so piercing wits as George Buchanan; so grave counsellors as, besides many, but before all, that Hospital of France,² than whom (I think) that realm never brought forth a more accomplished judgment, more firmly built upon virtue: I say these, with numbers of others, not only to read others' poesies, but to poetize for others' reading—that poesy, thus embraced in all other places, should only find in our time a hard welcome in England. I think the very earth lamenteth it, and therefore decks our soil with fewer laurels than it was accustomed. For heretofore poets have in England also flourished, and which is to be noted, even in those times when the trumpet of Mars³ did sound loudest. And now that an over-faint quietness should seem to strew the house for poets, they are almost in as good reputation as the mountebanks⁴ at Venice. Truly even that, as of the one side it giveth great praise to poesy, which like Venus (but to better purpose) had rather be troubled in the net with Mars than enjoy the homely quiet of Vulcan:⁵ so serves it for a piece of a reason why they are less grateful to idle England, which now can scarce endure the pain of a pen. ...

nor skilful poetry—excepting *Gorboduc*¹ (again, I say, of those that I have seen), which notwithstanding as it is full of stately speeches and well-sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca's style, and as full of notable morality, which it doth most delightfully teach, and so obtain the very end of poesy, yet in truth it is very defectuous in the circumstances, which grieveth me, because it might not remain as an exact model of all tragedies. For it is faulty both in place and time, the two necessary companions of all corporal actions. For where the stage should always represent but one place, and the uttermost time presupposed in it should be, both by Aristotle's precept and common reason, but one day, there is both many days and places inartificially imagined.

But if it be so in Gorboduc, how much more in all the rest, where you shall have Asia of the one side, and Africa of the other, and so many other under-kingdoms that the player, when he cometh in, must ever begin with telling where he is, or else the tale will not be conceived? Now you shall have three ladies walk to gather flowers: and then we must believe the stage to be a garden. By and by we hear news of shipwreck in the same place: and then we are to blame if we accept it not for a rock. Upon the back of that comes out a hideous monster with fire and smoke: and then the miserable beholders are bound to take it for a cave. While in the meantime two armies fly in, represented with four swords & bucklers: and then what hard heart will not receive it for a pitched field?

Now, of time they are much more liberal: for ordinary it is that two young princes² fall in love; after many traverses³ she is got with child, delivered of a fair boy; he is lost, groweth a man, falls in love, and is ready to get another child; and all this is in two hours' space: which, how absurd it is in sense, even sense may imagine, and art hath taught, and all ancient examples justified—and at this day, the ordinary players in Italy will not err in. Yet will some bring in an example of Eunuchus in Terence, that containeth matter of two days, yet far short of twenty years. True it is, and so was it to be played in two days, and so fitted to the time it set forth. And though Plautus⁴ have in one place done amiss, let us hit with him, & not miss with him.

But they will say, how then shall we set forth a story which containeth both many places and many times? And do they not know that a tragedy is tied to the laws of poesy, and not of history; not bound to follow the story, but having liberty either to feign a quite new matter or to frame the history to the most tragical conveniency? Again, many things may be told which cannot be showed, if they know the difference betwixt reporting and representing. ...

But besides these gross absurdities, how all their plays be neither right tragedies, nor right comedies, mingling kings and clowns, not because the matter so carrieth it, but thrust in the clown by head and shoulders to play a part in majestical matters with neither decency nor discretion, so as neither the admiration and commiseration, nor the right sportfulness, is by their mongrel tragicomedy obtained. I know Apuleius⁵ did somewhat so, but that is a thing recounted with space of time, not represented in one moment; and I know the ancients have one or two examples of tragicomedies, as Plautus hath Amphitryo;⁶ but, if we mark them well, we shall find that they never, or very daintily, match hornpipes and funerals. So falleth it out that, having indeed no right comedy, in that comical part of our tragedy we have nothing but scurrility, unworthy of any chaste ears, or some extreme show of doltishness, indeed fit to lift up a loud laughter, and nothing else: where the whole tract of a comedy should be full of delight, as the tragedy should be still maintained in a well-raised admiration.

But our comedians think there is no delight without laughter, which is very wrong; for though laughter may come with delight, yet cometh it not of delight, as though delight should be the cause of laughter; but well may one thing breed both together. Nay, rather in themselves they have, as it were, a kind of contrariety: for delight we scarcely do but in things that have a conveniency to ourselves, or to the general nature; laughter almost ever cometh of things most disproportioned to ourselves and nature. Delight hath a joy in it, either permanent or present. Laughter hath only a scornful tickling.

For example, we are ravished with delight to see a fair woman, and yet are far from being moved to laughter. We laugh at deformed creatures, wherein certainly we cannot delight. We delight in good chances, we laugh at mischances. We delight to hear the happiness of our friends and country, at which he were worthy to be laughed at that would laugh; we shall, contrarily, laugh sometimes to find a matter quite mistaken and go down the hill against the bias¹ in the mouth of some such men—as for the respect of them one shall be heartily sorry, he cannot choose but laugh, and so is rather pained than delighted with laughter. ...

But I have lavished out too many words of this play matter. I do it because, as they are excelling parts of poesy, so is there none so much used in England, and none can be more pitifully abused; which, like an unmannerly daughter showing a bad education, causeth her mother Poesy's honesty to be called in question.

Other sort of poetry almost have we none, but that lyrical kind of songs and sonnets: which, Lord, if He gave us so good minds, how well it might be employed, and with how heavenly fruits, both private and public, in singing the praises of the immortal beauty: the immortal goodness of that God who giveth us hands to write and wits to conceive; of which we might well want words, but never matter; of which we could turn our eyes to nothing, but we should ever have new-budding occasions. But truly many of such writings as come under the banner of unresistible love, if I were a mistress, would never persuade me they were in love: so coldly they apply fiery speeches, as men that had rather read lovers' writings—and so caught up certain swelling phrases which hang together like a man that once told me the wind was at northwest and by south, because he would be sure to name winds enough—than that in truth they feel those passions. ...

Now, of versifying there are two sorts, the one ancient, the other modern. The ancient marked the quantity of each syllable, and according to that, framed his verse; the modern, observing only number (with some regard of the accent) the chief life of it standeth in that like sounding of the words, which we call rhyme. Whether of these be the more excellent, would bear many speeches: the ancient nodoubt more fit for music, both words and time observing quantity, and more fit lively to express divers passions by the low or lofty sound of the well-weighted syllable; the latter likewise with his rhyme striketh a certain music to the ear, and, in fine, since it doth delight, though by an other way, it obtains the same purpose, there being in either sweetness, and wanting in neither majesty. Truly the English, before any vulgar language² I know, is fit for both sorts: for, for the ancient, the Italian is so full of vowels that it must ever be cumbered with elisions; the Dutch so of the other side, with consonants, that they cannot yield the sweet sliding fit for a verse; the French in his whole language hath not one word that hath his accent in the last syllable, saving two, called antepenultima; and little more hath the Spanish, and therefore very gracelessly may they use dactyls. The English is subject to none of these defects. Now for rhyme, though we do not observe quantity, yet we observe the accent very precisely, which other languages either cannot do, or will not do so absolutely. That caesura, or breathing place in the midst of the verse, neither Italian nor Spanish have, the French and we never almost fail of. Lastly, even the very rhyme itself, the Italian cannot put it in the last syllable, by the French named the masculine rhyme, but still in the next to the last, which the French call the female, or the next before that, which the Italian term sdrucchiola. The example of the former, is buono, suono, of the sdrucchiola, is femina, semina. The French, of the other side, hath both the male, as bon, son; and the female, as plaise, taise; but the sdrucchiola he hath not: where the English hath all three, as due, true; father, rather; *motion, potion*³—with much more which might be said, but that already I find the triflingness of this discourse is much too much enlarged. ...

² vulgar language Vernacular.

³ motion, potion Pronounced with three syllables.

 IN CONTEXT

The Abuse of Poesy

The attacks against which Sidney and others were defending poetry have important roots in ancient philosophy. They stem in particular from the Platonic arguments that storytelling is in some ways morally akin to lying, and that in so far as fictions are to be allowed (whether spoken, written in prose, or acted upon the stage) they should embody human notions of moral justice, with the wicked shown to be punished, and so on. In the sixteenth century some Protestants expanded upon these arguments from Plato, contending that the representation of wickedness in artistic form was itself immoral—regardless of whether wickedness was represented as leading in the end to reward or punishment. The most famous of these attacks was The School of Abuse by Stephen Gosson (1554–1624). Gosson, who had himself been a playwright as well as a writer of pamphlets, and who would later become a clergyman, was commissioned by the authorities in London to write an attack on what were perceived to be the excesses and immoralities of the commercial drama. Gosson's style of attack itself ran to excess—as is evident in the excerpt below.

from Plato, The Republic (c. 375 BCE)¹

In this excerpt the philosopher Socrates (who is assumed to be speaking for Plato) is discussing with Adeimantus the education of a leader. In the course of the discussion he puts forward the argument that the sorts of stories that poets and dramatists are allowed to recount should be restricted, and that certain subjects should be censored.

...

SOCRATES. You know also that the beginning is the most important part of any work, especially in the case of a young and tender thing; for that is the time at which the character is being formed and the desired impression is more readily taken.

ADEIMANTUS. Quite true.

SOCRATES. And shall we just carelessly allow children to hear any casual tales which may be devised by casual persons, and to receive into their minds ideas for the most part the very opposite of those which we should wish them to have when they are grown up?

ADEIMANTUS. We cannot.

SOCRATES. Then the first thing will be to establish a censorship of the writers of fiction, and let the censors receive any tale of fiction which is good, and reject the bad; and we will desire mothers and nurses to tell their children the authorized ones only. Let them fashion the mind with such tales, even more fondly than they mold the body with their hands; but most of those which are now in use must be discarded.

ADEIMANTUS. Of what tales are you speaking?

¹ The Republic Translated by Benjamin Jowett (1894).

SOCRATES. You may find a model of the lesser in the greater, for they are necessarily of the same type, and there is the same spirit in both of them.

ADEIMANTUS. Very likely, but I do not as yet know what you would term the greater.

SOCRATES. Those which are narrated by Homer and Hesiod,¹ and the rest of the poets, who have ever been the great story-tellers.

ADEIMANTUS. But which stories do you mean; and what fault do you find with them?

SOCRATES. A fault which is most serious—the fault of telling a lie, and, what is more, a bad lie.

ADEIMANTUS. But when is this fault committed?

SOCRATES. Whenever an erroneous representation is made of the nature of gods and heroes—as when a painter paints a portrait not having the shadow of a likeness to the original. [...] God, if He be good, is not the author of all things, as the many assert, but He is the cause of a few things only, and not of most things that occur to men. For few are the goods of human life, and many are the evils, and the good is to be attributed to God alone; of the evils the causes are to be sought elsewhere, and not in Him.

ADEIMANTUS. That appears to me to be most true.

SOCRATES. Then we must not listen to Homer or to any other poet who is guilty of the folly of saying that two casks lie at the threshold of Zeus,² full of lots, one of good, the other of evil lots, and that he to whom Zeus gives a mixture of the two sometimes meets with evil fortune, at other times with good; but that he to whom is given the cup of unmingled ill, him wild hunger drives o'er the beauteous earth. And if anyone assert that the violation of oaths and treaties, which was really the work of Pandarus,³ was brought about by Athene⁴ and Zeus, or that the strife and contention of the gods was instigated by Themis⁵ and Zeus, he shall not have our approval; neither will we allow our young men to hear the words of Aeschylus,⁶ that God plants guilt among men when he desires utterly to destroy a house. And if a poet writes of the sufferings of Niobe—the subject of the tragedy in which these iambic verses occur—or of the house of Pelops,⁷ or of the Trojan war or on any similar theme, either we must not permit him to say that these are the works of God, or if they are of God, he must devise some explanation of them such as we are seeking; he must say that God did what was just and right, and they were the better for being punished; but that those who are punished are miserable, and that God is the author of their misery, the poet is not to be permitted to say; though he may say that the wicked are miserable because they require to be punished, and are benefitted by receiving punishment from God; but that God being good is the author of evil to anyone is to be strenuously denied, and not to be said or sung or heard in verse or prose by anyone whether old or young in any well-ordered commonwealth. Such a fiction is suicidal, ruinous, impious.

Before drowning, the charioteer cursed the house of Pelops.

from Stephen Gosson, The School of Abuse (1579)

I must confess that poets are the whetstones of wit, notwithstanding that wit is dearly bought. Where honey and gall are mixed, it will be hard to sever the one from the other. The deceitful physician giveth sweet syrups to make his poison go down the smoother; the juggler casteth a mist to work the close; the Siren's song¹ is the sailor's wreck; the fowler's whistle, the bird's death; the wholesome bait, the fish's bane; the Harpies² have virgins' faces and vultures' talons; Hyena speaks like a friend, and devours like a foe; the calmest seas hide dangerous rocks: the wolf jets in weathers fells. Many good sentences are spoken by Davus³ to shadow his knavery, and written by poets as ornaments to beautify their works and set their trumpery to sale without suspect.

But if you look well to Epeus's horse, you find in his bowels the destruction of Troy;⁴ open the sepulchre of Semiramis,⁵ whose title promiseth such wealth to the kings of Persia, you shall see nothing but dead bones; rip up the golden ball that Nero⁶ consecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus, you shall have it stuffed with the shavings of his beard; pull off the vizard that poets mask in, you shall disclose their reproach, bewray their vanity, loath their wantonness, lament their folly, and perceive their sharp sayings to be placed as pearls in dunghills, fresh pictures on rotten walls, chaste matrons' apparel on common courtesans. These are the cups of Circe that turn reasonable creatures into brute beasts, the balls of Hippomenes⁷ that hinder the course of Atalanta, and the blocks of the Devil that are cast in our ways to cut off the race of toward wits. No marvel though Plato shut them out of his school and banished them quite from his commonwealth as effeminate writers, unprofitable members, and utter enemies to virtue.

The Romans were very desirous to imitate the Greeks, and yet very loath to receive their poets. Insomuch that Cato⁸ layeth it in the dish of Marcus the noble as a foul reproach that in the time of his consulship he brought Ennius the poet into his province. Tully,⁹ accustomed to read them with

Troy* According to Greek legend, the Greeks pretended to retreat after having attacked the city of Troy for many years, but they left behind a huge wooden horse, supposedly as a gift. When the Trojans moved the horse inside the city walls, Greek warriors who had hidden themselves inside the structure attacked the Trojans and conquered the city. great diligence in his youth, but when he waxed graver in study, elder in years, riper in judgment, he accompted them the fathers of lies, the pipes of vanity, and schools of abuse. Maximus Tyrius¹ taketh upon him to defend the discipline of these doctors under the name of Homer, wresting the rashness of Ajax to valor, the cowardice of Ulysses to policy,² the dotage of Nestor to grave counsel, and the battle of Troy to the wonderful conflict of the four elements, where Juno, which is counted the air, sets in her foot to take up the strike and steps boldly betwixt them to part the fray. It is a pageant worth the sight, to behold how he labors with mountains to bring forth mice, much like to some of those players that come to the scaffold³ with drum and trumpet to proffer skirmish, and when they have sounded alarm, off go the pieces to encounter a shadow, or conquer a paper monster. You will smile, I am sure, if you read it, to see how this moral philosopher toils to draw the lion's skin upon Aesop's ass, Hercules' shoes on a child's feet, amplifying that which the more it is stirred, the more it stinks, the less it is talked of, the better it is liked, and as wayward children, the more they be flattered, the worse they are, or as cursed sores with often touching wax angry, and run the longer without healing. He attributeth the beginning of virtue to Minerva, if friendship to Venus, and the root of all handicrafts to Vulcan, but if he had broke his arm as well as his leg when he fell out of heaven into Lemnos,⁴ either Apollo must have played the bonesetter, or every occupation been laid a-water.⁵

ELIZABETH I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND

1533 – 1603

One of the most famous monarchs in European history, Queen Elizabeth I presided over a vigorous culture that saw notable accomplishments in the arts, voyages of discovery, the “Elizabethan settlement” that created the Church of England, and the defeat of military threats from Spain. Her shrewd political mind helped sustain her country in a time of occasional famine, widespread poverty, intermittent plague, and deep religious and political divisions; she also, if sometimes reluctantly, supported the beginnings of an empire that would flourish over the next 350 years. Elizabeth was also a precocious writer, penning translations even in her childhood and later composing poetry and speeches.

Elizabeth was the product of a controversial union, that of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. Some months before giving birth on 7 September 1533 Boleyn became the king’s second wife. In 1534, Pope Clement VII, who had waffled for a few years, officially confirmed his refusal to annul Henry’s marriage to his first wife, Catherine of Aragon. Henry responded by declaring himself head of the English Church, but many in and out of the government refused to recognize either his right to do this or the validity of his new marriage. A significant portion of the population therefore considered Elizabeth illegitimate, and throughout her reign many of those loyal to the Roman Catholic Church continued to dispute her right to the throne.

At first Henry designated Elizabeth as his heir. However, after her mother fell from favor and was executed in 1536, Elizabeth’s political fortunes turned (much as they had for her older half-sister, Mary). Henry married Jane Seymour and had a son, Edward, who was named King after Henry died in 1547. Orphaned, Elizabeth was cared for by Henry’s last wife, Catherine Parr, and her new husband, Thomas Seymour. Catherine made sure that Elizabeth received a fine education, hiring a number of prominent tutors, including the distinguished humanist Roger Ascham.

Young Edward VI proved to be sickly, dying in 1553 before his sixteenth birthday. Various political maneuvers ensued, but eventually Elizabeth’s half-sister Mary was crowned Queen. Mary I was a staunch Catholic who wanted to undo the reforms of her father as well as the explicitly Protestant changes made by Edward, and she attempted to convince Elizabeth to convert to Catholicism. Whether from sincere reluctance or awareness that she was the Protestant hope, or both, Elizabeth was prudently ambiguous about her religious beliefs, so on 17 March 1554, fearful of plots against her throne, Mary had her imprisoned in the Tower of London. There she stayed for two months before being transferred into custody at Woodstock Castle, a dilapidated hunting lodge in Oxfordshire, where she remained for almost a year.

When Mary died on 17 November 1558, childless in her marriage to Philip II of Spain, Elizabeth was named Queen. She was crowned on 15 January 1559, after elaborate London celebrations, in Westminster Abbey. As Queen, Elizabeth proved to be a strong and cunning leader. Early in her reign she worked hard to solidify her rule, thwarting assassination attempts and Catholic plots to install her cousin, Mary Stuart, as queen. Elizabeth took a more moderate approach to England’s religious conflicts than had her predecessors. She reinstated the reforms instituted by her father and brother, but she eschewed Edward's Calvinist militancy as well as Mary's punitive conservatism. She also displayed her acumen in domestic politics, manipulating her advisors as a means of maintaining her own control and playing the Petrarchan mistress or virgin goddess to encourage her courtiers' and subjects' loyalty and affection. Internationally, although she did send money and men to help Henri IV to the French throne and to help the Dutch expel the Spanish, she largely withdrew England from costly involvement in foreign conflicts. Ireland was another matter, and Elizabeth's government engaged in an often bloody struggle to suppress Irish revolts against English rule.

Throughout the first half of her reign, Elizabeth was under pressure from advisors and Parliament to marry and produce an heir. She resisted, no doubt aware that any spouse would exert considerable influence over her. She entertained many suitors, English and foreign, but declared that she preferred being married to England.

Elizabeth's writings provide glimpses into her mind, although as a princess or queen she knew she was always on stage and without real privacy. Her lines written on a window frame during her captivity at Woodstock (1555) cry for justice, for example, while "On Monsieur's Departure" (c. 1581; "Monsieur" is almost certainly her suitor the Duc d'Anjou, brother to the French king) shows her romantic side—or its political simulation. In her so-called "Golden Speech," her farewell speech to Parliament given on 30 November 1601, Elizabeth speaks frankly about the burdens of queenship: "to be a king and wear a crown is a thing more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasant to them that bear it." The queen also translated various works, including passages from Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy, and made the first English translation of Horace's "Art of Poetry."

Elizabeth overcame the uncertainty that surrounded her accession to become enormously popular, even with many Catholics; she came to be known to her subjects as "Good Queen Bess." She died on 24 March 1603 at almost seventy, having ruled England for nearly 45 years. She was buried in Westminster Abbey and was succeeded by James VI of Scotland, the Protestant son of Mary Stuart, who reigned as James I.

*Written on a Wall at Woodstock*¹

O h fortune, thy wresting² wavering state
Hath fraught with cares my troubled wit,
Whose witness this present prison late
Could bear, where once was joy's loan quit.³

5 Thou causedst the guilty to be loosed
From bands where innocents were enclosed,
And caused the guiltless to be reserved,
And freed those that death had well deserved.
But herein can be nothing wrought,
10 So God send to my foes as they have thought.
—C. 1554–55

¹ Wall This poem is variously noted as being written on a wall, a shutter, and a window frame. Writing poetry or proverbs on these surfaces was not uncommon in the period; Woodstock Elizabeth, under suspicion for involvement in Sir Thomas Wyatt the Younger's plots against Mary, was placed under house arrest at Woodstock.

² wresting Struggling, twisting.

³ joy's loan quit The lease of joy repaid.

*The Doubt of Future Foes*²

The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy,
 And wit me warns to shun such snares as threaten mine annoy,
 For falsehood now doth flow, and subjects' faith
 doth ebb,
 Which should not be if reason ruled or wisdom
 weaved the web.
 5 But clouds of joys untried do cloak aspiring minds,
 Which turn to rain of late repent by changed
 course of winds.
 The top of hope supposed the root upreared shall be,
 And fruitless all their grafted guile, as shortly ye shall see.
 Their dazzled eyes with pride, which great ambition blinds,

 Shall reap no gain where former rule still peace hath

 No foreign banished wight shall anchor in this port;
 Our realm brooks^o not seditious sects, let tolerates
 them elsewhere resort.

¹ Psalter Translation or version of the Book of Psalms. This poem is inscribed in the last leaf of Elizabeth's French psalter.

² Doubt Dread or fear; Future Foes This poem was written in response to the threat to Elizabeth's rule from Mary, Queen of Scots. Mary believed she had a legitimate claim to the throne of England and became the focal point of Catholic protests against Elizabeth. This was probably written shortly after Mary's flight from Scotland to England in 1568, as it appeared in commonplace books early in the 1570s, though the poem has been understood as a response to Mary's execution in 1587.

*On Monsieur's Departure*⁵

I grieve, and dare not show my discontent,
 I love, and yet am forced to seem to hate,
 I do, yet dare not say I ever meant,
 I seem stark mute, but inwardly do prate.
 5 I am and not, I freeze and yet am burned,
 Since from myself another self I turned.

 My care is like my shadow in the sun,
 Follows me flying, flies when I pursue it,
 Stands and lies by me, doth what I have done.
 10 His too familiar care doth make me rue^o it. regret
 No means I find to rid him from my breast,
 Till by the end of things it be suppressed.

 Some gentler passion slide into my mind,
 For I am soft and made of melting snow,

 Let me or float or sink, be high or⁶ low,
 Or let me live with some more sweet content,
 Or die, and so forget what love ere meant.

Elizabeth frequently engaged in light-hearted exchanges of verse with members of her circle. This exchange (which survives in a number of manuscript copies) is believed to date from 1587, at which time the Earl of Essex was becoming more and more a favorite of the queen; the exchange reflects Raleigh's concern that he might therefore be losing in favor.

[Raleigh to Elizabeth]

Fortune hath taken away my love,
My life's joy and my soul's heaven above.
Fortune hath taken thee away, my princess,
My world's joy and my true fantasy's mistress.

5 Fortune hath taken thee away from me;
Fortune hath taken all by taking thee.
Dead to all joys, I only live to woe:
So is Fortune become my fantasy's foe.

10 In vain, my eyes, in vain ye waste your tears;
In vain my sighs, the smoke of my despair,
In vain you search the earth and heaven above.
In vain you search, for Fortune keeps my love.

Then will I leave my love in Fortune's hand:
Then will I leave my love in worldings' band,¹
15 And only love the sorrows due to me—
Sorrow, henceforth, that shall my princess be—

And only joy that Fortune conquers kings.
Fortune, that rules the earth and earthly things,
Hath taken my love in spite of Virtue's might:
20 So blind a goddess did never Virtue right.²

With wisdom's eyes had but blind Fortune seen,
Then had my love, my love forever been.
But love, farewell—though Fortune conquer thee,
No fortune base^o nor frail shall alter me.

[Elizabeth to Raleigh]

Ah, silly Pug,³ wert thou so sore afraid?
Mourn not, my Wat,^o nor be thou so dismayed. Walter

It passeth^o fickle Fortune's power and skill exceeds
To force my heart to think thee any ill.
5 No Fortune base, thou sayest, shall conquer thee?
And may so blind a witch so conquer me?
No, no, my Pug, though^o Fortune were not blind, even if
Assure thyself she could not rule my mind.
Fortune, I know, sometimes doth conquer kings,
10 And rules and reigns on earth and earthly things,
But never think Fortune can bear the sway
If virtue watch, and will her not obey.
Ne^o chose I thee by fickle Fortune's rede,⁴ nor
Ne she shall force me alter with such speed
15 But if to try this mistress' jest with thee.⁵

Pull up thy heart, suppress thy brackish tears,
Torment thee not, but put away thy fears.
Dead to all joys and living unto woe,
Slain quite by her that ne'er gave wise men blow,
20 Revive again and live without all dread,
The less afraid, the better thou shalt speed.⁶

—WRITTEN C. 1587

³ Pug Term of endearment commonly used during this era; Elizabeth often employed it in addressing Raleigh.

⁴ by fickle Fortune's rede As a result of any decision made by untrustworthy Fortune.

⁵ But if... with thee In their edition of Elizabeth's works, Leah S. Marcus, Janel Mueller, and Mary Beth Rose note that the line following this one is left blank in some (though not all) manuscripts of the poem. They suggest two possibilities: that a line may be missing, which would explain the absence of a rhyme for "thee" (line 15); or that Elizabeth may have intended a break between sections, in which case "thee" would have been intended as a near-rhyme with "rede" (line 13) and "speed" (line 14).

⁶ The less... speed The less afraid you are, the better you will do.

¹ in worldings' band Held by [others] on earth.

² So blind... right So blind a goddess [as Fortune] has never done right by Virtue. (The goddess Fortuna was often portrayed wearing a blindfold.)

*When I Was Fair and Young*¹

When I was fair and young, and favour graced me,
 Of many was I sought their mistress for to be,
 But I did scorn them all and answered them therefore, “Go, go, go, seek some other where. Importune me no more.”

5 How many weeping eyes I made to pine with woe,
 How many sighing hearts I have no skill to show,
 But I the prouder grew and still this spake therefore,
 “Go, go, go, seek some other where. Importune me no more.”

10 Then spake fair Venus’ son,² that proud victorious boy,
 Saying, “You dainty dame, for that you be so coy,
 I will so pluck your plumes as you shall say no more,
 ‘Go, go, go, seek some other where. Importune
 me no more.’”

When he had spoke these words, such change grew in my breast
 That neither night nor day since that I could take any rest.

15 Wherefore I did repent that I had said before, “Go, go, go, seek some other where. Importune me no more.”

learning, as also my duty toward you (most gracious and sovereign princess), but knowing also that pusillanimity⁴ and idleness are most repugnant unto a reasonable creature and that (as the philosopher⁵ saith) even as an instrument of iron or of other metal waxeth soon rusty unless it be continually occupied,⁶ even so shall the wit of a man or woman wax dull and unapt to do or understand anything perfectly unless it be always occupied upon some manner of study, which things considered hath moved so small a portion as God hath lent me to prove what I could do. And therefore have I as for assay⁷ or beginning (so following the right noble saying of the proverb aforesaid) translated this little book out of French rhyme into English prose, joining the sentences together as well as the capacity of my simple wit and small learning could extend themselves. The which book is entitled, or named, The Mirror or Glass of the Sinful Soul, wherein is contained how she⁸ (beholding and contemplating what she is) doth perceive how of herself and of her own strength she can do nothing that good is, or prevaieth for her salvation, unless it be through the grace of God, whose mother, daughter, sister, and wife by the scriptures she proveth herself to be. Trusting also that through His incomprehensible love, grace, and mercy she (being called from sin to repentance) doth faithfully hope to be saved. And although I know that as for my part which I have wrought in it (as well spiritual as manual) there is nothing done as it should be, nor else worthy to come in your grace’s hands, but rather all unperfect and uncorrect, yet do I trust also that albeit it is like a work which is but new begun and shaped, that the file of your excellent wit and godly learning in the reading of it (if so it vouchsafe your highness to do) shall rub out, polish, and mend (or else cause to mend) the words (or rather the order of my writing), the which I know in many places to be rude, and nothing done as it should be. But I hope that after having been in your grace’s hands there shall be nothing in it worthy of reprehension and that in the meanwhile no other (but your highness only) shall read it or see it, lest my faults be known of many. Then shall they be better excused (as my confidence is in your grace's accustomed benevolence) than if I should bestow a whole year in writing or inventing ways to excuse them.

Praying God almighty, the maker and creator of all things, to grant unto your highness this same New Year's day a lucky and prosperous year with prosperous issue and continuance of many years in good health and continual joy and all to His honour, praise, and glory.

*Speech to the House of Commons,
28 January 1563*

Williams, I have heard by you the common request of my Commons,¹ which I may well term (me thinketh) the whole realm because they give, as I have heard, in all these matters of Parliament their common consent to such as be here assembled. The weight and greatness of this matter might cause in me, being a woman wanting both wit² and memory, some fear to speak and bashfulness besides, a thing appropriate to my sex. But yet the princely seat and kingly throne wherein God (though unworthy) hath constituted me maketh these two causes³ to seem little in mine eyes, though grievous perhaps to your ears, and boldeneth me to say somewhat in this matter, which I mean only to touch but not presently to answer. For this so great a demand needeth both great and grave advice.

I read of a philosopher (whose deeds upon this occasion I remember better than his name) who always, when he was required to give answer in any hard question of school points, would rehearse over his alphabet before he would proceed to any further answer therein, not for that he could not presently have answered, but [so as to] have his wits the riper and better sharpened to answer the matter withal. If he, a common man, but in matters of school took such delay the better to show his eloquent tale, great cause may justly move me in this so great a matter, touching the benefit of this realm and the safety of you all, to defer mine answer till some other time, wherein I assure you the consideration of my own safety (although I thank you for the great care that you seem to have thereof) shall be little in comparison of that great regard that I mean to have of the safety and surety of you all.

And though God of late seemed to touch me rather like one that he chastised than one that he punished, and though death possessed almost every joint of me,⁴ so I wished then that the feeble thread of life, which lasted methought all too long, might by Clotho's hand⁵ have quietly been cut off; yet desired I not then life (as I have some witnesses here) so much for mine own safety as for yours. For I knew that in exchanging of this reign I should have enjoyed a better reign, where residence is perpetual.⁶

There needs no boding of my bane.⁷ I know now as well as I did before that I am mortal. I know also that I must seek to discharge myself of that great burden that God hath laid upon me, for of them to whom much is committed, much is required.⁸ Think not that I, that in

¹ Williams ... Commons This speech was a response by the Queen to a petition from the House of Commons that she marry; Parliament petitioned her in this way numerous times, including in 1559 (see the online component of this anthology), 1566 (see below), and 1576. Thomas Williams (1513?–66) served as Speaker of the House of Commons from 1563 to 1566.

² wanting both wit Lacking both intelligence.

³ two causes Elizabeth I marrying, and the issue of succession. The latter was not only a matter of whether or not Elizabeth would herself have children; Parliament also wanted her to set out a clear order of succession in the event that she died without producing an heir.

⁵ Clotho's hand Daughter of Zeus and Themis, Clotho is a mythical figure said to control fate.

Attributed to William Scrots, painting of young Elizabeth I, c.1546–47. Elizabeth was a young teenager when this portrait was painted. It may initially have been intended as a gift for her father, who died early in 1547, but written records list it as belonging to her half-brother, King Edward VI.

other matters have had convenient¹ care of you all, will in this matter touching the safety of myself and you all be careless. For I know that this matter toucheth me much nearer than it doth you all, who, if the worst happen, can lose but your bodies. But if I take not the convenient care that it behooveth me to have therein, I hazard to lose both body and soul.

And though I am determin'd in this so great and weighty a matter to defer mine answer till some other time because I will not in so deep a matter wade with so shallow a wit, yet have I thought good to use these few words as well to show you that I am neither careless nor unmindful of your safety in this case, as I trust you

from Speech to a Parliamentary Delegation, 5 November 1566⁵ [transcript from memory
by one in attendance]

...[T]wo bishops, with their long orations, sought to persuade you, also with solemn matter, as though you, my lords, had not known that ... dying without issue—what a danger it were to the whole state. ...

Was I not born in the realm? Were my parents born in any foreign country? Is not my kingdom here? Whom have I oppressed? Whom have I enriched to others' harm? What turmoil have I made in this commonwealth that I should be suspected to have no regard to the same? How have I governed since my reign [began]? ...

Well, the matter whereof they would have made their petition (as I am informed) consisteth in two points: in my marriage, and in the limitations of the succession of the crown, wherein my marriage was first placed, as for manners' sake. I did send them answer by my council [that] I would marry, although of mine own disposition I was not inclined thereunto. But that was not accepted nor credited. ... And therefore I say again, I will marry as soon as I can conveniently,⁶ if God take not him away with whom I mind to marry, or myself, or else some other great let happen.⁷ I can say no more except the party were present.⁸ And I hope to have children; otherwise I would never marry. ...

The second point was for the limitation of the succession of the crown, wherein was nothing said for my safety, but only for themselves. A strange thing that the foot should direct the head in so weighty a cause. ... I have conferred with those that are well learned, and have asked their opinions touching the limitation of succession. ... They would have twelve or fourteen limited in succession and the more the better. And those shall be of such uprightness and so divine, as in them shall be divinity itself. Kings were wont to honour philosophers, but if I had such I would honour them as angels that should have such piety in them that they would not seek where they are the second to be the first, and where the third to be the second and so forth. It is said I am no divine. Indeed,⁹ I studied nothing else but divinity till I came to the crown; and then I gave myself to the study of that which was meet¹⁰ for government, and am not ignorant of stories wherein appeareth what hath fallen out for ambition of kingdoms—as in Spain, Naples, Portugal and at home; and what cocking hath been between the father and the son for the same. You would have a limitation of succession. Truly if reason did not subdue will in me, I would cause you to deal in

² vain Empty, foolish.

³ stepdames Stepmothers.

⁴ any a more Anyone be more of a.

⁵ Speech ... 1566 Unlike her responses to the 1559 and 1563 Parliamentary petitions that she marry (see above), this 1566 response was to a delegation of 30 Lords and 30 members of the House of Commons. Elizabeth's tone is here much sharper than in the earlier responses. The transcriber is believed to have been a Member of Parliament who was part of the delegation; he declares in his preamble that this "followeth as I could carry away by remembrance." A very short fragment of a different version of the speech (in Elizabeth's own hand) has also come down to us.

⁶ conveniently In a suitable way.

⁷ let happen Hindrance occur.

⁸ except the party were present Without the presence of the other person. (At the time, negotiations were underway regarding a possible marriage between Elizabeth and the Archduke Charles of Austria.)

⁹ Indeed In point of fact. Elizabeth's claim here is not without foundation; she was the translator of several religious works.

¹⁰ meet Fitting.

Attributed to Nicholas Hilliard, Queen Elizabeth I, c. 1575. In this painting, widely known as the “Phoenix Portrait,” Elizabeth wears on her chest a medallion in the shape of a phoenix, a symbol she often incorporated into her jewelry and her portraits. The phoenix is a mythological bird that lives many centuries, then is consumed by fire and reborn from its own ashes; in the early modern period, it carried a wide range of connotations, including eternal life, chastity, beauty, and the rebirth of Christ. In a similar portrait painted around the same time, Elizabeth is also depicted wearing a medallion in the form of a pelican, a symbol connoting Christ’s Passion, motherhood, and self-sacrifice.

Quentin Metsys the Younger, Elizabeth I (Sieve Portrait), 1583. This is one of several portraits that show the queen holding a sieve, probably in allusion to the classical story of the Vestal Virgin Tuccia, who miraculously carried water in a sieve to refute a false allegation against her chastity. Scholars such as Karen Green posit an alternative meaning for the sieve as a symbol of prudence, suggestive of a capacity to “sift” right from wrong. Metsys’s painting also includes a column and a globe—imperial symbols that recur frequently in Elizabeth’s portraiture—and the queen wears pearls, another symbol of virginity. The engravings on the column depict the story of Dido and Aeneas, in which Aeneas abandons his lover, Dido, to pursue his destiny as a founder of Rome; the implication is that, like Aeneas, Elizabeth will choose political achievement over married life.

it, so pleasant a thing it should be unto me. But I stay it for your benefit. ...

I do not marvel [that certain bishops who were part of the delegation] ... did so use themselves therein, since after my brother’s death they openly preached and set forth that my sister and I were bastards. Well, I wish not the death of any man, but only this I desire, that they which have been the practisers herein may before their deaths repent the same, and show some open confession of their fault, whereby the scabbed sheep may be known from the whole. As for my own part I care not for death, for all men are mortal; and though I be a woman yet I have as good a courage answerable to my place as ever my father had. I am your anointed Queen. I will never be by violence constrained to do anything. I thank God I am indeed endowed with such qualities that if I were turned out of the realm in my petticoat I were able to live in any place in Christendom.

Your petition is to deal in the limitation of the succession. At this present it is not convenient, nor never shall be without some peril unto you, and certain danger unto me. But as soon as there may be a convenient time and that it may be done with least peril unto you, although never without great danger unto me, I will deal therein for your safety and offer it unto you as your prince and head without requests. For it is monstrous that the feet should direct the head.

And therefore, this is my mind and answer, which I would have to be showed to the two Houses, and for the doing hereof, you, my lord chief justice, are meetest¹ to do it in the Upper House, and you, Lord Cecil, in the nether house.

—1566

from *Speech to Parliament, 29 March 1586*²

My lords and ye of the lower house, ... No prince³ herein, I confess, can be surer tied or faster bound than I am with the link of your goodwill, ... Yet one matter touches me so near as I may not overskip;

² Speech ... 1586 The parliament of 1584–86 was summoned after the discovery of a plot to assassinate Elizabeth and establish Mary on the throne. This parliament devoted itself largely to measures designed to shore up religious observance (including enforcing stricter observance of the Sabbath) and to curb abuses among members of the clergy. Elizabeth, desiring to maintain the delicate religious balance she had established in the realm, declared herself “greatly aggrieved” that Parliament was concerning itself to such a degree with religious matters. In this following speech (which closed the parliamentary session) she expresses that view to both houses of Parliament.

³ prince Elizabeth often used the words “queen,” “king,” and “prince” interchangeably.

religion is the ground on which all other matters ought to take root, and being corrupted may mar all the tree; and that there be some fault finders with the order of the clergy, which so may make a slander to myself and the Church whose overruler God hath made me, whose negligence cannot be excused if any schisms or errors heretical were suffered. Thus much I must say that some faults and negligence may grow and be, as in all other great charges it happeneth; and what vocation without? All which if you, my Lords of the clergy,⁴ do not amend, I mean to depose you. Look ye therefore well to your charges. I am supposed to have many studies, but most philosophical. I must yield this to be true, that I suppose few that be no professors have read more. And I need not tell you that I am so simple that I understand not, nor so forgetful that I remember not. And yet amidst so many volumes I hope God’s book hath not been my seldomest lectures; in which we find that which by reason, for my part, we ought to believe—that seeing so great wickedness and griefs in the world in which we live but as wayfaring pilgrims, we must suppose that God would never have made us but for a better place and of more comfort than we find here. I know no creature that breatheth whose life standeth hourly in more peril for it than mine own; who entered not into my state without sight of manifold dangers of life and crown, as one that had the mightiest and the greatest to wrestle with. Then it followeth that I regarded it so much as I left myself behind my care. And so you see that you wrong me too much if any such there be as doubt my coldness in that behalf. For if I were not persuaded that mine were the true way of God’s will, God forbid I should live to prescribe it to you. Take you heed lest Ecclesiastes say not too true; they that fear the hoary frost the snow shall fall upon them.⁵

I see many overbold with God Almighty making too many subtle scannings of His blessed will, as lawyers do with human testaments. The presumption is so great, as I may not suffer it. Yet mind I not hereby to animate Romanists (which what adversaries they be to mine estate is sufficiently well known) nor tolerate newfangledness. I mean to guide them both by God's holy true rule. In both parts be perils. And of the latter I must pronounce them dangerous to a kingly rule: to have every man according to his own censure, to make a doom¹ of a validity and privity of his Prince's government with a common veil and cover of God's word, whose followers must not be judged, but by private men's exposition. God defend you from such a ruler that so evil will guide you. Now I conclude that your love and care neither is nor shall be bestowed upon a careless Prince, but such as but for your good will passeth² as little for this world as who careth least. With thanks for your free subsidy,³ a manifest show of the abundance of your good wills, the which I assure you, but to be employed to your weal, I could be better pleased to return than receive.

Elizabeth and Mary, Queen of Scots

Mary, Queen of Scots (not to be confused with Mary I, Queen of England) was considered a rival to Elizabeth; many Catholics regarded her as the legitimate heir to the English throne held by Elizabeth, and there was a long history of conflict between the two.

from Letter from Elizabeth I to Mary, Queen of Scots, 24 February 1567

Madame:

My ears have been so deafened and my understanding so grieved and my heart so affrighted to hear the dreadful news of the abominable murder of your mad husband and my killed cousin that I scarcely yet have the wits to write about it.⁴ And inasmuch as my nature compels me to take his death in the extreme, he being so close in blood, so it is that I will boldly tell you what I think of it. I cannot dissemble that I am more sorrowful for you than for him. O madame, I would not do the office of faithful cousin or affectionate friend if I studied rather to please your ears than employed myself in preserving your honour. However, I will not at all dissemble what most people are talking about: which is that you will look through your fingers at the revenging of this deed, and that you do not take measures that touch those who have done as you wished, as if the thing had been entrusted in a way that the murderers felt assurance in doing it. Among the thoughts in my heart I beseech you to want no such touch to stick at this point. Through all the dealings of the world I never was in such miserable haste to lodge and have in my heart such a miserable opinion of any prince as this would cause me do. Much less will I have such of her to whom I wish as much good as my heart is able to imagine or as you were able a short while ago to wish. However, I exhort you, I counsel you, and I beseech you to take this thing so much to heart that you will not fear to touch even him whom you have nearest to you if the thing touches him,⁵ and that no persuasion will prevent you from making an example out of this to the world: that you are both a noble princess and a loyal wife. I do not write so vehemently out of doubt that I have, but out of the affection that I bear you in particular. For I am not ignorant that you have no wiser counselors than myself. Thus it is that, when I remember that our Lord had one Judas out of twelve, and I assure myself that there could be no one more loyal than myself, I offer you my affection in place of this prudence.

⁴ dreadful news ... about it Elizabeth had been informed of the murder of Henry Stuart (Lord Darnley), husband of Mary, Queen of Scots and second cousin to Elizabeth.

⁵ even him ... touches him Mary was close to (and later married) James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, who was later discovered to have been among those who conspired to murder Lord Darnley; as this letter suggests, Elizabeth already suspected he was involved.

² passeth Cares.

³ subsidy Quantity of funds given by Parliament toward the monarchy's expenses.

Sketch of the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots, 1586. This sketch, included in the trial records kept by Robert Beale, Clerk of the Privy Council, shows Mary standing trial in the Great Chamber of Fotheringhay Castle. The sketch shows Mary entering the room in the top right corner; she can be seen again, seated for trial, in the chair immediately below the room's entrance. Seated throughout the room are the thirty-six commissioners who conducted the trial and decided its verdict. As Elizabeth's empty chair in the top center of the room indicates, she was not present at the proceedings.

[Here Elizabeth writes briefly about a longstanding dispute over the Treaty of Edinburgh.]

... About other matters I will not trouble you with a longer letter except to put you in contact with this gentleman and to thank you by messenger for your good letters, which were and are very agreeable coming from your hands. Praying the Creator to give you the grace to recognize this traitor and protect yourself from him as from the ministers of Satan, with my very heartfelt recommendations to you, very dear sister. From Westminster February 24.

Letter from Elizabeth I to Mary, Queen of Scots, 12 October 1586

To Mary, Queen of Scots,

12 October 1586¹

You have in various ways and manners attempted to take my life and to bring my kingdom to destruction by bloodshed. I have never proceeded so harshly against you, but have, on the contrary, protected and maintained you like myself. These treasons will be proved to you and all made manifest. Yet it is my will, that you answer the nobles and peers of the kingdom as if I were myself present. I therefore require, charge, and command that you make answer for I have been well informed of your arrogance.

Act plainly without reserve, and you will sooner be able to obtain favour of me.

Elizabeth

¹ 12 October 1586 This letter was written in the days immediately before Mary's trial; she had refused to appear before the court, claiming that as a foreign queen she could not be tried for treason in England.

Letter from Mary, Queen of Scots to Henry III, 8 February 1587

Queen of Scotland

8 February 1587¹

Royal brother,² having by God's will, for my sins I think, thrown myself into the power of the Queen my cousin, at whose hands I have suffered much for almost twenty years, I have finally been condemned to death by her and her Estates. I have asked for my papers, which they have taken away, in order that I might make my will, but I have been unable to recover anything of use to me, or even get leave either to make my will freely or to have my body conveyed after my death, as I would wish, to your kingdom where I had the honour to be queen, your sister and old ally.

Tonight, after dinner, I have been advised of my sentence: I am to be executed like a criminal at eight in the morning. I have not had time to give you a full account of everything that has happened, but if you will listen to my doctor and my other unfortunate servants, you will learn the truth, and how, thanks be to God, I scorn death and vow that I meet it innocent of any crime, even if I were their subject. The Catholic faith and the assertion of my God-given right to the English crown are the two issues on which I am condemned, and yet I am not allowed to say that it is for the Catholic religion that I die, but for fear of interference with theirs. The proof of this is that they have taken away my chaplain, and although he is in the building, I have not been able to get permission for him to come and hear my confession and give me the last sacrament, while they have been most insistent that I receive the consolation and instruction of their minister, brought here for that purpose. The bearer of this letter and his companions, most of them your subjects, will testify to my conduct at my last hour. It remains for me to beg Your Most Christian Majesty, my brother-in-law and old ally, who have always protested your love for me, to give proof now of your goodness on all these points: firstly by charity, in paying my unfortunate servants the wages due them—this is a burden on my conscience that only you can relieve: further, by having prayers offered to God for a queen who has borne the title Most Christian, and who dies a Catholic, stripped of all her possessions. As for my son, I commend him to you in so far as he deserves, for I cannot answer for him. I have taken the liberty of sending you two precious stones, talismans against illness, trusting that you will enjoy good health and a long and happy life. Accept them from your loving sister-in-law, who, as she dies, bears witness of her warm feeling for you. Again I commend my servants to you. Give instructions, if it please you, that for my soul's sake part of what you owe me should be paid, and that for the sake of Jesus Christ, to whom I shall pray for you tomorrow as I die, I be left enough to found a memorial mass and give the customary alms.

Wednesday, at two in the morning.

Your most loving and most true sister,

Mari R

*Letter from Elizabeth I to James VI,
14 February 1587*

14 February 1587

My dear Brother,

I would you knew, though not felt, the extreme dolor that overwhelms my mind, for that miserable accident³ which far contrary to my meaning hath befallen. I have now sent this kinsman of mine,⁴ whom ere now it hath pleased you to favour, to instruct you truly of that which is too irksome for my pen to tell you. I beseech you that, as God and many more know how innocent I am in this case, so you will believe me, that if I had bid aught I would have bid by it. I am not so base minded that fear of any living creature or prince should make me so afraid to do that were just or, done, to deny the same. I am not of so base a lineage, nor carry so vile a mind; but, as not to disguise fits most a king, so will I never dissemble my actions but cause them show even as I meant them. Thus assuring yourself of me that, as I know this was deserved, yet if I had meant it I would never lay it on others' shoulders, no more will I not damnify myself that thought¹ it not. The circumstance it may please you to have of this bearer. And for your part, think you have not in the world a more loving kinswoman nor a more dear friend than myself; nor any that will watch more carefully to preserve you and your estate. And who shall otherwise persuade you, judge them more partial to others than you. And thus in haste I leave to trouble you, beseeching God to send you a long reign. The 14 of February, 1587.

Your most assured, loving sister and cousin,
Elizabeth R.

*To the Troops at Tilbury*²

My loving people, we have been persuaded by some that are careful of our safety to take heed how we commit ourself to armed multitudes for fear of treachery, but I assure you, I do not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear. I have always so behaved myself that under God I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and good will of my subjects. And therefore I am come amongst you as you see at this time not for my recreation and disport, but being resolved in the midst and heat of the battle to live or die amongst you all, to lay down for God and for my kingdom and for my people my honour and my blood even in the dust. I know I have the body of a weak and feeble woman, but I have the heart and stomach of a king, and of a king of England too, and think foul scorn that Parma³ or Spain or any prince of Europe should dare invade the borders of my realm, to which, rather than any dishonour shall grow by me, I myself will take up arms; I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field. I know already for your forwardness you have deserved rewards and crowns, and we do assure you in the word of a prince, they shall be duly paid you.

In the meantime my lieutenant-general⁴ shall be in my stead, than whom never prince commanded a more noble or worthy subject. Not doubting but by your obedience to my general, by your concord in the camp and your valour in the field, we shall shortly have a famous victory over these enemies of God, of my kingdom, and of my people.

⁵ Henri IV of France Henri de Navarre became Henri IV, King of France, upon the assassination in 1589 of his childless cousin, Henri III. Because Navarre was the leader of the Huguenot (Protestant) side in a three-sided civil war among supporters of Henri III, Huguenots, and ultra-papist supporters of the Duc de Guise, his accession merely led to further fighting. To prevent more bloodshed and to strengthen his position, Navarre announced his conversion to Catholicism in the summer of 1593; his sincerity has been doubted, but perhaps unjustly, and there is in fact no firm evidence that he ever said "Paris is worth a mass." His conversion had been widely anticipated, but after hearing the news Elizabeth wrote to him in an anguish of reproach, making sure that the letter circulated widely. A little later she also wrote Henri's still Protestant sister, Catherine. Catherine was herself an experienced politician, having at times served her brother as regent in his ancestral domains.

And in response to your desire to be able to serve me in place of [or perhaps “close to”] the king your brother, nothing you could do for me would so please me as to purchase for him so much honor and security that whatever harm he has wished to do to himself may not crush him through his forgetting the care of those of the true religion² who for so many years have consumed their means [and] poured out their blood to safeguard his cause. Not only does he owe this in good conscience, policy of state invites him to it, which is so uncertainly grounded on marshlands that he needs to grasp some very strong poles to get himself out. Madam,

As I am sending this gentleman³ to the King, I have been unable to restrain my pen from revealing to you one of the urgent reasons for sending him at once: he must serve as tablets to remind him⁴ of the important reasons why he must have consideration for those of the Religion,⁵ not only for the danger to their lives, bodies, and goods when he was not too near his [current] dignity to reward them for it, but for his own salvation and the firm maintenance of his state. For if his enemies see him even slightly leaning on them, they make sport of him, knowing he has lost all other hope. Behold here, Madame, my boldness in minding somebody else’s business: if this is a sin, I merit pardon for acknowledging it. Nevertheless, I beg you to add your urging [to mine]. And rest assured always to have in me

Letter from Elizabeth I to Essex in Ireland,⁶
19 July 1599

We have perceived by your letters to our council brought by Henry Carey⁷ that you are arrived at Dublin after your journey into Munster, where though it seemeth by the words of your letter that you had spent divers days in taking an account of all that have passed since you left that place, yet have you in this dispatch given us small light either when or in what order you intend particularly to proceed to the northern action. Wherein, if you compare the time that is run on and the excessive charges that is spent with the effects of anything wrought by this voyage (howsoever we may remain satisfied with your own particular cares and travails of body and mind), yet you must needs think that we that have the eyes of foreign princes upon our actions and have the hearts of people to comfort and cherish—who groan under the burden of continual levies and impositions which are occasioned by these late

⁶ Letter ... in Ireland Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex (1565–1601), a favorite of Elizabeth, had been commissioned by the queen to put an end to the ongoing rebellion in Ireland. Essex set off in 1599 with an army of 16,000—the largest army England had ever sent to Ireland—but would return to London later that year after a string of military failures. Essex disregarded many of Elizabeth’s directions while in Ireland; this, and what she and many others perceived as his mismanagement of the military forces, would result in his complete loss of her favor upon his return.

The rebellion, also known as The Nine Years’ War, was led by Hugh O’Neill, Earl of Tyrone (1550–1616) and took place largely in the northern province of Ulster. It began in 1594 and ended in 1603 with the defeat of the Irish forces; it was followed by the colonization of Ulster by the English under James I.

⁷ Henry Carey Brother of George Carey, 2nd Baron of Hunsdon (1547–1603), Elizabeth’s Lord Chamberlain, and son of Henry Carey, 1st Baron of Hunsdon (1526–96), Elizabeth’s previous Lord Chamberlain and first cousin.

actions—can little please ourself hitherto with anything that hath been effected.

For what can be more true (if things be rightly examined) than that your two months' journey hath brought in never a capital rebel against whom it had been worthy to have adventured one thousand men; for of their two coming-in that were brought unto you by Ormond¹ (namely Mountgarrett and Cahir²), whereupon ensued the taking of Cahir Castle, full well do we know that you would long since have scorned to have allowed it for any great matter in others to have taken an Irish hold from a rabble of rogues³ with such forces as you had and with the help of the cannon, which were always able in Ireland to make his passage where it pleased. And therefore, more than that, you have now learned upon our expenses, by knowledge of the country, that those things are true which we have heretofore told you. If you would have believed us, how far different things would prove from your expectations! There is little public benefit made to us of any things happened in this action which the president⁴ with any convenient addition to his numbers by you might not have effected, either now or hereafter, in a time more seasonable, when it should less have hindered the other enterprise on which depends our greatest expectation.

Whereas we will add this one thing that doth more displease us than any charge or expense that happens, which is that it must be the Queen of England's fortune (who hath holden down the greatest enemy she had) to make a base bush kern⁵ to be accounted so famous a rebel as to be a person against whom so many thousands of foot and horse, besides the force of all the nobility of that kingdom, must be thought too little to be employed. For we must now remember unto you that our cousin of Ormond, by his own relation when you arrived, assured us that he had delivered you a charge of a kingdom without either town maritime, or island, or hold possessed by traitors. But we did ever think that Tyrone would please himself to see such a portion of our fair army, and led by the person of our general, to be harassed out and adventured in encountering those base rogues who were no way strengthened by foreign armies, but only by such of his offal⁶ as he was content to spare and let slip from himself, whiles he hath lived at his pleasure, hath spoiled all where our army should come, and preserved for himself what he thought necessary. Little do you know how he hath blazed in foreign parts the defeats of regiments, the death of captains, and loss of men of quality in every corner, and how little he seemeth to value their power who use it so as it is like to spend itself!

It is therefore apparent that all places require not one and the selfsame knowledge, and that drafts and surprises would have found better successes than public and notorious marches, though where the rebel attends you with greater forces, it is necessary that you carry our army in the form you use. But it doth sound hardly in the ears of the world that, in a time when there is a question to save a kingdom and in a country where experience giveth so great advantage to all enterprises, regiments should be committed to young gentlemen that rather desire to do well than know how to perform it,⁷ a matter wherein we must note that you have made both us and our council so great strangers as to this day we know but by reports who they be that spend our treasure and carry places of note in our army. Wherein you know we did by our instructions direct you as soon as you should be arrived, seeing you used reasons why it could not be done so conveniently beforehand.

² Mountgarrett and Cahir Richard Butler, 3rd Viscount Mountgarrett (1578–1651) and Thomas Butler, 2nd Baron of Cahir (1568–1626/27).

³ taking of Cahir Castle ... rogues The siege of Cahir Castle, considered one of Ireland's strongest fortresses, was Essex's major success in Ireland; Elizabeth here suggests that he presented it as a greater achievement than it was.

⁴ president Sir Thomas Norris (1556–99), Lord President of Munster in Ireland, who had not been very successful in his military attempts to counter the rebellion.

⁵ base bush kern Low Irish foot-soldier, here referring to the earl of Tyrone.

⁶ offal Cast-offs, dregs.

These things we would pass over but that we see your pen flatters you with phrases—that here you are deceived, that you are disgraced from hence in your friends' fortune, that poor Ireland suffers in you—still exclaiming against the effects of your own causes. For if it be not enough that you have all and more than that which was agreed on before you when concerning public service, but that you must by your voluntary actions there in particular things (which you know full well are contrary to our will and liking) raise an opinion that there is any person that dare displease us, either by experience of our former toleration or with a conceit to avoid blame by distinctions, then must we not hide from you, how much soever we do esteem you for those good things which are in you, but that our honour hath dwelt too long with us to leave the point now uncleared that, whosoever it be that you do clad with any honour or place (wherein the world may read the least suspicion of neglect or contempt of our commands),¹ we will never make dainty to set on such shadows as shall quickly eclipse any of these lusters.

And therefore, although by your letter we found your purpose to go northward, on which depends the main good of our service and which we expected long since should have been performed, yet because we do hear it bruited² (besides the words of your letter written with your own hand, which carries some such sense) that you who allege such weakness in our army by being travelled with you and find so great and importunate³ affairs to digest at Dublin, will yet engage yourself personally in Offlay,⁴ being our lieutenant, when you have there so many inferiors able enough to victual a fort or seek revenge of these that have lately prospered against our forces. And when we call to mind how far the sun hath run his course, what dependeth upon the timely plantation of garrisons in the north, and how great a scandal it would be to our honour to leave that proud rebel unassaulted when we have with so great an expectation of our enemies engaged ourself so far in this action, so as without that be done, all these former courses will prove like via navis in mare,⁵ besides that our power, which hitherto hath been dreaded by potent enemies, will now even be held contemptible amongst our rebels, we must now plainly charge you, according to the duty you owe us, so to unite soundness of judgment to the zeal you have to do us service, and with all speed to pass thither in such order as the axe may be put to the root of that tree which hath been the treasonable stock from whence so many poisoned plants and grafts have been derived. By which proceedings of yours we may neither have cause to repent our employment of yourself for omitting these opportunities to shorten the war, nor receive in the eye of the world imputation of too much weakness in ourself to being a work without better foresight.

What would be the end of our excessive charge, the adventure of our people's lives, and the holding-up of our own greatness against a wretch whom we have raised from the dust and who could never prosper if the charges we have been put to were orderly employed? For the matter of Southampton,⁶ it is strange to us that his continuance or displacing should work so great an alteration either in yourself (valuing our commandments as you ought) or in the disposition of our army, where all the commanders cannot be ignorant that we not only not allowed of your desire to him, but did expressly forbid it. And being such a one whose counsel can be of so little and experience of less use, yea, such a one as, were he not lately fastened to yourself by an accident wherein for our usage of yours we deserve thanks, you would have used many of your old, lively arguments against him for any such ability or commandment. It is therefore strange to us that, we knowing his worth by your report and you our disposition from ourself in this point, will dare thus to value your own pleasing in things unnecessary, and think by your private arguments to carry for your own glory a matter wherein our pleasure to the contrary is made notorious. And where you say further that divers or the most of the voluntary gentlemen are so discouraged thereby as they begin to desire passports and prepare to return, we cannot as yet be persuaded but that the love of our service and the duty which they owe us have been as strong motives to these their travails and hazards as any affection to the Earl of Southampton or any other. If it prove otherwise, which we will not so much wrong as to suspect, we shall have the less cause either to acknowledge or reward it.

*The Golden Speech*¹

Mr. Speaker,² we have heard your declaration and perceive your care of our state, by falling into the consideration of a grateful acknowledgement of such benefits as you have received, and that your coming is to present thanks unto us, which I accept with no less joy than your loves can have desire to offer such a present.

I do assure you that there is no prince that loveth his subjects better, or whose love can countervail³ our love. There is no jewel, be it of never so rich a price, which I prefer before this jewel—I mean your love—for I do more esteem it than any treasure or riches: for that we know how to prize, but love and thanks I count inestimable. And though God has raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my crown: that I have reigned with your loves. This makes me that I do not so much rejoice that God hath made me to be a queen, as to be a queen over so thankful a people. Therefore I have cause to wish nothing more than to content the subjects, and that is a duty which I owe. Neither do I desire to live longer days than that I may see your prosperity, and that is my only desire. And as I am that person that still yet under God hath delivered you, so I trust by the almighty power of God that I still shall be His instrument to preserve you from envy, peril, dishonour, shame, tyranny, and oppression, partly by means of your intended helps, which we take very acceptably, because it manifests the largeness of your loves and loyalties unto your sovereign.

Of myself I must say this: I never was any greedy, scraping grasper, nor a strait,⁴ fast-holding prince, nor yet a waster; my heart was never set on worldly goods, but only for my subjects' good. What you do bestow on me I will not hoard up, but receive it to bestow on you again. Yea, mine own properties I account yours, to be expended for your good. Therefore render unto them, I beseech you, Mr. Speaker, such thanks as you imagine my heart yieldeth, but my tongue cannot express.

Mr. Speaker, I would wish you and the rest to stand up, for I shall yet trouble you with longer speech.⁵

Mr. Speaker, you give me thanks, but I doubt me⁶ I have more cause to thank you all than you me: and I charge you to thank them of the Lower House⁷ from me, for had I not received a knowledge from you, I might have fallen into the lapse of an error only for lack of true information.

Since I was queen, yet never did I put my pen to any grant but that upon pretext and semblance made unto me that it was both good and beneficial to the subjects in general, though a private profit to some of my ancient servants who had deserved well. But the contrary being found by experience, I am exceedingly beholding to such subjects as would move the same at first. And I am not so simple to suppose but that there be some of the

This parliamentary speech was Elizabeth's most celebrated, and in it she states her recognition of the people's right—and even duty—to raise grievances over royal policies. Here, Elizabeth addresses grievances raised over monopolies, which, because they favored certain individuals, were often economically detrimental to many.

⁷ Lower House House of Commons.

Lower House whom these grievances never touched, and from them I think they speak out of zeal to their countries¹ and not out of spleen or malevolent affection, as being parties grieved. And I take it exceedingly grateful from them, because it gives us to know that no respects or interests had moved them other than the minds they bear to suffer no diminution of our honour and our subjects' love unto us, the zeal of which affection, tending to ease my people and knit their hearts unto me, I embrace with a princely care.

Far above all earthly treasure I esteem my people's love, more than which I desire not to merit. That my grants should be grievous to my people and oppressions to be privileged under colour of our patents, our kingly dignity shall not suffer it. Yea, when I heard it, I could give no rest to my thoughts until I had reformed it. Shall they think to escape unpunished that have thus oppressed you and have been disrespectful of their duty and regardless of our honour? No, Mr. Speaker, I assure you, were it not more for conscience' sake than for any glory or increase of love that I desire, these errors, troubles, vexations, and oppressions done by these varlets² and lewd persons, not worthy the name of subjects, should not escape without condign³ punishment. But I perceive they dealt with me like physicians who, ministering a drug, make it more acceptable by giving it a good aromatical savour, or, when they give pills, do gild⁴ them all over.

I have ever used to set the last judgement day before my eyes and so to rule as I shall be judged to answer before a higher judge. To whose judgement seat I do appeal that never thought was cherished in my heart that tended not unto my people's good. And if my kingly bounty have been abused and my grants turned to the hurt of my people, contrary to my will and meaning, or if any in authority under me have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their culps⁵ and offenses to my charge.

And though there were danger in repealing our grants, yet what danger would not I rather incur for your own good, than I would suffer them still to continue?

I know the title of a king is a glorious title, but assure yourself that the shining glory of princely authority hath not so dazzled the eyes of our understanding but we well know and remember that we also are to yield an account of our actions before the great judge. To be a king and wear a crown is a thing more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasant to them that bear it. For myself, I was never so much enticed with the glorious name of a king or royal authority of a queen as delighted that God hath made me His instrument to maintain His truth and glory, and to defend this kingdom, as I said, from peril, dishonour, tyranny, and oppression.

There will never queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country or care to my subjects, and that will sooner with willingness venture her life for your good and safety than myself. For it is not my desire to live nor reign longer than my life and reign shall be for your good. And though you have had and may have many princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you never had or shall have any that will be more careful and loving.

Should I ascribe anything to myself and my sexly weakness, I were not worthy to live then, and of all most unworthy of the mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me a heart which never yet feared foreign or home enemies. I speak it to give God the praise as a testimony before you, and not to attribute anything unto myself. For I, O Lord, what am I, whom practices and perils past should not fear? Or what can I do? That I should speak for any glory, God forbid.

This, Mr. Speaker, I pray you deliver unto the House, to whom heartily recommend me. And so I commit you all to your best fortunes and further counsels. And I pray you, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Secretary, and you of my Council, that before these gentlemen depart into their countries, you bring them all to kiss my hand.

IN CONTEXT

The Defeat of the Spanish Armada

Tensions between England and Spain rose through the 1580s primarily as a result of raids on Spanish shipping and the looting of Spanish settlements in the Americas (largely by Sir Francis Drake), and religious differences between Catholic Spain and Protestant England. Finally, on 30 May 1588, Philip II of Spain launched an Armada of 130 ships, which, together with the army of Philip's nephew the Duke of Parma (then stationed across the English Channel in Flanders), was to invade and conquer England. The English fleet (under Lord Howard and Drake) of 197 smaller and more maneuverable ships engaged the Spanish in a battle that began on 29 July and extended over many days, culminating in a Spanish defeat at Gravesend and made more decisive by a gale that drove the remnants of the Spanish fleet north, up the English coast. Meanwhile an English army of 22,000 troops had gathered at Tilbury (east of London on the Thames). Under the command of Robert Dudley, the Earl of Leicester, it prepared to engage the army of the Duke of Parma—but with the defeat of the Armada was never called upon to fight. Leicester, the Queen's favorite, died of natural causes a few weeks later.

These engravings (by Augustine Ryther, based on illustrations by Robert Adams to the 1588 book Expeditionis Hispanorum), depict battles between the English fleet and the Spanish Armada on 4 August off the Isle of Wight (left) and on 8 August off Gravelines, Flanders (right).

CULTURE: A PORTFOLIO

CONTEXTS

As in any period, the culture of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries was not monolithic and uniform: the “high” culture of the nobility was largely foreign to the rural laborers (although the élite was often familiar with popular culture), various cultural phenomena were peculiar to the citizens and merchants in the social class below the nobility and gentry, or to the yeomen in the social class above the laborers, and so on. It varied substantially by gender: the culture of women was different from that of men, and women were effectively excluded from participation in many activities. Culture varied too from place to place: the culture of London (and to a lesser extent that of other cities, such as Bristol and York) differed from that of the rural areas of England or that of smaller centers, and that of Scotland, of Wales, and of other regions was different again. Of necessity, then, the following can provide only limited impressions of the culture of Britain during this period.

Music

Over the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, home performance from printed or manuscript music began to play a much larger role in daily life than it had in earlier periods. The work of composers and musicians such as John Dowland (1563–1626), William Byrd (1539–1623), and Thomas Campion (1567–1620) was highly regarded, and their compositions, whether for stringed instruments such as the lute (in Dowland’s case), or keyboard instruments such as the virginal and the harpsichord (as with Byrd) began to be printed and distributed. Among the common people music continued to play an integral part of daily life; most communities possessed shared knowledge of a body of popular song, as the excerpt below from Walton’s Compleat Angler (1653) indicates.

from John Dowland, First Booke of Songs or Ayres, 1597.

The book of songs, each written for four-part singing, was printed to allow each of the four singers to face his or her own part.

Advertisement for William Byrd, Parthenia, a collection of songs by William Byrd and others, c. 1611.

from Izaak Walton, The Compleat Angler, or, The Contemplative Man's Recreation (1653)

PISCATOR.¹ I pray, do us a courtesy that shall stand you and your daughter in nothing, and yet we will think ourselves something in your debt. It is but to sing a song that was sung by your daughter when I last passed over this meadow, about eight or nine days since.

MILK-WOMAN. What song was it, pray? Was it "Come Shepherds, deck your herds"? or "As at noon Dulcina rested"? or "Phillida flouts me"? or "Chevy Chace"? or "Johnny Armstrong"? or "Troy Town"?

PISCATOR. No, it is none of those; it is a song that your daughter sung the first part, and you sung the answer to it.

MILK-WOMAN. Come, Maudlin, sing the first part to the gentleman with a merry heart; and I'll sing the second when you have done.

[The song that follows is Christopher Marlowe's "Come live with me and be my love."]

Painting

The emphasis throughout this period was on portraiture; in the sixteenth century, it was common for portraits to depict the subject's face naturalistically so as to suggest three dimensions, while the portrayal of the rest of the figure was rendered in a flatter, decorative fashion. (The portrait of Edward Alleyn below is a good example.)

Some of the best-known "English" paintings of the period were painted by leading artists from the Continent: Hans Holbein the Younger (1497–1543) became court painter to Henry VIII, and Anthony Van Dyck court painter to Charles I. Among sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century painters of English nationality, Nicholas Hilliard may have been the best known—for his Treatise Concerning the Art of Limning as well as for his miniature cameos and other portraits. ("Limning," as a later seventeenth-century definition explains, is an "Art whereby in Water Colours, we strive to resemble Nature in every thing to the life.")

The two passages ending this section present contrasting attitudes of the subjects of portraits as to how they should be painted. The quotation attributed to Oliver Cromwell is the source of the famous phrase "warts and all." (Cromwell did indeed have several warts on his face, and they are shown in the Lely portrait.)

Rowland Lockey, copy of Hans Holbein the Younger, Sir Thomas More and His Family, detail, 1593, original c. 1527.

The original of this large portrait (the full picture includes eleven figures) is now lost; it is the first known example by a northern European artist of a large group portrait in which most of the figures are shown standing (rather than most or all being shown kneeling).

Against a Tree
Among Roses*,
c. 1590.

from Nicholas Hilliard, A Treatise Concerning the Art of Limning (1624)

I wish it were so that none should meddle with limning but gentlemen alone, for that it is a kind of gentle painting of less subjection than any other; for one may leave when he will, his colours nor his work taketh any harm by it. Moreover it is secret, a man may use it and scarcely be perceived of his own folk; it is sweet and cleanly to use, and it is a thing apart from all other painting or drawing, and tendeth not to common men's use, either for furnishing of houses or any patterns for tapestries, or building, or any other work whatsoever, and yet it excelleth all other painting whatsoever in sundry points, in giving the true lustre to pearl and precious stone, and worketh the metals gold or silver with themselves, which so enricheth and ennobleth the work that it seemeth to be the thing itself.

from A Letter to F.P. Verney from the Countess of Sussex (1639)

Sweet Mr. Verney, the picture came very well, many hearty thanks to you for it. The frame is a little hurt, the gilt being rubbed off. The picture is very ill favoured, makes me quite out of love with myself, the face is so big and so fat that it pleases me not at all. It looks like one of the winds puffing—but truly I think it is like the original. If ever I come to London before Sir Vandyck go, I will get him to mend my picture, for though I be ill favoured I think that makes me worse than I am.

Mr. Lilly,¹ I desire you would use all your skill to paint my picture truly like me and not flatter me at all but [pointing to his own face] remark all these roughnesses, pimples, warts and everything as you see me; otherwise I will never pay a farthing for it.

Games and Pastimes

Considerable attention was paid to games and pastimes in the sixteenth century. Skill in archery was considered to be of particular importance to the defence of the realm—so much so that Henry VIII passed several statutes to enforce its practice and ensure that “every man having a man-child or men-children in his house, shall provide, ordain, and have in his house for every man-child being of the age of seven years and above, till he come to the age of seventeen years, a bow and two shafts to induce and learn them, and bring them up in shooting.” The statutes appear to have been widely ignored, and it is probable that archery became slowly less popular over this period.

Sports, games, and entertainments pursued purely for pleasure, on the other hand, clearly gained in popularity. Bear-baiting is of special interest because of the surprising degree to which connections existed between bear-baiting and the theater in the late-sixteenth and early-seventeenth centuries. Philip Henslowe, a prominent theater manager, and Edward Alleyn, a leading actor, were from 1594 onwards two of the leading figures in the sport. For some years they controlled both the Bear Garden and the Paris Garden, the two sites for bearbaiting in London, and they eventually built a new theater, the Hope, designed to house both bear-baiting and stage plays. Both Elizabeth I and James I encouraged the practice, and royal exhibitions of bear-baiting (at venues such as Whitehall and Greenwich Park) to entertain foreign visitors were frequent occurrences; though the monarch is never recorded to have attended public performances of plays during this period, Elizabeth is known to have visited the Paris Garden in 1599.

Though most sports, games, and pastimes were heavily male-oriented, there are some exceptions among the more gentle pastimes. Queen Elizabeth is known to have played draughts (checkers) and chess with Roger Ascham, and Arthur Saul dedicated The Famous Game of Chess-Play (1614) to Lucy, Countess of Bedford.

Food and Drink

In this as in many other things, the sixteenth and early-seventeenth century point of comparison was often Italy. The first of the passages below gives an early impression of the comparison from an Italian point of view, the second a seventeenth-century view from an English gentleman. Moryson's comment that the English eat “more flesh” than the Italians may be something of an understatement: the 1589 records preserved of the food and drink purchased for a well-off bachelor in London show a diet of almost nothing but meat. On May 11, for example, the following were purchased for the midday dinner:

a piece of beef	xviiiid.
a loin of veal	iis.
2 chickens	xiiiid.
oranges	iid
for dressings ye veal & chickens & sauce	xiid

The following items were purchased for supper the same day:

a shoulder of mutton	xvid.
2 rabbits	xd.
for dressing ye mutton, rabbits & a pigges pettie toes	viiiid.
cold beef	viiiid.
cheese	iid.

The diet of commoners, in contrast, included a good deal of bread and cheese but relatively little meat through much of the year. Even in towns most families kept chickens (and sometimes pigs) and maintained a small plot of land. Animals were slaughtered in the late autumn, and salted or smoked meat was consumed in the winter. At all levels of society the Church requirement that fish be eaten on Fridays was observed; for those living at any significant distance from the sea, salt rather than fresh fish was usually the only option. Neither potatoes nor tomatoes were yet a part of the English diet, and green vegetables do not seem to have figured very prominently in most people's diet; fruit was common, however.

Many remarked on the liberal consumption of beer and ale throughout the sixteenth century and into the seventeenth, and clearly women as well as men were known to frequent taverns. Indeed, if the catalogue of tavern types in John Skelton's account of "The Tunning of Elynour Rumming" (with its account of "wenches unlaced" and "housewives unbraced") is to be believed even in part, that was far from a rare occurrence. As the early seventeenth-century watercolor reproduced below illustrates, wine was often the preferred drink of the better-off classes of society. Beginning in the late 1560s the smoking of tobacco—described below by William Harrison—also became common. By the early 1600s there was also a strong reaction against the "stinking smoke" of tobacco—expressed most powerfully in James I's A Counterblast to Tobacco.

from An Anonymous Venetian Official Traveling in England, A Relation, or Rather a True Account, of the Island of England (1497)

The English are, for the most part, both men and women of all ages, handsome and well-proportioned; though not quite so much so, in my opinion, as it had been asserted to me, before your magnificence went to that kingdom; and I have understood from persons acquainted with these countries, that the Scotch are much handsomer; and that the English are great lovers of themselves, and of everything belonging to them; they think that there are no other men than themselves, and no other world but England; and whenever they see a handsome foreigner, they say that "he looks like an Englishman," and that "it is a great pity that he should not be an Englishman"; and when they partake of any delicacy with a foreigner, they ask him, "whether such a thing is made in their country?" They take great pleasure in having a quantity of excellent victuals, and also in remaining a long time at table, being very sparing of wine when they drink it at their own expense. And this, it is said, they do in order to induce their other English guests to drink wine in moderation also; not considering it any inconvenience for three or four persons to drink out of the same cup. Few people keep wine in their own houses, but buy it, for the most part, at a tavern; and when they mean to drink a great deal, they go to the tavern, and this is done not only by the men, but by ladies of distinction. The deficiency of wine, however, is amply supplied by the abundance of ale and beer, to the use of which these people are become so habituated, that, at an entertainment where there is plenty of wine, they will drink them in preference to it, and in great quantities.

from Fynes Moryson, Itinerary (1617)

England abounds in cattle of all kinds, and particularly hath very great oxen, the flesh whereof is so tender, as no meat is more desired ... The flesh of hogs and swine is more savoury than in any other parts, excepting the bacon of Westphalia. ... English husbandmen eat barley and rye brown bread, and prefer it to white bread as abiding longer in the stomach, and not so soon digested with their labour. ...

The Italian Sansovino is much deceived, writing, that in general the English eat and cover the table at least four times in the day; for howsoever those that journey and some sickly men staying at home may perhaps take a small breakfast, yet in general the English eat but two meals (of dinner and supper) each day. And I profess for myself and other Englishmen, passing through Italy so famous for temperance, that we often observed, that, howsoever we might have a pullet and some flesh¹ prepared for us, eating it with a moderate proportion of bread, the Italians at the same time, with a charger² full of herbs for a salad, and with roots,³ like meats of small price, would each of them eat two or three penny-worth of bread. And since all fulness is ill, and that of bread worst, I think we were more temperate in our diet, though eating more flesh, than they eating so much more bread than we did. ...

I observed a custom in all those Italian cities and towns through which I passed that is not used in any other country that I saw in my travels, neither do I think that any other nation in Christendom use it, but only Italy. The Italians ... do always at their meals use a little fork when they cut their meat. ... The reason for this grammar until well into the nineteenth century.) Boys from well-off families aged five to seven attended a Petty (from the French “petit,” or small) School; they then attended a grammar school from ages seven through fourteen; only a few would follow on to one of the seven universities founded by 1600 (two in England, four in Scotland, and one in Ireland). Boys (and often girls) of noble birth were educated by a tutor at home; girls of other social classes were generally not provided with any formal education. Male children of laborers and poor townsfolk were also effectively denied an education for, although schools were officially open to all boys, in practice the fees that were charged (often a pound or more per year, even in the mid-sixteenth century) put education out of reach of those of modest means.

Attributed to John de Critz, Henry Wriothesley, Third Earl of Southampton, 1603. Though the identity of the "fair youth" in Shakespeare's sonnets—if he was a real individual—is not known, one candidate frequently put forward by scholars is Henry Wriothesley. Both of Shakespeare's long poems, Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece, are dedicated to Wriothesley; some scholars suspect that he is also the secret dedicatee of the sonnets' first edition, which describes "Mr. W.H." (perhaps a reversal of "H.W.") as "the only begetter" of the poems.

In this portrait, Wriothesley is shown in the Tower of London, where he was imprisoned for participating in a failed rebellion against the queen in 1601. The rebellion's instigator, Wriothesley's friend the Earl of Essex, was executed, but Wriothesley received a life sentence, and was pardoned after Elizabeth's death. This portrait was commissioned soon after he left prison; on the right hand side, beneath a small picture of the Tower of London, the date of his release appears with the phrase "In Vinculis, Invictus" (Latin: "in chains, unconquered"). Wriothesley is shown wearing a sling—an indication of the impact imprisonment had on his health—and he has removed a glove to reveal slender fingers and gold ring, both signifiers of wealth. It is not clear whether the cat next to him has a symbolic as well as a literal significance; according to tradition it is Wriothesley's favorite pet, who lived with him in the Tower.

The Supernatural and the Miraculous

The supernatural was the subject of ongoing controversy in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Belief in astrology, in witchcraft, and in a wide range of supernatural or miraculous occurrences was widespread throughout society. Though repeated efforts were made by writers such as Joseph Hall to associate such “superstitions”¹ with the uneducated or simple of mind, Elizabeth I is known to have had her own astrologer, and (as the account below records) James I regarded witchcraft with the utmost seriousness. The writings on witchcraft of George Gifford, from which an excerpt appears below, give an almost anthropological analysis of how allegations of witchcraft took root and grew in a community.

¹ superstitions The word “superstition” first appeared in the fifteenth century, and it gained wide currency in the sixteenth; Richard Hooker in his Ecclesiastical Polity, 1597 defines it thus: “superstition is, when things are either abhorred or observed, with a zealous or fearful, but erroneous relation to God.” As time went on the term started to be less and less frequently applied to perceived Christian heresies, and to become reserved more and more for denoting (and ridiculing) supernatural beliefs outside of a Christian context.

from Reginald Scot, The Discovery of Witchcraft (1584)

Who they be that are called witches, with a manifest declaration of the cause that moveth men so commonly to think, and witches themselves to believe that they can hurt children, cattle, &c. with words and imaginations: and of cozening witches.

One sort of such as are said to be witches, are women which be commonly old, lame, blear-eyed, pale, foul, and full of wrinkles; poor, and sullen, superstitious, and papists; or such as know no religion: in whose drowsy minds the devil hath gotten a fine seat; so as, what mischief, mischance, calamity, or slaughter is brought to pass, they are easily persuaded the same is done by themselves; imprinting in their minds an earnest and constant imagination hereof. They are lean and deformed, showing melancholy in their faces, to the horror of all that see them. They are doting, scolds, mad, devilish; and not much differing from them that are thought to be possessed with spirits; so firm and steadfast in their opinions, as whosoever shall only have respect to the constancy of their words uttered, would easily believe they were true indeed.

These miserable wretches are so odious unto all their neighbors, and so feared, as few dare offend them, or deny them any thing they ask: whereby they take upon them; yea, and sometimes think, that they can do such things as are beyond the ability of human nature. These go from house to house, and from door to door for a pot full of milk, yeast, drink, pottage, or some such relief; without the which they could hardly live: neither obtaining for their service and pains, nor by their art, nor yet at the devil's hands (with whom they are said to make a perfect and visible bargain) either beauty, money, promotion, wealth, worship, pleasure, honor, knowledge, learning, or any other benefit whatsoever.

from George Gifford, A Discourse of the Subtle Practices of Devils by Witches and Sorcerers (1587)

In a later text, A Dialogue Concerning Witches and Witchcraft (1593), Gifford summarized the purpose of the work from which the following excerpt is taken: "certain years now past ... I published a small Treatise concerning witches, to lay open some of Satan's sleights, and subtle practices, lest the ignoranter sort should be carried awry and seduced more and more by them."

Some woman doth fall out bitterly with her Neighbour: there followeth some great hurt, either that God hath permitted the devil to vex him: or otherwise. There is a suspicion conceived. Within few years after she is in some jar with an other. He is also plagued. This is noted of all. Great fame is spread of the matter. Mother W. is a witch. She hath bewitched goodman B. Two hogs which died strangely: or else he is taken lame. Well, mother W. doth begin to be very odious and terrible unto many. Her neighbours dare say nothing but yet in their hearts they wish she were hanged. Shortly after another falleth sick and doth pine, he can have no stomach unto his meat, now he can not sleep. The neighbours come to visit him. "Well, neighbour," sayeth one, "do ye not suspect some naughty dealing: did ye never anger mother W.?" "Truly neighbour" (sayth he), "I have not liked the woman a long time. I can not tell how I should displease her, unless it were this other day, my wife prayed her, and so did I, that she would keep her hens out of my garden. We spake her as fair as we could for our lives. I think verily she hath bewitched me." Every body sayeth now that mother W. is a witch in deed, and hath bewitched the good man E. He cannot eat his meat. It is out of all doubt: for there were (those) which saw a weasel run from her house-ward into his yard even a little before he fell sick. The sick man dieth, and taketh it upon his death that he is bewitched: then is mother W. apprehended, and sent to prison.

from Joseph Hall, Characters of Virtues and Vices (1608)

Joseph Hall (1574–1656) was a moral philosopher well known for his attempts to reconcile the ideas of the ancient Stoics with those of Christianity. In later life he was appointed Bishop of Exeter (in 1627) and became heavily embroiled in the conflicts between Anglican and Puritan factions.

Superstition is godless religion, devout impiety. The Superstitious is fond in observation, servile in fear; he worships God but as he lists; he gives God what he asks not, more than he asks, and all but what he should give, and makes more sins than the Ten Commandments. This man dares not stir forth till his breast be crossed and his face sprinkled. If but an hare cross him the way, he returns; or if his journey began, unawares, on the dismal day; or, if he stumbled at the threshold. If he see a snake unkilld, he fears a mischief; if the salt fall towards him, he looks pale and red, and is not quiet till one of the waiters have poured wine on his lap; and when he sneezeth, thinks them not his friends that uncover not. In the morning, he listens whether the crow crieth even or odd, and by that token presages of the weather. If he hear but a raven croak from the next roof, he makes his will; or if a bittour¹ fly over his head by night: but if his troubled fancy shall second his thoughts with the dream of a fair garden, or green rushes, or the salutation of a dead friend, he takes leave of the world, and says he cannot live. He will never set to sea but on a Sunday. ... When he lies sick on his deathbed, no sin troubles him so much, as that he did once eat flesh on a Friday: no repentance can expiate that; the rest need none. There is no dream of his without an interpretation, without a prediction; and if the event answer not his exposition, he expounds it according to the event. ... Old wives and stars are his counsellors: his nightspell is his guard; and charms, his physicians. ... This man is strangely credulous, and calls impossible things miraculous: if he hear that some sacred block speaks, moves, weeps, smiles, his bare feet carry him thither with an offering; and if a danger miss him in the way, his saint hath the thanks. Some ways he will not go, and some he dares not; either there are bugs, or he feigneth them; every lantern is a ghost, and every noise is of chains. He knows not why, but his custom is to go a little about, and to leave the cross still on the right hand. One event is enough to make a rule: out of these rules he concludes fashions, proper to himself; and nothing can turn him out of his own course.

from Sir John Harington, "Account of an Audience with King James I" (1604), as recorded in Nugae Antiquae

Soon upon this, the Prince his Highness did enter, and in much good humour asked if I was "cousin to Lord Harrington of Exton?" I humbly replied [that] His Majesty did me some honour in enquiring my kin to one whom he had so late honoured and made a baron; and moreover did add, "we were both branches of the same tree." Then he enquired much of learning, and showed me his own in such sort, as made me remember my examiner at Cambridge aforetime. He sought much to know my advances in philosophy, and uttered profound sentences of Aristotle, and such like writers, which I had never read, and which some are bold enough to say, others do not understand: but this I must pass by. The Prince did now press my reading to him part of a canto in Ariosto; praised my utterance, and said he had been informed of many, as to my learning, in the time of the Queen. He asked me what I thought pure wit was made of; and whom it did best become? Whether a King should not be the best clerk in his own country; and, if this land did not entertain good opinion of his learning and wisdom. His Majesty did much press for my opinion touching the power of Satan in matter of witchcraft; and asked me, with much gravity, if I did "truly understand, why the devil did work more with ancient women than others."

More serious discourse did next ensue, wherein I wanted room to continue, and sometime room to escape; for the Queen was not forgotten, nor Davison² neither. His Highness told me her death was visible in Scotland before it did really happen, being, as he said, "spoken of in secret by those whose power of sight presented to them a bloody head dancing in the air." He then did remark much on this gift, and said he had sought out of certain books a sure way to attain knowledge of future chances. Hereat, he named many books, which I did not know, nor by whom written; but advised me not to consult some authors which would lead me to evil consultations. I told his Majesty, "the power of Satan had, I much feared, damaged my bodily frame; but I had not farther will to court his friendship, for my soul's hurt." We next discoursed somewhat on religion, when at length he said: "Now, Sir, you have seen my wisdom in some sort, and I have pried into yours. I pray you, do me justice in your report, and in good season, I will not fail to add to your understanding, in such points as I may find you lack amendment." I made courtesy hereat, and withdrew down the passage, and out at the gate, amidst the many varlets and lordly servants who stood around.

Anonymous Broadsheet, "The Form and Shape of a Monstrous Child Born at Maidstone in Kent, the 24th of October, 1568"

At Maidstone in Kent there was one Margaret Mere, daughter to Richard Mere of the said town of Maidstone, who being unmarried, played the naughty pack,¹ and was gotten with child, being delivered of the same child the 24th day of October last past, in the year of our Lord 1568 at seven of the clock in the afternoon of the same day, being Sunday. Which child, being a man child, had first the mouth slitted on the right side like a leopard's mouth, terrible to behold, the left arm lying upon the breast, fast thereto joined, having as it were stumps on the hands, the left leg growing upward toward the head, and the right leg bending toward the left leg, the foot thereof growing into the buttock of the said left leg. In the midst of the back there was a broad lump of flesh in fashion like a rose, in the midst whereof was a hole, which voided like an issue. This said child was born alive, and lived 24 hours, and then departed this life. Which may be a terror as well to all such workers of filthiness and iniquity, as to those ungodly livers. Who (if in them any fear of God be) may move them to repentance and amendment of life. Which God for Christ's sake grant both to them and us. Amen.

Witnesses hereof were these: William Plomer, John Squier Glasier, John Sadler Goldsmith, beside diverse other credible persons both men and women.

Crime

In the late sixteenth century many publications offered accounts of crimes. Some, such as Robert Greene's Notable Discovery of Coosenage, Now Daily Practised by Sundry lewd persons, called Connie-Catchers, and Cross-Biters (1593) aimed to warn the populace of the methods adopted by petty crooks and confidence tricksters. Others provided lurid accounts of violent crime. As the excerpt below from the pamphlet describing the murder of Richard Hobson illustrates, these were often colored with religious or political bias.

With the temporary closing of the theaters in 1603 due to the plague, the playwright Thomas Dekker turned to writing pamphlets. In The Belman of London he promised to the reader that he would “bring to light a number of more notable enormities (daily hatched in this Realm) than ever have yet been published to the open eye of the world.”

from “A True Report of the Late Horrible Murder Committed by William Sherwood, upon Richard Hobson, Gentleman, both Prisoners in the Queen’s Bench, for the profession of Popery, the 18th of June, 1581”

I am the more loath at this time, to lay open unto the view of the whole world that late foul murder committed by Sherwood, because I would not speak much of them which be gone, and be thought to bite them by the back which are dead, and so be like unto those papists which being hot in cruelty did not only curse the dead continually, but did take up and burn the bones of diverse good men into ashes, to signify unto the world that no drink could cool their thirst but blood, no sacrifice could content them but the warm heart blood of martyrs and the death of the saints of God. But my intent is this: for as much as their scabs now break out, and that their cruelty seeketh no corners² but setteth itself upon a stage to be beheld of all men, to give all good Christians warning that as they shall hear of their naughtiness,³ and see it so, they will learn to spew them out of their stomachs forever. ...

But to be brief: the day grew on, which was the 28th of June about 8 of the clock in the morning, at which time he had determined to murder his fellow papist, and that the matter might more easy be brought to pass, he caused the night before the keeper to remove all Hobson’s weapons, so that the next morning, as Hobson was coming down through Sherwood’s chamber, from his prayers, Sherwood shutting his chamber door, assailed him with a knife, and a stool trestle, astonishing him, afterwards gave him a large wound, keeping him down and struggling till he bled to death, Hobson often crying, “Help, Father Throckmorton, he killeth me with his knife!” Master Throckmorton and others, hearing this noise, came upon Sherwood and by force broke up his doors, found the young man all to befouled in his own blood, and gasping for breath: who after a few faint words, yielded his soul into the hands of God. Sherwood perceived a great many busy about Hobson, began to practice to escape, but by heed taking of one Master Smith’s man, he was brought to the marshal’s hands, and imbrued in his fellow’s blood: who being examined, he denied that manifest murder, which by witness was proved, and he being brought to the slain body, the blood which was settled, issued out afresh. Thus he slew this young man, in deed and cause miserably, in form and fashion cruelly and beastly.

Let us advisedly now weigh and consider what manner of razor this is that cutteth so sharp: if they be

² corners I.e., places to hide.

³ naughtiness Wickedness, evil.

thus unable to master their passions, and thus like bloodsuckers do open them against their own fellow prisoners, what shall we look for at their hands? ...

Print and Manuscript Culture

Mechanical print technology originated in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century and the printing press was introduced to the British Isles by William Caxton in 1476. Despite their relative convenience and affordability, however, printed books did not altogether replace handwritten manuscripts, which coexisted alongside print as an important medium of publication throughout the early modern period. The illustrations that follow give some sense of the range of print and manuscript culture in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries beyond what is presented elsewhere in this anthology.¹

from Jan van der Straet, Nova Reperta. This engraving by a Flemish artist of a printing shop was one of a series published in Antwerp in the 1580s; no comparable illustration of the technology of printing from Elizabethan England is known.

There begynneth a newe tracte of treatise moost pfecte for all husbande men and very frutefull for all other perones to reade newly corrected & amended by the auctour with dyuerse other thynges added therunto.

Title page, attributed to Anthony Fitzherbert, The Book of Husbandry, c. 1523.

In 1598 the eleventh edition of this work was published; it appears to have been one of the most popular books of the age. In all probability the primary audience for the work was the yeoman farmer; laborers were in most cases illiterate. The book offers advice on such matters as whether to plough with horses or oxen, how to sow oats or barley, how to make simple farm implements, and how to care for animals, including how to treat their diseases. Advice on highway repair is also included; throughout the sixteenth century husbandmen were required to devote several days per year to road work in their area. Gender roles were strictly differentiated; women are advised to clean the house, feed the animals, prepare meals, and make butter and cheese. In only a few areas are the roles allowed to overlap; the wife is advised to go to market if her husband is unable to do so, and to assist him in filling “the muck wain or dung cart.” Each spouse is advised to provide an honest account to the other of money spent.

 But now receaue by your industrye and art,
 Your humble seruant Henry Stuart.

Calligraphy was regarded as a valued art throughout the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. This example is of a poem ascribed to Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley (second husband of Mary, Queen of Scots), and commonly thought to have been written around 1562, during his courtship of her. The poem is from the Devonshire Manuscript, a verse miscellany. Such collections, which were common in the sixteenth and especially seventeenth centuries, brought together full poems and selected passages from a wide range of poetic genres, either copied from other sources or composed for the miscellany. Though many miscellanies were created in handwritten form, some were mass printed.

Among the earliest known calligraphy books in English is An Alphabet of Ornamental Capitals by John Scottowe (1592). The book presents each letter of the alphabet in an elaborate design often incorporating fantastical creatures, geometric patterns, plants, or human forms. Each capital letter begins a brief proverb or other text in English or Latin. This page, beginning with an ornamental letter "I," reads "In moſte humble and lamentable manner ſhe withe and complaynith."

William Browne (1591–1643) wrote this elegy for Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke (1561–1621). An accomplished poet and a prominent literary patron, Mary (as the poem notes) was also the sister of Sir Philip Sidney and mother to William Herbert, third Earl of Pembroke. Written when the Countess died, Browne's elegy did not appear in print until the later seventeenth century. In manuscript, however, it was one of the most widely circulated poems of the 1620s and 1630s, copied into scores of manuscript miscellanies. This copy appears on a blank leaf at the front of a 1627 copy of Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia: the placement ensures that the elegy is the first text the reader encounters on opening the cover. Since the book was officially titled The Countesse of Pembrokes Arcadia (Sidney claims to have written the book for his sister), this manuscript elegy turns the book the reader is holding into a monument to the Countess on which the elegy is inscribed. (Reproduced with permission of the Centre for Reformation and Renaissance Studies, Victoria University in the University of Toronto.)

These three poems about Sir Philip Sidney (1554–86) were copied onto a blank page of a 1627 copy of his Arcadia (the reverse of the blank on which William Browne's elegy on Mary Sidney, above, was copied). The two Latin elegies are by John Owen (1563/4–1622?) and are copied from a printed edition of his works—an illustration of the fact that the traffic between print and manuscript texts moved in both directions. The English elegy derives from a French poem by Joachim du Bellay on a French statesman. The English version, with Sidney as its subject, first appeared as an anonymous manuscript posted in St. Paul's Cathedral and was noted down or reworked by several writers, including Sir Walter Raleigh. Some versions appeared in print; others circulated only in manuscript, with writers and copyists often revising or introducing changes to the text, a characteristic feature of manuscript culture. This version does not match those that appeared in print, and apparently derives from the context of manuscript circulation. Emblems

A popular genre in sixteenth- and especially seventeenth-century Europe, emblems typically combine visual imagery with the written word in an allegorical expression of a complex idea. Most consist of three parts: an introductory title or motto, sometimes called the “inscriptio”; an image, sometimes called the “pictura”; and an accompanying text sometimes called the “subscriptio” or “epigram,” written in prose or poetry and varying in length. In addition to appearing in print collections known as “emblem books,” emblems graced both public and private architectural spaces, and decorated objects such as furniture, tapestries, silverware, and clothing. Ranging in subject matter from religion to philosophy to politics, they were appreciated by audiences of all classes; while highly educated readers enjoyed the emblems’ classical and contemporary allusions, less literate viewers were offered a visual mystery to solve.

The genre is thought to have developed from a variety of literary and artistic forms, including Greek epigrams, medieval heraldry, and biblical imagery. Emblematum Liber, the first emblem book, was published in 1531; it combined text written in Latin by an Italian lawyer, Andrea Alciato, with images chosen by the book’s German publisher. Over the next two centuries, it is estimated that more than six thousand different emblem books were printed throughout Europe. English emblems were strongly influenced by Continental emblem traditions; while emblem books in Latin and other languages circulated in Britain, many of the most popular English collections offered translations of emblems from elsewhere.

The process of creating an emblem was collaborative: usually a writer composed the text, then an illustrator designed the image, sometimes with direction from the publisher or the writer. Individual components of emblems—especially images, but sometimes epigrams or mottoes—were often reused from other works, so that the creative achievement lay in devising an original application for the allegorical parts. Each symbol used in an emblem might hold a range of different meanings dependant on context, so the particular significance of a given element could change when it was reinterpreted in a new whole.

from Geoffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems (1586)

Geoffrey Whitney’s A Choice of Emblems and Other Devices (1586) is considered one of the earliest and most influential English emblem books. For the most part, Whitney’s collection is made up of images and mottos selected from previously published Continental books, accompanied by new English epigrams. While the collection depicts exemplary leaders from history and mythology, many emblems reference or are addressed to contemporary figures, including Elizabeth I and Whitney’s patron, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester.

End

The above emblem, the first in Whitney's collection, employs a motto and image that first appeared in French author Claude Paradin's Devises heroïques (1557) with an epigram referencing Charles de Lorraine, an influential French cardinal. The image depicts a spire—an architectural feature commonly associated with religious buildings but also reminiscent of classical obelisks—mounted on a plinth, a stable base often used to support monuments and other civic structures. Ivy, which surrounds the spire, could suggest many different meanings for early modern audiences, such as faithfulness and everlasting life.

As Whitney wrote his Choice of Emblems, the English military was preparing to advance into the largely Protestant Dutch lowlands in the hopes of preventing Spain, a Catholic nation, from taking the territory; the book is commonly interpreted as an expression of patriotism in favor of this cause. The new text Whitney adds to this emblem reinterprets it as a tribute to Queen Elizabeth's leadership and the Protestant Church thriving under her rule. The violent conflict of the past, Mary I's persecution of Protestants, has given way to a stable present overseen by her successor, in which church and state together reach confidently higher. The motto and epigram read as follows:

*Te stante, virebo*¹

A mighty spire, whose top doth pierce the sky,
An ivy green embraceth round about,
And while it stands, the same doth bloom on high,
But when it shrinks, the ivy stands in doubt:

The pillar great, our gracious Princess² is:

The branch, the Church: who speaks unto her this.

I, that of late with storms was almost spent,
And bruised sore with Tyrant's bloody blows,
Whom fire, and sword, with persecution rents,
Am now set free, and overlook my foes

And whiles thou reignst, oh most renowned Queen
By thy support my blossom shall be green.

¹ Te stante, virebo Latin: With you standing, I will flourish.

² Princess Female ruler, in this case referring to Elizabeth I.

Veritas temporis filia.

THREE furies fell, which turne the worlde to ruth,
 Both Enuie, Strife, and Slaunder, heere appeare,
 In dungeon darke they longe inclosed truthe,
 But Time at lengthe, did loose his daughter deare,
 And sett alofte, that sacred ladie brighte,
 Whoe things longe hidd, reueales, and bringes to lighte.

Though strife make fier, though Enuie eate hir harte,
 The innocent though Slaunder rente, and spoile:
 Yet Time will come, and take this ladies parte,
 And breake her bandes, and bring her foes to foile.
 Despaire not then, though truth be hidden oft,
 Bycause at lengthe, shee shall bee sett alofte.

Disfidia

In this emblem, a winged, scythe-wielding Father Time pulls his daughter Truth from the cave in which Slander, Envy, and Strife have imprisoned her, showing that although lies may seem to bury the truth, Truth will eventually emerge into the light where all can see her. That time would bring more scientific and historical truth into view was the hope of such figures as Francis Bacon, but for the most part the suppression of truth by slander (not yet distinguished from libel) was a major concern in late sixteenth-century English law and culture; a person accused of slandering important figures, a crime called "scandalum magnatum," could be hauled before the royal "Star Chamber" and, if condemned, executed.

Slander figures in a number of Renaissance poems, including Spenser's Faerie Queene, in which "Sclaunder" appears as a character. It also occurs in many Renaissance plays; Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing and The Winter's Tale, most notably, stage the effect of suspicion and lies on young women who are concealed and then, like Truth, emerge to rejoin their families. Much Ado's Hero is supposedly buried in a tomb, recalling Truth in Whitney's emblem, while Winter's Tale's flower-loving Perdita ("Lost") is restored to her slandered mother after Time himself explains to us that years have passed. This archetype of the maiden restored is also reflected in the classical myth of Persephone, whose annual return from Hades brings about the arrival of spring.

A transcription of Whitney's motto and epigram is below.

*Veritas temporis filia*¹

Three furies fell, which turn the world to ruth,
 Both Envy, Strife, and Slander, here appear,
 In dungeon dark they long enclosed truth,
 But Time at length, did loose his daughter dear,
 And sets aloft, that sacred lady bright,
 Who things long hid, reveals, and brings to light.

Though strife make fire, though Envy eat her heart,
 The innocent though Slander rend, and spoil:
 Yet Time will come, and take his lady's part,
 And break her bonds, and bring her foes to foil.

Despair not then, though truth be hidden oft,
 Because at length, she shall be set aloft.

¹ Veritas temporis filia Latin: Truth is the daughter of time.

AEMILIA LANYER

1569 – 1645

Aemilia Lanyer published her one book of poetry at a time when it was unusual for an English woman to publish her writing, especially under her full name. It was even more unusual for a middle-class woman to approach publication as a means of making money; to choose herself female patrons; and to make carefully planned use of poems addressed to them in order to raise the status of her work. Lanyer did all of these things.

Because Lanyer was not born into the nobility, many of the details of her personal life are sketchy, cobbled together from court and church records, information gleaned from her poems, and the professional journals of Simon Forman, an astrologer whom she consulted in 1597. She was born to Baptista Bassano and Margaret Johnson, a couple in a common-law marriage, in January 1569. Her father was an Italian musician in the courts of Edward VI and Elizabeth I, so although Aemilia Bassano was not of noble birth, she had access to aristocratic circles and was probably educated along with the young ladies of the court, likely in classical literature and rhetoric.

At age 18, Aemilia Bassano became the mistress of Henry Carey, Lord Hunsdon, who was then serving as Lord Chamberlain to Queen Elizabeth. The affair continued for five years, until she became pregnant. To avoid embarrassment, Carey married her off to another court musician, Alfonso Lanyer, on 18 October 1592, and provided her with an annual stipend of £40. Lanyer bore a son in early 1593, and named him Henry. Lanyer's marriage to Alfonso was not happy: according to Simon Forman's journals, "her husband hath dealt hardly with her and spent and consumed her goods and she is now ... in debt." The couple had one child together in December 1598, named Odillya, who died at the age of ten months.

Despite her domestic situation, Lanyer maintained her connection with aristocratic families, particularly with a circle of intellectual court women, to whom she later dedicated many poems. Some time before 1609, she stayed with Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland, and her daughter Anne at the estate where they were then living, Cookham Dean. The visit influenced Lanyer profoundly, as she relates in "The Description of Cooke-ham," the first "country house" poem published in English. While at Cookham Dean, she says, she experienced a spiritual awakening, inspired by the piety of the countess.

In 1611, at age 42, she published her volume of verse, Salve Deus Rex Judæorum (Hail, God, King of the Jews). Although the book focuses on virtue and religion, topics considered appropriate for a woman, it is nevertheless a radical (although not unprecedented) work for its time. Among its topics is the traditional and misogynistic maltreatment of women. The title poem, a lively narrative of the passion of Christ, interrupts its story once to argue that Eve, and, by extension, womankind, have been unjustly made to bear the chief responsibility for eating the fruit of the forbidden tree: that sin pales in comparison to the sin of the men who deliberately sentenced Christ to death. She commends the intervention of Pilate's wife and contrasts the behavior of Christ's male disciples, who forsook or denied him, with that of the women who stayed with him to the end.

After her husband died in 1613, Lanyer founded a school for the children of nobility and other wealthy families as a means of supporting herself. The only details concerning the remainder of her life come from court records, which indicate that she had considerable legal troubles, first concerning her school, then regarding the estate of her son, Henry, who died in October 1633. Lanyer died at age 76, and was buried 3 April 1645, at St. James Church, Clerkenwell.

Oftē have I heard that it is the property² of some women not only to emulate the virtues and perfections of the rest, but also by all their powers of ill-speaking to eclipse the brightness of their deserved fame; now contrary to this custom, which men I hope unjustly lay to their charge, I have written this small volume or little book, for the general use of all virtuous ladies and gentlewomen of this kingdom; and in commendation of some particular persons of our own sex, such as for the most part are so well known to myself and others, that I dare undertake fame dares not to call any better. And this have I done to make known to the world that all women deserve not to be blamed, though some forgetting they are women themselves, and in danger to be condemned by the words of their own mouths, fall into so great an error, as to speak unadvisedly against the rest of their sex; which if it be true, I am persuaded they can show their own imperfection in nothing more; and therefore could wish (for their own ease, modesties and credit) they would refer such points of folly to be practised by evil-disposed men, who forgetting they were born of women, nourished of women, and that if it were not by the means of women, they would be quite extinguished out of the world, and a final end of them all, do like vipers deface the wombs wherein they were bred,³ only to give way and utterance to their want of discretion and goodness. Such as these, were they that dishonoured Christ, his apostles and prophets, putting them to shameful deaths. Therefore we are not to regard any imputations, that they undeservedly lay upon us, no otherwise than to make use of them to our own benefits, as spurs to virtue, making us fly all occasions that may colour their unjust speeches to pass current.⁴ Especially considering that they have tempted even the patience of God himself, who gave power to wise and virtuous women to bring down their pride and arrogance. As was cruel Cesarius by the discreet counsel of noble

Deborah,⁵ judge and prophetess of Israel, and resolution of Jael,⁶ wife of Heber the Kenite; wicked Haman, by the divine prayers and prudent proceedings of beautiful Hester;⁷ blasphemous Holofernes, by the invincible courage, rare wisdom, and confident carriage of Judith;⁸ and the unjust judges, by the innocence of chaste Susanna;⁹ with infinite others, which for brevity's sake I will omit. As also in respect it pleased our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, without the assistance of man, being free from original and all other sins, from the time of his conception till the hour of his death, to be begotten of a woman, born of a woman, nourished of a woman, obedient to a woman; and that he healed women, pardoned women, comforted women, yea, even when he was in his greatest agony and bloody sweat, going to be crucified, and also in the last hour of his death, took care to dispose of a woman; after his resurrection, appeared first to a woman, sent a woman to declare his most glorious resurrection to the rest of his disciples. Many other examples I could allege of diverse faithful and virtuous women, who have in all ages not only been confessors, but also endured most cruel martyrdom for their faith in Jesus Christ. All which is sufficient to enforce all good Christians and honourable-minded men to speak reverently of our sex, and especially of all virtuous and good women. To the modest censures of both which I refer these my imperfect endeavours, knowing that according to their own excellent dispositions they will rather cherish, nourish, and increase the least spark of virtue where they find it, by their favourable and best interpretations, than quench it by wrong constructions. To whom I wish with all increase of virtue, and desire their best opinions.

² property Habit.

³ vipers . . . bred It was thought that at birth the viper's young bit through the sides of the mother in order to be born, killing her.

⁴ pass current Seem legitimate.

⁵ Deborah Ruler of Israel who defeated the army of Sisera (Cesarius), a Canaanite general (see Judges 4).

⁶ Jael Woman who killed Sisera by driving a tent peg through his head (see Judges 4).

⁷ Hester Jewish queen (also called Esther) who saved the Jews from a genocidal plot concocted by Haman by appealing to Xerxes, King of Persia (see Esther 3–7).

⁸ Judith Woman who killed the Babylonian general Holofernes by cutting off his head (see Judith 8–12).

⁹ Susanna Woman who resisted the advances of two judges, who then unjustly charged her with adultery (see Daniel and Susanna 13).

“Eve’s Apology in Defense of Women”

745 Now Pontius Pilate⁴ is to judge the cause
 Of faultless Jesus, who before him stands,
 Who neither hath offended prince, nor laws,
 Although he now be brought in woeful bands.
 O noble governor, make thou yet a pause,
 750 Do not in innocent blood inbrue° thy hands;⁵ defile
 But hear the words of thy most worthy wife,
 Who sends to thee, to beg her Savior’s life.⁶

¹ Salve Deus Rex Judæorum The complete text of Lanyer’s book is available on the website component of this anthology.

² Cynthia Goddess of the moon, often identified with Queen Elizabeth I, who died in 1603.

³ Countess Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland (1560–1616), Lanyer’s patroness.

⁴ Pontius Pilate Roman governor of Judea, who presided over the trial of Jesus (see Matthew 27.11–26).

⁵ Do ... hands Reference to Matthew 27.24, in which Pilate washes his hands to demonstrate that he does not consider himself responsible for what happens to Jesus.

⁶ hear ... life Pilate received a message from his wife, urging him not to convict Jesus (see Matthew 27.19).

Let barb’rous cruelty far depart from thee,
 And in true justice take affliction’s part;
 755 Open thine eyes, that thou the truth may’st see.
 Do not the thing that goes against thy heart,
 Condemn not him that must thy Savior be;
 But view his holy life, his good desert.° merit
 Let not us women glory in men’s fall.⁷
 760 Who had power given to overrule us all.

Till now your indiscretion sets us free.
 And makes our former fault much less appear;
 Our mother Eve, who tasted of the tree,⁸
 Giving to Adam what she held most dear,
 765 Was simply good, and had no power to see;
 The after-coming harm did not appear:
 The subtle serpent that our sex betrayed
 Before our fall so sure a plot had laid.

That undiscerning ignorance perceived
 770 No guile or craft that was by him intended;
 For had she known of what we were bereaved,⁹
 To his request she had not condescended.
 But she, poor soul, by cunning was deceived;
 No hurt therein her harmless heart intended:
 775 For she alleged° God’s word, which he¹⁰ denies, affirmed
 That they should die, but even as gods be wise.

But surely Adam cannot be excused;
 Her fault though great, yet he was most to blame;
 What weakness offered, strength might have refused,
 780 Being lord of all, the greater was his shame.
 Although the serpent’s craft had her abused,
 God’s holy word ought all his actions frame,° shape
 For he was lord and king of all the earth,
 Before poor Eve had either life or breath,

⁷ men’s fall Fall into a sin, by crucifying Christ, greater than Eve’s “original” sin.

⁸ Eve ... tree According to Genesis 3.6, Eve ate the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. She shared the fruit with Adam, and as a consequence the two were banished from the Garden of Eden.

⁹ bereaved Robbed (of eternal life).

¹⁰ he I.e., the serpent (see Genesis 3.4–5).

785 Who being framed^o by God's eternal hand formed
 The perfectest man that ever breathed on earth;
 And from God's mouth received that strait^o command,strict
 The breach whereof he knew was present death;
 Yea, having power to rule both sea and land,
 790 Yet with one apple won to lose that breath¹
 Which God had breathed in his beauteous face,
 Bringing us all in danger and disgrace.

And then to lay the fault on Patience' back,
 That we (poor women) must endure it all.
 795 We know right well he did discretion lack,
 Being not persuaded thereunto at all.
 If Eve did err, it was for knowledge sake;
 The fruit being fair persuaded him to fall:
 No subtle serpent's falsehood did betray him;
 800 If he would eat it, who had power to stay^o him? stop

Not Eve, whose fault was only too much love,
 Which made her give this present to her dear,
 That what she tasted he likewise might prove,^o experience
 Whereby his knowledge might become more clear;
 805 He never sought her weakness to reprove
 With those sharp words which he of God did hear;
 Yet men will boast of knowledge, which he took
 From Eve's fair hand, as from a learned book.

If any evil did in her remain,
 810 Being made of him,² he was the ground of all.
 If one of many worlds³ could lay a stain
 Upon our sex, and work so great a fall
 To wretched man by Satan's⁴ subtle train,
 What will so foul a fault amongst you all?
 815 Her weakness did the serpent's words obey,
 But you in malice God's dear Son betray,

Whom, if unjustly you condemn to die,
 Her sin was small to what you do commit;
 All mortal sins that do for vengeance cry
 820 Are not to be compared unto it.
 If many worlds would altogether try
 By all their sins the wrath of God to get,
 This sin of yours surmounts them all as far
 As doth the sun another little star.⁵

825 Then let us have our liberty again,
 And challenge^o to yourselves no sovereignty. attribute
 You came not in the world without our pain,
 Make that a bar against your cruelty;
 Your fault being greater, why should you disdain
 830 Our being your equals, free from tyranny?
 If one weak woman simply did offend,
 This sin of yours hath no excuse nor end,

To which, poor souls, we never gave consent.
 Witness, thy wife, O Pilate, speaks for all,
 835 Who did but dream, and yet a message sent
 That thou shouldest have nothing to do at all
 With that just man⁶ which, if thy heart relent,
 Why wilt thou be a reprobate⁷ with Saul⁸
 To seek the death of him that is so good,
 840 For thy soul's health to shed his dearest blood?

*The Description of Cooke-ham*⁹

Farewell (sweet Cooke-ham) where I first obtained
 Grace from that grace where perfect grace remained;
 And where the muses gave their full consent,
 I should have power the virtuous to content;

¹ breath God breathed life into Adam (see Genesis 2.7).

² made ... him According to Genesis 2.21–22, Eve was made from one of Adam's ribs.

³ many worlds As the first man, Adam was the father of all humans. Human beings were sometimes likened to individual worlds in the literature of the time.

⁴ Satan's Belonging to the serpent, traditionally identified with Satan.

⁵ sun ... star As the sun outshines the other stars in the sky, so the sin of killing Jesus is greater in magnitude. In earlier understandings of astronomy, the sun was thought to be much larger than the stars.

⁶ just man I.e., Jesus.

⁷ a reprobate Damned.

⁸ Saul King of Israel, who tried to kill David (see 1 Samuel 19.9–24).

⁹ Cooke-ham Cookham Dean, a country house in Berkshire, UK, leased by the brother of Lanyer's patroness, Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland.

5 Where princely palace willed me to indite° write
 The sacred story of the soul's delight.¹
 Farewell (sweet place) where virtue then did rest,
 And all delights did harbour in her breast;
 Never shall my sad eyes again behold
 10 Those pleasures which my thoughts did then unfold;
 Yet you (great lady) mistress of that place,²
 From whose desires did spring this work of grace,
 Vouchsafe° to think upon these pleasures past are prepared
 As fleeting, worldly joys that could not last,
 15 Or as dim shadows of celestial pleasures,
 Which are desired above all earthly treasures.
 Oh how (methought) against you thither came
 Each part did seem some new delight to frame!
 The house received all ornaments to grace it,
 20 And would endure no foulness to deface it.
 The walks put on their summer liveries,° uniforms
 And all things else did hold like similes:
 The trees with leaves, with fruits, with flowers clad,
 Embraced each other, seeming to be glad,
 25 Turning themselves to beauteous canopies
 To shade the bright sun from your brighter eyes;
 The crystal streams with silver spangles graced,
 While by the glorious sun they were embraced;
 The little birds in chirping notes did sing,
 30 To entertain both you and that sweet spring;
 And Philomela³ with her sundry lays,
 Both you and that delightful place did praise.
 Oh, how methought each plant, each flower, each tree
 Set forth their beauties then to welcome thee;
 35 The very hills right humbly did descend,
 When you to tread upon them did intend.
 And as you set your feet, they still did rise,
 Glad that they could receive so rich a prize.
 The gentle winds did take delight to be 40 Among those woods that were so graced by thee
 And in sad murmur uttered pleasing sound,
 That pleasure in that place might more abound;
 The swelling banks delivered all their pride,

¹ sacred... delight Salve Deus Rex Judeaeorum, to which this poem is appended.

² you ... place Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland (1560-1616).

³ Philomela Nightingale. In Greek mythology, Philomela was a woman who was changed into a nightingale.

When such a phoenix once they had espied.
 45 Each harbour, bank, each seat, each stately tree
 Thought themselves honoured in supporting thee.
 The pretty birds would oft come to attend thee,
 Yet fly away for fear they should offend thee;
 The little creatures in the burrow by 50 Would come abroad to sport them in your eye;⁴
 Yet fearful of the bow in your fair hand
 Would run away when you did make a stand.
 Now let me come unto that stately tree,
 Wherein such goodly prospects you did see;
 55 That oak that did in height his fellows pass,
 As much as lofty trees, low-growing grass;
 Much like a comely cedar, straight and tall,
 Whose beauteous stature far exceeded all;
 How often did you visit this fair tree,
 60 Which seeming joyful in receiving thee,
 Would like a palm tree spread his arms abroad,
 Desirous that you there should make abode;
 Whose fair green leaves much like a comely veil
 Defended Phoebus⁵ when he would assail;
 65 Whose pleasing boughs did lend a cool fresh air,
 Joying his happiness when you were there;
 Where being seated, you might plainly see
 Hills, vales and woods, as if on bended knee
 They had appeared, your honour to salute,
 70 Or to prefer° some strange unlooked-for suit;° proffer / request
 All interlaced with brooks and crystal springs,
 A prospect fit to please the eyes of kings;
 And thirteen shires appear all in your sight,
 Europe could not afford much more delight.
 75 What was there then but gave you all content,
 While you the time in meditation spent,
 Of their creator's power, which there you saw
 In all his creatures held a perfect law,
 And in their beauties did you plain descry° discern
 80 His beauty, wisdom, grace, love, majesty.
 In these sweet woods how often did you walk
 With Christ and his apostles there to talk;
 Placing his holy writ° in some fair tree, scripture
 To meditate what you therein did see;

⁴ sport ... eye Entertain you.

⁵ Phoebus Sun. "Phoebus" is an epithet for Apollo, Greek and Roman god of the sun.

85 With Moses you did mount his holy hill,¹
 To know his pleasure and perform his will.
 With lovely David you did often sing,
 His holy hymns to heaven's eternal king,²
 And in sweet music did your soul delight,
 90 To sound his praises, morning, noon and night.
 With blessed Joseph you did often feed
 Your pined brethren when they stood in need.³
 And that sweet lady sprung from Clifford's race,
 Of noble Bedford's blood, fair stem of grace,
 95 To honourable Dorset now espoused,⁴
 In whose fair breast true virtue then was housed;
 Oh, what delight did my weak spirits find
 In those pure parts of her well-framed mind;
 And yet it grieves me that I cannot be 100 Near unto her, whose virtues did agree
 With those fair ornaments of outward beauty,
 Which did enforce from all both love and duty.
 Unconstant fortune, thou art most to blame,
 Who casts us down into so low a frame,^o state
 105 Where our great friends we cannot daily see,
 So great a difference is there in degree.^o social status
 Many are placed in those orbs of state,
 Parters^o in honour, so ordained by fate, dividers
 Nearer in show, yet farther off in love,
 110 In which the lowest always are above.
 But whither am I carried in conceit?^o thought
 My wit too weak to conster^o of the great. understand
 Why not? although we are but born of earth,
 We may behold the heavens, despising death;
 115 And loving heaven that is so far above,
 May in the end vouchsafe^o us entire love. grant
 Therefore sweet memory, do thou retain
 Those pleasures past, which will not turn again;

¹ Moses ... hill In Exodus 24.9 Moses climbs Mount Sinai in order to see God.

² With ... king David was then supposed to be the author of most or all of Psalms, songs written in praise of God.

³ With ... need Reference to Genesis 42.25, in which Joseph, as governor of Egypt, provides his deceitful brothers with food in order to save them from starvation.

⁴ sweet lady ... espoused Margaret Clifford's daughter, Lady Anne Clifford (1589–1675), married Richard Sackville, Earl of Dorset (1589–1624). Lady Anne's maternal grandfather was Francis Russell, Earl of Bedford (1527–85).

Remember beauteous Dorset's⁵ summer sports,⁶
 120 So far from being touched by ill reports;
 Wherein myself did always bear a part,
 While reverend love presented my true heart;
 Those recreations let me bear in mind,
 Which her sweet youth and noble thoughts did find;
 125 Whereof deprived, I evermore must grieve,
 Hating blind fortune, careless to relieve.
 And you, sweet Cooke-ham, whom these ladies leave,
 I now must tell the grief you did conceive
 At their departure; when they went away,
 130 How everything retained a sad dismay;
 Nay long before, when once an inkling came,
 Methought each thing did unto sorrow frame;
 The trees that were so glorious in our view,
 Forsook both flowers and fruit, when once they knew 135 Of your depart, their very leaves did wither,
 Changing their colours as they grew together.
 But when they saw this had no power to stay you,
 They often wept, though speechless, could not pray you;
 Letting their tears in your fair bosoms fall,
 140 As if they said: "Why will ye leave us all?"
 This being vain, they cast their leaves away,
 Hoping that pity would have made you stay;
 Their frozen tops, like age's hoary hairs,
 Shows their disasters, languishing in fears;
 145 A swarthy rivelled rine⁷ all overspread
 Their dying bodies, half-alive, half-dead.
 But your occasions called you so away,
 That nothing there had power to make you stay;
 Yet did I see a noble, grateful mind,
 150 Requiting each according to their kind;
 Forgetting not to turn and take your leave
 Of these sad creatures, powerless to receive
 Your favour, when with grief you did depart,
 Placing their former pleasures in your heart;
 155 Giving great charge to noble memory,
 There to preserve their love continually;
 But specially the love of that fair tree,
 That first and last you did vouchsafe to see;
 In which it pleased you oft to take the air,

⁵ Dorset Lady Anne Clifford.

⁶ summer sports E.g., country dances and outdoor games.

⁷ rivelled rine Wrinkled bark.

160 With noble Dorset, then a virgin fair;
 Where many a learned book was read and scanned;
 To this fair tree, taking me by the hand,
 You did repeat the pleasures which had passed,
 Seeming to grieve they could no longer last.
 165 And with a chaste, yet loving kiss took leave,
 Of which sweet kiss I did it soon bereave;^o rob
 Scorning a senseless creature should possess
 So rare a favour, so great happiness.
 No other kiss it could receive from me,
 170 For fear to give back what it took of thee;
 So I, ungrateful creature, did deceive it,
 Of that which you vouchsafed in love to leave it.
 And though it oft had giv'n me much content,
 Yet this great wrong I never could repent;
 175 But of the happiest made it most forlorn,
 To show that nothing's free from fortune's scorn,
 While all the rest with this most beauteous tree,
 Made their sad consort sorrow's harmony.
 The flowers that on the banks and walks did grow,
 180 Crept in the ground, the grass did weep for woe.
 The winds and waters seemed to chide together,
 Because you went away, they knew not whither.
 And those sweet brooks that ran so fair and clear,
 With grief and trouble wrinkled did appear.
 185 Those pretty birds that wonted^o were to sing, accustomed
 Now neither sing, nor chirp, nor use their wing;
 But with their tender feet on some bare spray,^o branch
 Warble forth sorrow, and their own dismay.
 Fair Philomela leaves her mournful ditty,
 190 Drowned in dead sleep, yet can procure no pity;
 Each arbour, bank, each seat, each stately tree
 Looks bare and desolate now, for want of thee;
 Turning green tresses^o into frosty grey, hair
 While in cold grief they wither all away.
 195 The sun grew weak, his beams no comfort gave,
 While all green things did make the earth their grave;
 Each briar, each bramble, when you went away,

Caught fast your clothes, thinking to make you stay;
 Delightful Echo,¹ wonted to reply
 200 To our last words, did now for sorrow die;
 The house cast off each garment that might grace it,
 Putting on dust and cobwebs to deface it.
 All desolation then there did appear,
 When you were going whom they held so dear.
 205 This last farewell to Cooke-ham here I give;
 When I am dead thy name in this may live,
 Wherein I have performed her noble hest,^o command
 Whose virtues lodge in my unworthy breast,
 And ever shall, so long as life remains,
 210 Tying my heart to her by those rich chains.

*To the Doubtful Reader*²

Gentle reader, if thou desire to be resolved,³ why I Give this title, Salve Deus Rex Judæorum,⁴ know for certain, that it was delivered unto me in sleep many years before I had any intent to write in this manner, and was quite out of my memory, until I had written the Passion of Christ, when immediately it came into my remembrance, what I had dreamed long before; and thinking it a significant token, that I was appointed to perform this work, I gave the very same words I received in sleep as the fittest title I could devise for this book.
 —1611

¹ Echo Nymph in Greek mythology who was prevented by a curse from saying anything other than what others said.

² To the Doubtful Reader Printed at the conclusion of Salve Deus Rex Judæorum; Doubtful Curious.

³ be resolved Understand.

⁴ Salve ... Judæorum Latin: Hail, God, King of the Jews.

SIR WALTER RALEGH

1554 – 1618

Sir Walter Raleigh was one of the leading courtiers, adventurers, and literary figures of the Elizabethan era. Intermittently regarded as a hero and a traitor in his lifetime, Raleigh profited richly and suffered considerably from his proximity to Elizabeth I—but fared considerably worse after James I replaced Elizabeth on the throne. Known for his gallantry, for his fighting ability, for his effort at colonization in Virginia, and for bringing the practice of smoking tobacco into European culture, Raleigh was also the author of literary work that ranged from love poetry to exploration narratives to an unfinished history of the world.

Born into the lesser gentry at Hayes Barton, Devon, Raleigh went to France in 1569 to fight for the Huguenots in the French religious civil wars. By 1572, he was studying at Oriel College, Oxford, only to leave over a year later without a degree. Raleigh finished his education in the Inns of Court, including Lyon's Inn and the Middle Temple, and it was during these years that his first poem was probably printed. It is often difficult to date or even attribute Raleigh's poems accurately, for like many courtiers, Raleigh generally circulated his verses in manuscript.

Raleigh's poetry is characterized by an intensely personal treatment of such conventional themes as love, loss, beauty, and time. The majority of his poems are short lyrics—many of them occasional, written in response to particular events.

After embarking with his stepbrother, Humphrey Gilbert, on an unsuccessful colonizing expedition to North America in 1578, Raleigh spent a year and a half fighting in Ireland. He returned to England in 1581 and caught the Queen's attention, eventually emerging as her new favorite and reaping substantial rewards, including a monopoly over wine licences in 1583 and a knighthood in 1585. A grant of 42,000 Irish acres on which to establish English colonists, made in 1587, brought Raleigh back to Ireland several times, and he was responsible for bringing an acquaintance, Edmund Spenser, back to England and introducing him to the Queen in 1589.

Raleigh's rapid rise to prominence at Elizabeth I's court was abruptly halted in 1592 after the discovery of his secret marriage to Elizabeth Throckmorton, one of the Queen's attendants. The Queen had him imprisoned in the Tower of London for several months—the occasion for his long poem, The Ocean to Cynthia, Raleigh's lament over Elizabeth's displeasure. This, Raleigh's most ambitious and sprawling poem, is a work that exists only in fragments, the longest of them over five hundred lines long. Five years elapsed before Raleigh was again in the Queen's good graces, a period during which he traveled to Guiana (1595), published a report on his adventures entitled The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana (1596), developed his Irish plantations, and participated in the attack on Cadiz (1596). Always critical of Spain's colonial and naval power, Raleigh never lost interest in North America, sponsoring reconnaissance and colonizing expeditions in the late 1580s to the areas now known as Virginia and the Carolinas.

Following James I's accession in 1603, Raleigh returned to the Tower of London for nearly thirteen years after a dubious treason conviction for allegedly supporting Arabella Stuart's claim to the throne. Rarely idle, Raleigh kept abreast of the political and intellectual climate during his imprisonment by entertaining numerous visitors (including James's son, Prince Henry), conducting scientific experiments, compounding drugs, and writing. His most notable work from this period is The Historie of the World (1614), a three-volume overview of world events from creation to the second century BCE. Raleigh was released in 1617 to make a second journey to Guiana in search of the gold mine that he claimed to have found on his first voyage. Returning empty-handed in 1618, he was imprisoned under his former sentence for disobeying James's orders to avoid any acts of violence against the Spanish, and then beheaded. Despite a reputation for unorthodoxy and even atheism, Raleigh made a pious if showy end and replied, when asked if he should not face east (toward Jerusalem), "What matter how the head lie, so the heart be right?"

[Please note that an exchange of poems between Sir Walter Raleigh and Elizabeth I appears with other writings by Elizabeth earlier in this volume.]

10
 Methought I saw the grave where Laura² lay,
 Within that temple where the vestal flame³
 Was wont to burn: and, passing by that way,
 To see that buried dust of living fame,
 Whose tomb fair Love and fairer Virtue kept,
 All suddenly I saw the Faery Queen,^o Elizabeth I
 At whose approach the soul of Petrarch wept;
 And from thenceforth those graces⁴ were not seen,
 For they this Queen attended; in whose stead
 Oblivion laid him down on Laura's hearse.
 Hereat the hardest stones were seen to bleed,
 And groans of buried ghosts the heavens did pierce:
 Where Homer's spright^o did tremble all for grief, spirit
 And cursed the access⁵ of that celestial thief.⁶
 —1590

¹ A Vision ... Queen Raleigh's poem was printed in the first edition of Spenser's The Fairie Queene (1590).

² Laura The subject of Petrarch's love poems of the fourteenth century.

³ vestal flame Reference to the Roman goddess of the hearth, Vesta, whose temple was maintained by vestal virgins guarding an eternal flame.

⁴ those graces I.e., "fair Love and fairer Virtue."

⁵ access To achieve an honor or office (accession).

⁶ Homer's spright ... celestial thief The Queen has usurped Laura's reputation for purity and chastity, and Spenser has stolen Petrarch's artistic legacy and even threatened the place of Homer in the literary pantheon; Homer Author of The Iliad and The Odyssey.

and His Son, 1602 (artist unknown).

*Sir Walter Raleigh to His Son*⁷

Three things there be that prosper up apace^o quickly
 And flourish, whilst they grow asunder^o far, apart
 But on a day, they meet all in one place,
 And when they meet, they one another mar;^o damage

⁷ Sir Walter Raleigh to His Son Raleigh's son, Wat, had a reputation for being wild. He died during his father's second voyage to Guiana.

5 And they be these: the wood, the weed, the wag.¹
 The wood is that which makes the gallow tree;
 The weed is that which strings the hangman's bag;
 The wag, my pretty knave, betokeneth thee.
 Mark well, dear boy, whilst these assemble not,
 10 Green springs the tree, hemp grows, the wag is wild,
 But when they meet, it makes the timber rot,
 It frets the halter, and it chokes the child.
 Then bless thee, and beware, and let us pray
 We part not with thee at this meeting day.

*The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd*²

If all the world and love were young,
 And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
 These pretty pleasures might me move
 To live with thee and be thy love.

5 Time drives the flocks from field to fold
 When rivers rage and rocks grow cold,
 And Philomel³ becometh dumb;
 The rest complains of cares to come.

10 The flowers do fade, and wanton^o fields unrestrained, unruly
 To wayward winter reckoning yields;
 A honey tongue, a heart of gall,^o bitterness, rancor
 Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

15 Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
 Thy cap, thy kirtle,^o and thy posies tunic or skirt
 Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten—
 In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

20 Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
 Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
 All these in me no means can move
 To come to thee and be thy love.

² The Nymph's ... Shepherd Response to Christopher Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love."

³ Philomel I.e., the nightingale doesn't sing. In classical mythology, Philomela, the daughter of the King of Athens, was transformed into a nightingale after being pursued and raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, King of Thrace.

But could youth last and love still breed,
 Had joys no date nor age no need,⁴
 Then these delights my mind might move
 To live with thee and be thy love.

The Lie

Go, soul, the body's guest,
 Upon a thankless errand;
 Fear not to touch the best;
 The truth shall be thy warrant.

5 Go, since I needs must die,
 And give the world the lie.

Say to the court, it glows
 And shines like rotten wood;
 Say to the church, it shows
 10 What's good, and doth no good.
 If church and court reply,
 Then give them both the lie.

Tell potentates^o they live powerful rulers
 Acting by others' action;
 15 Not loved unless they give,
 Not strong but by a faction.
 If potentates reply,
 Give potentates the lie.

Tell men of high condition,
 20 That manage the estate,^o the state or body politic
 Their purpose is ambition,
 Their practice only hate.
 And if they once reply,
 Then give them all the lie.

25 Tell them that brave it most,⁵
 They beg for more by spending,
 Who, in their greatest cost,
 Seek nothing but commending.
 And if they make reply,
 30 Then give them all the lie.

⁴ Had joys ... no need If joys had no ending, and aging did not bring with it its own needs.

⁵ brave it most Dress extravagantly.

Tell zeal it wants^o devotion;
 Tell love it is but lust;
 Tell time it is but motion;
 Tell flesh it is but dust.
 35 And wish them not reply,
 For thou must give the lie.

 Tell age it daily wasteth;^o
 Tell honour how it alters;
 Tell beauty how she blasteth;
 40 Tell favour how it falters.
 And as they shall reply,
 Give every one the lie.

 Tell wit^o how much it wrangles intelligence, understanding
 In tickle points of niceness;¹
 45 Tell wisdom she entangles
 Herself in overwiseness.
 And when they do reply,
 Straight give them both the lie.

 Tell physic^o of her boldness;^o medicine / presumption
 50 Tell skill it is pretension;
 Tell charity of coldness;
 Tell law it is contention.
 And as they do reply,
 So give them still the lie.

 55 Tell fortune of her blindness;
 Tell nature of decay;
 Tell friendship of unkindness;
 Tell justice of delay.
 And if they will reply,
 60 Then give them all the lie.

 Tell arts they have no soundness,²
 But vary by esteeming;³
 Tell schools⁴ they want profoundness,
 And stand too much on seeming.

¹ wrangles ... niceness To waste time with trivial, or overly subtle matters.

² arts The seven liberal arts: grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music; soundness Freedom from weakness, based on fact.

³ they have ... esteeming They have no basis in solid and unchanging fact; they are subject to opinion.

⁴ schools Systems of philosophy.

lacks 65 If arts and schools reply,
 Give arts and schools the lie.

Tell faith it's fled the city;
 Tell how the country erreth;
 Tell manhood shakes off pity
 70 And virtue least preferreth.⁵
 And if they do reply,
 Spare not to give the lie.

So when thou hast, as I
 Commanded thee, done blabbing—
 75 Although to give the lie
 Deserves no less than stabbing⁶—
 Stab at thee he that will,
 No stab the soul can kill.
 —1608 (WRITTEN C. 1592)

Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk

Nature that washed her hands in milk
 And had forgot to dry them,
 Instead of earth⁷ took snow and silk,
 At love's request to try^o them, test
 5 If she a mistress could compose
 To please love's fancy out of those.⁸

 Her eyes he would^o should be of light, wanted
 A violet breath and lips of jelly,
 Her hair not black nor over-bright,
 10 And of the softest down her belly;
 As for her inside he would have it
 Only of wantonness^o and wit.^o sexual appetite / intelligence, understanding

⁵ Tell manhood ... virtue least preferreth Tell humanity that it refuses to feel pity, and that it prefers virtue less than all other things.

⁶ Deserves no less than stabbing To accuse someone of lying would likely cause a duel.

⁷ Instead of earth The Bible recounts the creation of Adam out of the dust of the earth. See Genesis 2.7.

⁸ To please love's fancy out of those At the request of love, Nature attempted to make a mistress out of snow and silk.

At love's entreaty, such a one
 Nature made, but with her beauty
 15 She hath framed a heart of stone,
 So as love by ill destiny
 Must die for her whom nature gave him
 Because her darling would not save him.

But time, which nature doth despise,
 20 And rudely gives her love the lie,¹
 Makes hope a fool, and sorrow wise,
 His hands doth neither wash nor dry,
 But being made of steel and rust,
 Turns snow, and silk, and milk to dust.

25 The light, the belly, lips, and breath
 He dims, discolors, and destroys,
 With those he feeds, but fills not death,
 Which sometimes were the food of joys;
 Yea, time doth dull each lively wit
 30 And dries all wantonness with it.

Oh cruel time which takes in trust
 Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
 And pays us but with age and dust,
 Who in the dark and silent grave,
 35 When we have wandered all our ways,
 Shuts up the story of our days.

—EARLY 17TH CENTURY

[The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself]²

Even such is time, which takes in trust
 Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
 And pays us but with age and dust,
 Who in the dark and silent grave
 5 When we have wandered all our ways
 Shuts up the story of our days.

¹ gives ... the lie Offers a challenge; in this period, to a duel.

² The Author's ... Himself This short poem is variously titled in different manuscript sources; "Sir Walter Raleigh's Epitaph on his Own Death" is one variant. The poem is an expanded and slightly revised version of the final stanza of "Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk" (see above). Raleigh is said to have written it in his Bible on the night before he died.

And from which earth, and grave, and dust
 The Lord will raise me up, I trust.

from The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana;³
 with a relation of the great and golden City of Manoa,⁴ which the Spaniards call El Dorado ...

To the Right Honourable my singular good Lord and kinsman Charles Howard,⁵ Knight of the Garter, Baron, and Councillor, and of the Admirals of England the most renowned; and to the Right Honourable Sir Robert Cecil,⁶ Knight, Councillor in her Highness's Privy Councils.

PART I, PREFACE

For your Honours' many honourable and friendly parts, I have hitherto only returned promises; and now, for answer of both your adventures,⁷ I have sent you a bundle of papers, which I have divided between your Lordship and Sir Robert Cecil, in these two respects chiefly; first, for that it is reason that wasteful factors,⁸ when they have consumed such stocks as they had in

³ Empire of Guiana Raleigh's Guiana is located predominately in the Orinoco basin of present-day eastern Venezuela.

⁴ Manoa The European myth of El Dorado, "the gilded one," resulted from conflated reports of several indigenous peoples' practices. Once a year, a king, or a chief, was anointed with gold dust and paddled to the center of a lake, believed to be in an upland area beside the golden city of Manoa, where he would make gold offerings. The location of El Dorado, or Manoa, was variously held to be in Colombia, Surinam, Guyana, and Venezuela.

⁶ Sir Robert Cecil Earl of Salisbury (1563–1612), Secretary of State. Although an ally of Raleigh's at the time of the Guiana expedition, Cecil would later turn James I against Raleigh by suggesting his involvement in the plot to place Arabella Stuart on the throne.

⁷ adventures Commercial investments in Raleigh's voyage.

⁸ factors Those who buy or sell for others, agents.

trust, do yield some colour¹ for the same in their account; secondly, for that I am assured that whatsoever shall be done, or written, by me, shall need a double protection and defence. The trial that I had of both your loves, when I was left of all but of malice and revenge, makes me still presume that you will be pleased (knowing what little power I had to perform aught,² and the great advantage of forewarned enemies) to answer that out of knowledge, which others shall but object out of malice. In my more happy times as I did especially honour you both, so I found that your loves sought me out in the darkest shadow of adversity, and the same affection which accompanied my better fortune soared not away from me in my many miseries; all which though I cannot requite, yet I shall ever acknowledge; and the great debt which I have no power to pay, I can do no more for a time but confess to be due. It is true that as my errors were great, so they have yielded very grievous effects; and if aught might have been deserved in former times, to have counterpoised³ any part of offences, the fruit thereof, as it seemeth, was long before fallen from the tree, and the dead stock only remained. I did therefore, even in the winter of my life, undertake these travails,⁴ fitter for bodies less blasted with misfortunes, for men of greater ability, and for minds of better encouragement, that thereby, if it were possible, I might recover but the moderation of excess, and the least taste of the greatest plenty formerly possessed. If I had known other way to win, if I had imagined how greater adventures might have regained, if I could conceive what farther means I might yet use but even to appease so powerful displeasure,⁵ I would not doubt but for one year more to hold fast my soul in my teeth till it were performed. Of that little remain I had, I have wasted in effect all herein. I have undergone many constructions;⁶ I have been accompanied with many sorrows, with labour, hunger, heat, sickness, and peril; it appeareth, notwithstanding, that I made no other bravado of going to the sea, than was meant, and that I was never hidden in Cornwall, or elsewhere, as was supposed. They have grossly belied me that forejudged that I would rather become a servant to the Spanish king than return; and the rest were much mistaken, who would have persuaded that I was too easeful and sensual to undertake a journey of so great travail. But if what I have done receive the gracious construction of a painful pilgrimage, and purchase the least remission,⁷ I shall think all too little, and that there were wanting to the rest many miseries. But if both the times past, the present, and what may be in the future, do all by one grain of gall⁸ continue in eternal distaste, I do not then know whether I should bewail myself, either for my too much travail and expense, or condemn myself for doing less than that which can deserve nothing. From myself I have deserved no thanks, for I am returned a beggar, and withered; but that I might have bettered my poor estate, it shall appear from the following discourse, if I had not only respected her Majesty's future honour and riches. ...

... To speak of what passed homeward were tedious, either to describe or name any of the rivers, islands, or villages of the Tivitivas, which dwell on trees; we will leave all those to the general map. And to be short, when we were arrived at the sea-side, then grew our greatest doubt, and the bitterest of all our journey forepassed; for I protest before God, that we were in a most desperate estate. For the same night which we anchored in the mouth of the river of Capuri, where it falleth into the sea, there arose a mighty storm, and the river's mouth was at least a league broad, so as we ran before night close under the land with our small boats, and brought the galley as near as we could. But she had as much ado to live as could be, and there wanted little of her sinking, and all those in her; for mine own part, I confess I was very doubtful which way to take, either to go over in the pestered⁹ galley, there being but six foot water over the sands for two leagues together, and that also in the channel, and she drew five; or to adventure in so great a billow, and in so doubtful weather, to cross the seas in my barge. The longer we tarried the worse it was, and therefore I took Captain Gifford, Captain Caulfield, and my cousin Greenville into my barge; and after it cleared up about midnight we put ourselves to God's keeping, and thrust out into the sea, leaving the galley at anchor, who durst not adventure but by daylight. And so, being all very sober and melancholy, one faintly cheering another to shew courage, it pleased God that the next day about nine o'clock, we descried¹ the island of Trinidad; and steering for the nearest part of it, we kept the shore till we came to Curiapan, where we found our ships at anchor, than which there was never to us a more joyful sight.

Now that it hath pleased God to send us safe to our ships, it is time to leave Guiana to the sun, whom they worship, and steer away towards the north. I will, therefore, in a few words finish the discovery thereof. Of the several nations which we found upon this discovery I will once again make repetition, and how they are affected. At our first entrance into Amana, which is one of the outlets of the Orinoco, we left on the right hand of us in the bottom of the bay, lying directly against Trinidad, a nation of inhuman Cannibals, which inhabit the rivers of Guanipa and Berbeese.² In the same bay there is also a third river, which is called Areo, which riseth on Paria side towards Cumana, and that river is inhabited with the Wikiri, whose chief town upon the said river is Sayma. In this bay there are no more rivers but these three before rehearsed and the four branches of Amana, all which in the winter thrust so great abundance of water into the sea, as the same is taken up fresh two or three leagues from the land. In the passages towards Guiana, that is, in all those lands which the eight branches of the Orinoco fashion into islands, there are but one sort of people, called Tivitivas, but of two castes, as they term them, the one called Ciawani, the other Waraweeti,³ and those war one with another.

On the hithermost⁴ part of the Orinoco, as at Toparimaca and Winicapora, those are of a nation called Nepoios, and are the followers of Carapana, lord of Emeria. Between Winicapora and the port of Morequito, which standeth in Aromaia, and all those in the valley of Amariocapana are called Orenoqueponi, and did obey Morequito and are now followers of Topiawari. Upon the river of Caroli are the Canuri, which are governed by a woman who is inheritrix⁵ of that province; who came far off to see our nation, and asked me divers questions of her Majesty, being much delighted with the discourse of her Majesty's greatness, and wondering at such reports as we truly made of her Highness' many virtues. And upon the head of Caroli and on the lake of Cassipa are the three strong nations of the Cassipagotos. Right south into the land are the Capurepani and Emparepani, and beyond those, adjoining to Macureguarai, the first city of Inca, are the Iwarawakeri. All these are professed enemies to the Spaniards, and to the rich Epuremei also. To the west of Caroli are divers nations of Cannibals and of those Ewaipanoma without heads. Directly west are the Amapaia and Anebas, which are also marvellous rich in gold. The rest towards Peru we will omit. On the north of the Orinoco, between it and the West Indies, are the Wikiri, Saymi, and the rest before spoken of, all mortal enemies to the Spaniards. On the south side of the main mouth of the Orinoco are the Arawaks; and beyond them, the Cannibals; and to the south of them, the Amazons.

To make mention of the several beasts, birds, fishes, fruits, flowers, gums, sweet woods, and of their several religions and customs, would for the first require as many volumes as those of Gesnerus,⁶ and for the next another bundle of Decades.⁷ The religion of the Epuremei is the same which the Incas, emperors of Peru, used, which may be read in Cieza¹ and other Spanish stories; how they believe the immortality of the soul, worship the sun, and bury with them alive their best beloved wives and treasure, as they likewise do in Pegu² in the East Indies, and other places. The poni bury not their wives with them, but their jewels, hoping to enjoy them again. The Arawaks dry the bones of their lords, and their wives and friends drink them in powder. In the graves of the Peruvians the Spaniards found their greatest abundance of treasure. The like, also, is to be found among these people in every province. They have all many wives, and the lords five-fold to the common sort. Their wives never eat with their husbands, nor among the men, but serve their husbands at meals and afterwards feed by themselves. Those that are past their younger years make all their bread and drink, and work their cotton-beds, and do all else of service and labour; for the men do nothing but hunt, fish, play, and drink, when they are out of the wars.

I will enter no further into discourse of their manners, laws, and customs. And because I have not myself seen the cities of Inca I cannot avow on my credit what I have heard, although it be very likely that the emperor Inca hath built and erected as magnificent palaces in Guiana as his ancestors did in Peru; which were for their riches and rareness most marvellous, and exceeding all in Europe, and, I think, of the world, China excepted, which also the Spaniards, which I had, assured me to be true, as also the nations of the borderers, who, being but savages to those of the inland, do cause much treasure to be buried with them. For I was informed of one of the caciques of the valley of Amariocapana which had buried with him a little before our arrival a chair of gold most curiously wrought, which was made either in Macureguarai adjoining or in Manoa. But if we should have grieved them in their religion at the first, before they had been taught better, and have digged up their graves, we had lost them all. And therefore I held my first resolution, that her Majesty should either accept or refuse the enterprise before anything should be done that might in any sort hinder the same. And if Peru had so many heaps of gold, whereof those Incas were princes, and that they delighted so much therein, no doubt but this which now liveth and reigneth in Manoa hath the same humour,³ and, I am assured, hath more abundance of gold within his territory than all Peru and the West Indies.

For the rest, which myself have seen, I will promise these things that follow, which I know to be true. Those that are desirous to discover and to see many nations may be satisfied within this river, which bringeth forth so many arms and branches leading to several countries and provinces, above 2,000 miles east and west and 800 miles south and north, and of these the most either rich in gold or in other merchandises. The common soldier shall here fight for gold, and pay himself, instead of pence, with plates of half-a-foot broad, whereas he breaketh his bones in other wars for provant⁴ and penury. Those commanders and chieftains that shoot at honour and abundance shall find there more rich and beautiful cities, more temples adorned with golden images, more sepulchres⁵ filled with treasure, than either Cortés⁶ found in Mexico or Pizarro⁷ in Peru. And the shining glory of this conquest will eclipse all those so far-extended beams of the Spanish nation. There is no country which yieldeth more pleasure to the inhabitants, either for those common delights of hunting, hawking, fishing, fowling, and the rest, than Guiana doth; it hath so many plains, clear rivers, and abundance of pheasants, partridges, quails, rails, cranes, herons, and all other fowl; deer of all sorts, porks, hares, lions, tigers, leopards, and divers other sorts of beasts, either for chase or food. It hath a kind of beast called cama or anta,⁸ as big as an English beef, and in great plenty. To speak of the several sorts of every kind I fear would be troublesome to the reader, and therefore I will omit them, and conclude that both for health, good air, pleasure, and riches, I am resolved it cannot be equalled by any region either in the east or west. Moreover the country is so healthful, as of an hundred persons and more, which lay without shift most sluttishly, and were every day almost melted with heat in rowing and marching, and suddenly wet again with great showers, and did eat of all sorts of corrupt fruits, and made meals of fresh fish without seasoning, of tortugas,¹ of lagartos or crocodiles, and of all sorts good and bad, without either order or measure, and besides lodged in the open air every night, we lost not any one, nor had one ill-disposed to my knowledge; nor found any *calentura*² or other of those pestilent diseases which dwell in all hot regions, and so near the equinoctial line.

Where there is store of gold it is in effect needless to remember other commodities for trade. But it hath, towards the south part of the river, great quantities of brazil-wood,³ and divers berries that dye a most perfect crimson and carnation; and for painting, all France, Italy, or the East Indies yield none such. For the more the skin is washed, the fairer the colour appeareth, and with which even those brown and tawny women spot themselves and colour their cheeks. All places yield abundance of cotton, of silk, of balsamum,⁴ and of those kinds most excellent and never known in Europe, of all sorts of gums, of Indian pepper; and what else the countries may afford within the land we know not, neither had we time to abide the trial and search. The soil besides is so excellent and so full of rivers, as it will carry sugar, ginger, and all those other commodities which the West Indies have.

The navigation is short, for it may be sailed with an ordinary wind in six weeks, and in the like time back again; and by the way neither lee-shore,⁵ enemies' coast, rocks, nor sands. All which in the voyages to the West Indies and all other places we are subject unto; as the channel of Bahama, coming from the West Indies, cannot well be passed in the winter, and when it is at the best, it is a perilous and a fearful place; the rest of the Indies for calms and diseases very troublesome, and the sea about the Bermudas a hellish sea for thunder, lightning, and storms.

This very year (1595) there were seventeen sail of Spanish ships lost in the channel of Bahama, and the great Philip, like to have sunk at the Bermudas, was put back to St. Juan de Puerto Rico; and so it falleth out in that navigation every year for the most part. Which in this voyage are not to be feared; for the time of year to leave England is best in July, and the summer in Guiana is in October, November, December, January, February, and March, and then the ships may depart thence in April, and so return again into England in June. So as they shall never be subject to winter weather, either coming, going, or staying there: which, for my part, I take to be one of the greatest comforts and encouragements that can be thought on, having, as I have done, tasted in this voyage by the West Indies so many calms, so much heat, such outrageous gusts, such weather, and contrary winds.

To conclude, Guiana is a country that hath yet her maidenhead,⁶ never sacked, turned, nor wrought;⁷ the face of the earth hath not been torn, nor the virtue and salt of the soil spent by manurance. The graves have not been opened for gold, the mines not broken with sledges, nor their images pulled down out of their temples. It hath never been entered by any army of strength, and never conquered or possessed by any Christian prince. It is besides so defensible, that if two forts be builded in one of the provinces which I have seen, the flood setteth in so near the bank, where the channel also lieth, that no ship can pass up but within a pike's length of the artillery, first of the one, and afterwards of the other. Which two forts will be a sufficient guard both to the empire of Inca, and to an hundred other several kingdoms, lying within the said river, even to the city of Quito in Peru.

There is therefore great difference between the easiness of the conquest of Guiana, and the defence of it being conquered, and the West or East Indies. Guiana hath but one entrance by the sea, if it hath that, for any vessels of burden. So as whosoever shall first possess it, it shall be found inaccessible for any enemy, except he come in wherries, barges, or canoes, or else in flat-bottomed boats; and if he do offer to enter it in that manner, the woods are so thick 200 miles together upon the rivers of such entrance, as a mouse cannot sit in a boat unhit from the bank. By land it is more impossible to approach;

² calentura Disease experienced by sailors in the tropics, characterized by fever and delirium.

³ brazil-wood Brownish hardwood used to make a red dye.

⁴ balsamum Aromatic resin of the balsam tree used for medicines.

⁵ lee-shore Shore on which the wind blows.

⁶ maidenhead Literally, hymen; i.e., Guiana is still a virgin country.

⁷ wrought Worked.

for it hath the strongest situation of any region under the sun, and it is so environed with impassable mountains on every side, as it is impossible to victual any company in the passage. Which hath been well proved by the Spanish nation, who since the conquest of Peru have never left five years free from attempting this empire, or discovering some way into it; and yet of three-and-twenty several gentlemen, knights, and noblemen, there was never any that knew which way to lead an army by land, or to conduct ships by sea, anything near the said country. Orellana,¹ of whom the river of the Amazon taketh name, was the first, and Don Antonio de Berreo, whom we displanted, the last: and I doubt much whether he himself or any of his yet know the best way into the said empire. It can therefore hardly be regained, if any strength be formerly set down, but in one or two places, and but two or three *crumsters*² or galleys built and furnished upon the river within. The West Indies have many ports, watering places, and landings; and nearer than 300 miles to Guiana, no man can harbour a ship, except he know one only place, which is not learned in haste, and which I will undertake there is not any one of my companies that knoweth, whosoever hearkened most after it.

Besides, by keeping one good fort, or building one town of strength, the whole empire is guarded; and whatsoever companies shall be afterwards planted within the land, although in twenty several provinces, those shall be able all to reunite themselves upon any occasion either by the way of one river, or be able to march by land without either wood, bog, or mountain. Whereas in the West Indies there are few towns or provinces that can succour or relieve one the other by land or sea. By land the countries are either desert, mountainous, or strong enemies. By sea, if any man invade to the eastward, those to the west cannot in many months turn against the breeze and eastern wind. Besides, the Spaniards are therein so dispersed as they are nowhere strong, but in Nueva Espana only; the sharp mountains, the thorns, and poisoned prickles, the sandy and deep ways in the valleys, the smothering heat and air, and want of water in other places are their only and best defence; which, because those nations that invade them are not victualled or provided to stay, neither have any place to friend adjoining, do serve them instead of good arms and great multitudes.

The West Indies were first offered her Majesty's grandfather³ by Columbus, a stranger, in whom there might be doubt of deceit; and besides it was then thought incredible that there were such and so many lands and regions never written of before. This Empire is made known to her Majesty by her own vassal,⁴ and by him that oweth to her more duty than an ordinary subject; so that it shall ill sort with the many graces and benefits which I have received to abuse her Highness, either with fables or imaginations. The country is already discovered, many nations won to her Majesty's love and obedience, and those Spaniards which have latest and longest laboured about the conquest, beaten out, discouraged, and disgraced, which among these nations were thought invincible. Her Majesty may in this enterprise employ all those soldiers and gentlemen that are younger brethren, and all captains and chieftains that want employment, and the charge will be only the first setting out in victualing and arming them; for after the first or second year I doubt not but to see in London a Contractation-House⁵ of more receipt for Guiana than there is now in Seville for the West Indies.

And I am resolved that if there were but a small army afoot in Guiana, marching towards Manoa, the chief city of Inca, he would yield to her Majesty by composition so many hundred thousand pounds yearly as should both defend all enemies abroad, and defray all expenses at home; and that he would besides pay a garrison of three or four thousand soldiers very royally to defend him against other nations. For he cannot but know how his predecessors, yea, how his own great uncles, Guascar and ¹ Orellana Francesco de Orellana was the first Spaniard to descend the entire length of the Amazon river in 1541–42. Orellana renamed the river "Amazon" from "Marañon" after encountering a group of female warriors.

² crumsters Merchant ships used as warships that accompanied Spanish galleons. The crumster could carry a great deal of cargo and firepower.

³ her Majesty's grandfather Bartholomew Columbus, brother of Christopher, approached Henry VII of England to raise money for Columbus's western route to India, but Columbus had already contracted his services to Queen Isabella of Spain.

⁴ vassal Humble servant.

⁵ Contractation-House Seville's Casa de Contractacion controlled all aspects of the Spanish trade with the Americas.

Atabalipa,¹ sons to Guiana-Capac, emperor of Peru, were, while they contended for the empire, beaten out by the Spaniards, and that both of late years and ever since the said conquest, the Spaniards have sought the passages and entry of his country; and of their cruelties used to the borderers he cannot be ignorant. In which respects no doubt but he will be brought to tribute with great gladness; if not, he hath neither shot nor iron weapon in all his empire, and therefore may easily be conquered.

And I further remember that Berreo confessed to me and others, which I protest before the Majesty of God to be true, that there was found among the prophecies in Peru, at such time as the empire was reduced to the Spanish obedience, in their chiefest temples, amongst divers others which foreshadowed the loss of the said empire, that from Inglatierra² those Incas should be again in time to come restored, and delivered from the servitude of the said conquerors. And I hope, as we with these few hands have displanted the first garrison, and driven them out of the said country, so her Majesty will give order for the rest, and either defend it, and hold it as tributary,³ or conquer and keep it as empress of the same. For whatsoever prince shall possess it, shall be greatest; and if the King of Spain enjoy it, he will become irresistible. Her Majesty hereby shall confirm and strengthen the opinions of all nations as touching her great and princely actions. And where the south border of Guiana reacheth to the dominion and empire of the Amazons, those women shall hereby hear the name of a virgin, which is not only able to defend her own territories and her neighbours, but also to invade and conquer so great empires and so far removed.

To speak more at this time I fear would be but troublesome: I trust in God, this being true, will suffice, and that he which is King of all Kings, and Lord of Lords, will put it into her heart which is Lady of Ladies to possess it. If not, I will judge those men worthy to be kings thereof, that by her grace and leave will undertake it of themselves.

*Letter to His Wife*⁴

You shall now receive (my deare wife) my last words in these last lines. My love I send you that you may keep it when I am dead, and my counsell that you may remember it when I am no more. I would not by my will present you with sorrowes (dear Besse) let them go to the grave with me and be buried in the dust. And seeing that it is not Gods will that I should see you any more in this life, beare it patiently, and with a heart like thy selfe.

First, I send you all the thankes which my heart can conceive, or my words can rehearse for your many travailes, and care taken for me, which though they have not taken effect as you wished, yet my debt to you is not the lesse: but I pay it I never shall in this world.

Secondly, I beseech you for the love you beare me living, do not hide your selfe many dayes, but by your travailes seeke to helpe your miserable fortunes and the right of your poor childe. Thy mourning cannot availe me, I am but dust.

Thirdly, you shall understand, that my land was conveyed *bona fide*⁵ to my childe; the writings were drawne⁶ at midsummer was twelve months, my honest cosen Brett can testify so much, and Dolberry too, can remember somewhat therein. And I trust my blood will quench their malice that have cruelly murdered me: and that they will not seek also to kill thee and thine with extreme poverty.

To what friend to direct thee I know not, for all mine have left me in the true time of tryall. And I perceive that my death was determined from the first day. Most sorry I am God knowes that being thus surprised with death I can leave you in no better estate. God is my witnesse I meant you all my office of wines or all that I could have purchased by selling it, halfe of my stuffe, and all my jewels, but some one for the boy, but God hath prevented all my resolutions. That great God that ruleth all in all, but if you live free from want, care for no more, for the rest is but vanity. Love God, and begin betimes to repose your selfe upon him, have travailed and wearied your thoughts over all sorts of worldly cogitations, you shall but sit downe by sorrowe in the end.

⁴ Letter to His Wife The following letter was written after Raleigh had been convicted of attempting to conspire against the Crown, and sent to the Tower of London; he believed he would be executed the next day. That did not happen, but he did remain imprisoned in the Tower for most of the rest of his life, and was finally executed in 1618.

Teach your son also to love and feare God while he is yet young, that the feare of God may grow with him, and then God will be a husband to you, and a father to him; a husband and a father which cannot be taken from you.

Baily oweth me 200 pounds, and Adrian Gilbert 600. In Jersey I also have much owing me besides. The arrearages of the wines will pay my debts. And howsoever you do, solues sake,¹ pay all poore men. When I am gone, no doubt you shall be sought for my many, for the world thinkes that I was very rich. But take heed of the pretences of men, and their affections, for they last not but in honest and worthy men, and no greater misery can befall you in this life, than to become a prey, and afterwards to be despised. I speake not this (God knowes) to dissuade you from marriage, for it will be best for you, both in respect of the world and of God. As for me, I am no more yours, nor you mine, death hath cut us asunder: and God hath divided me from the world, and your from me.

Remember your poor childe for his father's sake, who chose you, and loved you in his happiest times. Get those letters (if it be possible) which I write to the Lords, wherein I sued for my life: God is my witnesse it was for you and yours that I desired life, but it is true that I disdained my self for begging of it: for know it (my deare wife) that your son is the son of a true man, and one who in his owne respect despiseth death and all his misshapen & ugly formes.

I cannot write much, God he knows how hardly I steale time while others sleep, and it is also time that I should separate my thoughts from the world. Begg my dead body which living was denied thee; and either lay it at Sherburne (and if the land continue) or in Exeter-Church, by my Father and Mother; I can say no more, time and death call me away.

The everlasting God, powerfull, infinite, and omnipotent God, That Almighty God, who is goodnesse it selfe, the true life and true light keep thee and thine: have mercy on me, and teach me to forgive my persecutors and false accusers, and send us to meet in his glorious Kingdome. My deare wife farewell. Blesse my poore boy. Pray for me, and let my good God hold you both in his arms.

Written with the dying hand of sometimes thy Husband, but now alas overthrowne.

Yours that was, but now not my own.

FRANCIS BACON

1561 – 1626

Philosopher, essayist, jurist, politician, naturalist, classicist, historian, and utopian fantasist, Francis Bacon had an extraordinary capacity to range throughout the world of learning while keeping a focus on the practical uses of knowledge, able not only to master the traditions of the past but also to combine, manipulate, and consolidate old concepts into fruitful new ideas. His essays, memorable distillations of his wide reading and worldly experience, are still widely read and enjoyed. His philosophical writings, in both Latin and English, aim at nothing less than the reformation of humanity's approach to understanding nature and society. Ironically, it can be hard for us now, reading from the other side of the revolution he helped accelerate, to appreciate the full impact of Bacon's philosophy. He did not fully develop what some call "the scientific method" or anticipate the crucial role of mathematics in later scientific developments. What he did accomplish, in his philosophy and in his often terse style (deliberately free, usually, from flights of metaphor or fancy), was to anchor the mind more firmly in experience and to lend momentum to a new sense of worldly inquiry and expectation. It would be unfair to hold him responsible, as some have done, for the dangers and excesses inherent in modern science and its assumptions; indeed, in The New Atlantis Bacon himself hints presciently that increased power over nature should be accompanied by increased love and gratitude.

"I had rather studied books than men," Bacon concluded late in his life, but his origins made vast ambitions in both the political and intellectual spheres seem almost inevitable. His father, Sir Nicholas Bacon, was Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, one of the most powerful ministers in the Elizabethan government. His mother, Ann Cook, was an erudite and devout Calvinist who instilled in her son a deep sense of purpose and a passion for knowledge. Cambridge student at twelve, Assistant to the Ambassador to France at sixteen, barrister and Member of Parliament by the age of twenty-three, Bacon achieved much early, but his father's untimely death in 1579 left him short of funds and without direct influence at court. He was not well liked by Elizabeth, and it was not until the accession of James I that his star began to rise. Knighted in 1603, he was appointed Solicitor General in 1607, Attorney General in 1613, Privy Councillor in 1616, Lord Keeper of the Seal in 1617, and finally Lord Chancellor in 1618, acquiring along the way the titles of Baron Verulam and Viscount St. Albans. "By indignities men come to dignities," Bacon wrote in his essay "Of Great Place"—conscious, no doubt, of the reputation for sycophancy and scheming he had acquired in his quest for power and position—and "the standing is slippery." In 1621, Bacon lost his political footing. Caught on the wrong side of a dispute between Parliament and his ally the Duke of Buckingham, he pleaded guilty to accepting bribes and was expelled for life from public office. The bribes do not seem to have dulled Bacon's keen legal mind: John Aubrey could report fifty years later that "there are fewer of his decrees reversed than of any other Chancellor." Bacon was variously denounced as a spendthrift, a calculating politician, and a man who, despite being attracted only to other men, had married the heiress Alice Barnham in 1606 merely for money (and had disinherited her in his last will). He was also, however, respected as an able administrator and advisor and a consummate orator whose audiences, Ben Jonson testified, were unwilling to accept that his speeches must end.

Until his death in 1626 (reputedly from a chill caught while investigating the preservative properties of snow), Bacon concentrated on expanding and refining his intellectual project. A third edition of his Essays appeared in 1625 with a new subtitle, Counsels, Civil and Moral. Bacon was the first to import the term “essai” into English from Montaigne for this new form, but as the subtitle indicates, his orientation was more public and impersonal than Montaigne’s, based more in the tradition of the commonplace book and the manual of conduct than in discursive meditation. The first edition of 1597 was composed of terse, aphoristic observations organized under ten topics. The final edition of 1625 had grown to 58 essays. The overall style is one of brevity, curtness, and sagacity, with fluid transitions between subjects. Bacon employs to great effect aphoristic devices such as observations in parallel series of twos and threes, and he is fond of antitheses, “the case exaggerated both ways, with the utmost force of the wit,” which have the effect of encouraging a balanced consideration of the issues by the reader. A notable exception is “Of Gardens,” in which Bacon, an avid gardener, indulges in a didactic and uncharacteristically opinionated exhortation concerning his lifelong passion.

To the end of his life Bacon pursued another passion, his grand design for the renewal of knowledge, the Great Instauration, which he had already outlined in the preface to his aphoristic Latin treatise Novum Organum (New Instrument) in 1620. Only a few of the many volumes he conceived for this project were actually completed, though others exist in partial form, or as prefaces or proposals. He wrote many of these in Latin, still considered the international language of scholarship. Bacon now expanded and translated The Advancement of Learning, which had appeared in English in 1605, as De Augmentis. Its vital innovation was a reclassification of knowledge so as to separate theology from natural philosophy. Bacon was no atheist, but he insisted that the deductive, syllogistic methods applied by the Aristotelian Schoolmen to theological speculation would not succeed in unlocking nature’s secrets. Rather than perceiving the natural world through the lens of unproven axioms and generalizations, we must begin with nature itself, gathering facts, sorting and analyzing them using inductive methods, and only then deriving principles which may be used to enhance further investigation: “Nature cannot be commanded except by being obeyed.”

In fact, the pure induction favored by Bacon did not suffice for fruitful experimental investigation; the scientific method still needs room for intuitive guesses and intermediate deduction. But if Bacon’s methodology and philosophy was not in accord with twenty-first century practices, he was certainly rhetorically skillful and inspiring on the topic to a degree unmatched by his contemporaries. His New Atlantis, a fragment written in 1610 and published after his death in 1626, imagines in vivid and beguiling detail a utopian community of dynamic technical and spiritual progress founded upon bureaucratic and co-operative science. The power of Bacon’s prose fired the imagination of seventeenth-century English readers and sparked widespread public interest in scientific undertakings. In 1662, the Royal Society, the first concrete realization of Bacon’s dream of a scientific bureaucracy, acclaimed him as their model and prophet; a century later, Diderot adopted Bacon’s classification of learning and dedicated the Encyclopedia to him, as did Kant his Critique of Pure Reason. Bacon’s ambition, announced in The Advancement of Learning, to “ring a bell to call other wits together,” has been fulfilled.

OF TRUTH

“What is truth?” said jesting Pilate,¹ and would not stay for an answer. Certainly there be that delight in giddiness, and count it a bondage to fix a belief; affecting free-will in thinking, as well as in acting. And though the sects of philosophers of that kind² be gone, yet there remain certain discoursing wits, which are of the same veins, though there be not so much blood in them, as was in those of the ancients. But it is not only the difficulty and labor which men take in finding out of truth, nor again that when it is found it imposeth upon men’s thoughts, that doth bring lies in favor; but a natural though corrupt love of the lie itself. One of the later school of the Grecians examineth the matter,³ and is at a stand to think what should be in it, that men should love lies, where neither they make for pleasure, as with poets, nor for advantage, as with the merchant; but for the lie’s sake. But I cannot tell: this same truth is a naked and open day-light, that doth not show the masks and mummeries and triumphs⁴ of the world half so stately and daintily as candle-lights. Truth may perhaps come to the price of a pearl, that showeth best by day; but it will not rise to the price of a diamond or carbuncle,⁵ that showeth best in varied lights. A mixture of a lie doth ever add pleasure.

Doth any man doubt, that if there were taken out of men’s minds vain opinions, flattering hopes, false valuations, imaginations as one would, and the like, but it would leave the minds of a number of men poor shrunk things, full of melancholy and indisposition,¹ and unpleasing to themselves? One of the fathers, in great severity, called poesy vinum daemonum,² because it filleth the imagination; and yet it is but with the shadow of a lie. But it is not the lie that passeth through the mind, but the lie that sinketh in and settleth in it, that doth the hurt; such as we spake of before. But howsoever these things are thus in men's depraved judgments and affections, yet truth, which only doth judge itself, teacheth that the inquiry of truth, which is the love-making, or wooing of it, the knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it, and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature.

The first creature of God, in the works of the days, was the light of the sense; the last, was the light of reason; and His sabbath work³ ever since, is the illumination of his Spirit. First He breathed light upon the face of the matter or chaos; then He breathed light into the face of man; and still He breatheth and inspireth light into the face of His chosen. The poet that beautified the sect that was otherwise inferior to the rest⁴ saith yet excellently well: "It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore, and to see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle, and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below: but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of Truth" (a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene), "and to see the errors, and wanderings, and mists, and tempests, in the vale below";⁵ so always that this prospect be with pity, and not with swelling or pride. Certainly, it is heaven upon earth to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in Providence, and turn upon the poles of truth.

To pass from theological, and philosophical truth to the truth of civil business; it will be acknowledged even by those that practise it not that clear and round⁶ dealing is the honor of man's nature; and that mixture of falsehood is like alloy in coin of gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better, but it embaseth⁷ it. For these winding and crooked courses are the goings of the serpent, which goeth basely upon the belly, and not upon the feet. There is no vice that doth so cover a man with shame as to be found false and perfidious. And therefore Montaigne⁸ saith prettily, when he inquired the reason, why the word of the lie should be such a disgrace and such an odious charge? Saith he, "If it be well weighed, to say that a man lieth, is as much to say, as that he is brave towards God and a coward towards men."⁹ For a lie faces God, and shrinks from man. Surely the wickedness of falsehood and breach of faith cannot possibly be so highly expressed, as in that it shall be the last peal to call the judgments of God upon the generations of men; it being foretold, that when Christ cometh, "He shall not find faith upon the earth."¹⁰

OF MARRIAGE AND SINGLE LIFE

He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief. Yet it were great reason that those that have children should have greatest care of future times; unto which they know they must transmit their dearest pledges. Some there are, who though they lead a single life, yet their thoughts do end with themselves, and account future times impertinences.¹ Nay, there are some other that account wife and children but as bills of charges. Nay more, there are some foolish rich covetous men, that take a pride in having no children, because they may be thought so much the richer. For perhaps they have heard some talk, "Such an one is a great rich man," and another except² to it, "Yea, but he hath a great charge of children"; as if it were an abatement³ to his riches. But the most ordinary cause of a single life is liberty, especially in certain self-pleasing and humorous minds, which are so sensible of every restraint, as they will go near to think their girdles and garters⁴ to be bonds and shackles.

Unmarried men are best friends, best masters, best servants; but not always best subjects; for they are light to run away; and almost all fugitives are of that condition. A single life doth well with churchmen; for charity will hardly water the ground where it must first fill a pool. It is indifferent for judges and magistrates; for if they be facile⁵ and corrupt, you shall have a servant five times worse than a wife. For soldiers, I find the generals commonly in their hortatives⁶ put men in mind of their wives and children; and I think the despising of marriage amongst the Turks maketh the vulgar soldier more base. Certainly wife and children are a kind of discipline of humanity; and single men, though they may be many times more charitable, because their means are less exhaust, yet, on the other side, they are more cruel and hardhearted (good to make severe inquisitors), because their tenderness is not so oft called upon. Grave natures, led by custom, and therefore constant, are commonly loving husbands; as was said of Ulysses, vetulam suam praetulit immortalitati.⁷ Chaste women are often proud and froward,⁸ as presuming upon the merit of their chastity. It is one of the best bonds both of chastity and obedience in the wife, if she think her husband wise; which she will never do if she find him jealous. Wives are young men's mistresses; companions for middle age; and old men's nurses. So as a man may have a quarrel to marry when he will. But yet he was reputed one of the wise men,⁹ that made answer to the question, when a man should marry?—"A young man not yet, an elder man not at all." It is often seen that bad husbands have very good wives; whether it be that it raiseth the price of their husband's kindness when it comes; or that the wives take a pride in their patience. But this never fails, if the bad husbands were of their own choosing, against their friends' consent; for then they will be sure to make good their own folly.

OF STUDIES

(1625 version, modernized)

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability. Their chief use for delight, is in privateness and retiring;¹ for ornament, is in discourse;² and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business. For expert men can execute, and perhaps judge of particulars, one by one; but the general counsels, and the plots and marshalling of affairs, come best from those that are learned. To spend too much time in studies is sloth; to use them too much for ornament, is affectation; to make judgment wholly by their rules, is the humor of a scholar. They perfect nature, and are perfected by experience: for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study; and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. Crafty men contemn³ studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them; for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them, and above them, won by observation. OF LOVE

The stage is more beholding to love, than the life of man. For as to the stage, love is ever matter of comedies, and now and then of tragedies; but in life it doth much mischief; sometimes like a siren, sometimes like a fury.² You may observe, that amongst all the great and worthy persons whereof the memory remaineth, either ancient or recent, there is not one that hath been transported to the mad degree of love: which shows that great spirits and great business do keep out this weak passion. You must except nevertheless Marcus Antonius, the half-partner of the empire of Rome, and Appius Claudius, the decemvir³ and lawgiver; whereof the former was indeed a voluptuous man, and inordinate;⁴ but the latter was an austere and wise man: and therefore it seems (though rarely) that love can find entrance not only into an open heart, but also into a heart well fortified, if watch be not well kept. It is a poor saying of Epicurus, Satis magnum alter alteri theatrum sumus;⁵ as if man, made for the contemplation of heaven and all noble objects, should do nothing but kneel before a little idol, and make himself a subject, though not of the mouth (as beasts are), yet of the eye; which was given him for higher purposes.

It is a strange thing to note the excess of this passion, and how it braves the nature and value of things, by this: that the speaking in a perpetual hyperbole is comely⁶ in nothing but in love. Neither is it merely in the phrase; for whereas it hath been well said that the arch-flatterer, with whom all the petty flatterers have intelligence,⁷ is a man's self; certainly the lover is more. For there was never proud man thought so absurdly well of himself, as the lover doth of the person loved; and therefore it was well said, that "it is impossible to love and to be wise."⁸ Neither doth this weakness appear to others only, and not to the party loved; but to the loved most of all, except the love be reciproque.⁹ For it is a true rule, that love is ever rewarded either with the reciproque or with an inward and secret contempt. By how much the more men ought to beware of this passion, which loseth not only other things, but itself. As for the other losses, the poet's relation doth well figure them; that he that preferred Helena, quitted the gifts of Juno and Pallas.¹⁰ For whosoever esteemeth too much of amorous affection quitteth both riches and wisdom.

This passion hath his floods in very times of weakness, which are great prosperity and great adversity, though this latter hath been less observed: both which times kindle love, and make it more fervent, and therefore show it to be the child of folly. They do best, who if they cannot but admit love, yet make it keep quarter,¹¹ and sever it wholly from their serious affairs,

² siren One of the mythical sea nymphs who lure sailors to destruction with their sweet singing voices; fury One of the three winged goddesses of Greek mythology who punish those who commit unavenged crimes.

³ Marcus Antonius Roman general (83–30 BCE) known for his disastrous love affair with Cleopatra, the Egyptian queen; Appius Claudius Leader of the Roman Republic (c. fifth century BCE), whose love affair with Verginia led to his murder (by her father), which incited a commoner revolt; decemvir One of ten officials responsible for administration in the Roman Republic. This term literally means "man of ten."

⁴ voluptuous Devoted to sensuality or pleasure; inordinate Disorderly.

⁹ reciproque Reciprocal.

and actions of life; for if it check¹ once with business, it troubleth men's fortunes, and maketh men that they can no ways be true to their own ends. I know not how, but martial men are given to love: I think it is but as they are given to wine; for perils commonly ask to be paid in pleasures. There is in man's nature a secret inclination and motion towards love of others, which if it be not spent upon some one or a few, doth naturally spread itself towards many, and maketh men become humane and charitable; as it is seen sometime in friars. Nuptial love maketh mankind; friendly love perfecteth it; but wanton love corrupteth and embaseth² it.

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE

Christopher Marlowe's small body of work—seven plays, as well as a number of poems written during six productive years—profoundly influenced the course of English Renaissance drama. His plays set precedents for English history plays, tragedy, and heroic drama, while his newly supple and powerful blank verse (unrhymed iambic pentameter) impressed Ben Jonson as Marlowe's "mighty line." Had his writing career not been cut so short by a lethal tavern brawl he might have rivaled Shakespeare as the finest dramatist of his age.

Marlowe was born in Canterbury on 26 February 1564, in the same year as Shakespeare. His father was a shoemaker and a bondsman but also an actor; his mother was the daughter of a clergyman—and both theater and theology would help shape him.

Despite his father's fairly humble occupation, Marlowe was well educated, first at King's School, in Canterbury, and then at Cambridge University's Corpus Christi College. His education at Cambridge, which was paid for by a foundation set up by Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, included history, philosophy, and the theology of the Protestant Reformation, one version of which, despite a large and sometimes surreptitiously active Catholic minority, was now the orthodoxy of the officially established Church of England. In 1584 he earned his B.A.

During the latter part of his time at Cambridge, Marlowe frequently disappeared for extended periods. It is likely, some historians believe, that Marlowe had been recruited as a spy by Queen Elizabeth's Privy Council, which had longstanding fears of subversive Catholic activity at home and abroad. He spent time in the French city of Rheims, a refuge for many English Catholic expatriates, and perhaps helped uncover a Catholic plot to assassinate Elizabeth. This theory is strengthened by the actions of the Council upon Marlowe's return to England. Marlowe applied for his M.A., a degree normally granted automatically upon application once a certain amount of time had elapsed since the granting of a B.A., but the university refused him on multiple grounds. Not only had Marlowe failed to pursue ordination after his theological studies (as was expected of theology students); he had also spent considerable time among Catholics in France, and was therefore suspected of Catholic sympathies. Marlowe asked the Privy Council to intercede on his behalf and it obliged by sending a letter to the Cambridge authorities indicating that Marlowe "had done Her Majesty good service, & deserved to be rewarded for his faithful dealing." Moreover, says the letter severely, "it was not Her Majesty's pleasure that anyone employed, as [Marlowe] had been, in matters touching the benefit of his country, should be defamed by those that are ignorant in th' affairs he went about." Marlowe was granted his M.A. in 1587.

In the same year, Marlowe left Cambridge and moved to London to pursue his career as a playwright. His London years were marked by violence. In 1589 he spent two weeks in Newgate Prison, charged with the murder of one William Bradley, although he was acquitted and released, and in 1592 court records indicate that he was implicated in a street fight in which another man was killed. Through these same years, however, Marlowe's career soared. He had the luxury of being hired by the Lord Admiral's Company, which meant that the finest of London's actors would perform his plays. His first major plays, including Tamburlaine the Great—a grandiloquently written and violence-filled play—were produced in 1587 and were wildly popular. Over the next six years Marlowe completed at least five more plays: The Jew of Malta (c. 1589), Edward II (c. 1592), The Massacre of Paris (printed c. 1593), Dido, Queen of Carthage (printed in 1594), and The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus (?1593). In recent decades Edward II has drawn critical notice for its ambivalent portrayal of homoerotic love in conflict with political and marital duty, while the darkly comic Jew of Malta, whose Christians are quite as wicked as the Jewish protagonist, is significant in understanding early modern English views of the Jew as “other.” Faustus, however, remains the most widely read and performed of Marlowe’s plays. Based on an old Czech and German legend, the play presents a scholar who sells his soul to the devil in exchange for knowledge and power. As always, this proves a bad bargain: Faustus fritters away his power on pointless magic tricks and must, eventually, disappear in anguish into Hell. Marlowe’s sympathies are hard to identify: the play may be read as orthodox (the anti-Catholic humor would not displease audiences or ecclesiastical authorities in England) but it may also raise difficult questions about free will and an implacable God.

Marlowe is also known for his poetry, including translations from Lucan’s Pharsalia and Ovid’s Amores. His most famous English poems are the unfinished “Hero and Leander,” a tragic love story lightened by witty rhymes, outrageous metaphors, and a view of erotic love at once skeptical and sympathetic, and “The Passionate Shepherd to His Love,” a poem based in part on Virgil’s homoerotic Second Eclogue (Marlowe’s version was soon treated as entirely heterosexual but recent criticism has noted its ambiguity in this regard). Unfortunately, piecing together Marlowe’s oeuvre is a complicated matter. We have, for example, two quite different versions of Doctor Faustus (1604 and 1616).

Marlowe’s death on 30 May 1593 has been the subject of much controversy. According to the coroner’s report, Marlowe and a number of his acquaintances were dining at Eleanor Bull’s House, a tavern just outside London. A heated argument arose between Marlowe and a fellow diner, Ingram Frizer, over the bill. The report states that Marlowe attacked Frizer with a knife and injured him on the back of the head. Frizer wrested the knife from Marlowe’s grasp and sank its blade two inches into Marlowe’s skull, just above the right eye. Marlowe died instantly. Was there a conspiracy behind this? Marlowe had maintained connections from his spying days and at the time of his death was in the presence of men with connections to his former employer, Sir Francis Walsingham, who as Secretary of State was responsible for the government’s intelligence operations. Marlowe had recently been arrested on charges of atheism (an imprecisely defined offence which could be laid against anyone expressing unorthodox theological opinions) and was due to go on trial in a few days. Some scholars have speculated that members of the government feared that Marlowe would identify other “atheists” in high positions or perhaps reveal espionage secrets should he appear in a court of law, and so had him assassinated.

Marlowe was buried in an unmarked grave on the grounds of St. Nicholas’s Church, Deptford, on 1 June 1593. Not until July 2002, more than 400 years after he died, was he memorialized in the prestigious Poet’s Corner of Westminster Abbey.

Hero and Leander

Christopher Marlowe’s Hero and Leander is an epyllion, or little epic. Marlowe evokes the epic tradition in his very first lines, where he mentions the Hellespont, the narrow strait that divides Europe from Asia, Greece from Troy. But Marlowe soon reveals that his is not a story of imperialist conquest, but of sexual conquest. From the high style of classical epic, Marlowe rapidly brings his readers down to earth—into a very different kind of poetic world, characterized by fervent erotic desires (both heterosexual and homosexual), sex, rapid shifts of mood and tone, and characters that fluctuate between apparent sexual sophistication and comic naiveté. Even in its darkest moments, the poem undercuts its own seriousness with Marlowe's spirit of excess, humor, and irreverence.

The story of the tragic lovers Hero and Leander was very popular in the period; it was, according to one contemporary, "in every man's mouth." Musaeus, a poet of the fifth or early sixth century CE, had written a version of the Hero and Leander story in Greek that enjoyed widespread popularity in the Renaissance, first through a translation into Latin, and then through numerous adaptations in vernacular languages such as Italian, French, and Spanish. One reason for Musaeus's popularity was that most Renaissance writers and printers mistakenly believed that he was a much earlier poet of the same name, a semi-mythic student of Orpheus whom Virgil mentions in the underworld (Aeneid, Book VI). As "the most ancient poet," Musaeus seemed to demand a reverence that Marlowe's poem delights in flouting.

A very different sort of classical poet—the Roman poet Ovid (43 BCE—c. 17 CE)—was a major influence on Marlowe's peculiarly subversive tone and subject matter. Ovid told a version of the Hero and Leander story in his Herioides; but his collection of love poems, the Amores, may have exerted at least as strong an influence on Marlowe's Hero and Leander. While still in college at Cambridge, Marlowe had translated Ovid's Amores, which similarly treats erotic subject matter mischievously against a backdrop of the high seriousness of epic. "Love slacked my Muse," Ovid's narrator explains in Marlowe's translation, "and made my numbers soft." In his translation of the Roman poet, Marlowe used heroic couplets (rhyming pairs of lines in iambic pentameter)—the same meter that he would employ in Hero and Leander.

Until the late twentieth century Marlowe's poem was generally read as a fragment; it ends with his lovers' sexual consummation, rather than with their tragic deaths (as does the story in his sources). When George Chapman "finished" Marlowe's poem in 1598, he assumed that what Marlowe had written was very far from complete; he added to Marlowe's 818 lines an additional 1,558 lines, and brought the story to the tragic conclusion that readers had come to expect from the many other versions of the story. Whatever the pleasures of his version, Chapman's poem is less subversive and less Ovidian than Marlowe's over-the-top work. Did Marlowe in fact intend to extend the story so as to bring it to its expected conclusion? We will of course never know, but numerous scholars have suggested that the poem may best be read as a unified whole rather than under the presumption that it is a fragment. Read in this way, the poem ends with the sort of defiant disregard of convention that is characteristic of so much of Marlowe's work—and with a flamboyant emphasis on the lovers' erotic physicality.

¹ Hero and Leander The textual history of Hero and Leander is contested, but the central facts are relatively straightforward. The first extant reference to the poem is the listing of it in the Stationers' Register some four months after Marlowe's death; an entry on 28 September 1593 lists "a book entitled Hero and Leander, being an amorous poem devised by Christopher Marlowe" (with no indication of the work being anything other than a complete poem rather than an unfinished work). The poem appears to have circulated in manuscript over the course of the next five years.

Then, in 1598, two printed works appear. One contains the poem much as it appears below; the title page reads "Hero and Leander. By Christopher Marlowe. London, Printed by Adam Islip, for Edward Blunt. 1598." At the conclusion of what is printed in this edition appear the words Desunt nonnulla (Latin: "Some things are missing")—evidently a note by the printer. A second 1598 publication, from later in the year (after the poem's copyright had been reassigned), is described on the title page as "begun by Christopher Marlowe, and finished by George Chapman." Chapman's version divides the Marlowe text into two sections, and adds four more sections (written in a style described by Chapman as "more grave and high"); in this greatly lengthened version, the story ends in the same way it ends in the sources.

The present text, which has been edited for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by Rachel Eisendrath, is based on that of the Blunt (or Blount, as it has more often been spelled) edition of 1598; the section breaks and other changes made in the George Chapman edition of the same year are not included. Spelling and punctuation have been modernized in accordance with the practice of this anthology.

² Hellespont Now called the Dardanelles, narrow strait in Turkey between the Aegean Sea and the Marmara sea. One bank lies in Europe, one in Asia.

³ Neptune Roman god of the sea.

⁴ Abydos Ancient city on the Asian bank.

⁵ Sestos Ancient city on the European bank.

⁶ Apollo Greek and Roman sun god.

⁷ lawn Fine linen.

Her wide sleeves green, and bordered⁸ with embroidered
 a grove,
 Where Venus⁸ in her naked glory strove
 To please the careless and disdainful eyes
 Of proud Adonis,⁹ that before her lies;
 15 Her kirtle⁹ blue, whereon was many a stain, skirt
 Made with the blood of wretched lovers slain.
 Upon her head she ware⁹ a myrtle wreath, wore
 From whence her veil reached to the ground beneath.
 Her veil was artificial flowers and leaves,
 20 Whose workmanship both man and beast deceives;
 Many would praise the sweet smell as she passed,
 When 'twas the odor which her breath forth cast;
 And there for honey, bees have sought in vain,
 And, beat from thence, have lighted there again.
 25 About her neck hung chains of pebble-stone,
 Which, lightened⁹ by her neck, like diamonds lit up shone.
 She ware no gloves, for neither sun nor wind
 Would burn or parch her hands, but to her mind¹⁰
 Or⁹ warm or cool them, for they took delight either
 30 To play upon those hands, they were so white.
 Buskins⁹ of shells all silvered used she, boots
 And branched with blushing coral to the knee,
 Where sparrows perched, of hollow pearl and gold,
 Such as the world would wonder to behold;
 35 Those with sweet water oft her handmaid fills,
 Which, as she went, would chirrup through the bills.
 Some say, for her the fairest Cupid pined,
 And looking in her face, was strooken⁹ blind. struck
 But this is true: so like was one the other,
 40 As he imagined Hero was his mother;¹¹
 And oftentimes into her bosom flew,
 About her naked neck his bare arms threw,
 And laid his childish head upon her breast,
 And with still⁹ panting rocked, there took his rest. constant
 45 So lovely fair was Hero, Venus's nun,¹²
 As Nature wept, thinking she was undone,

⁸ Venus Roman goddess of love.

⁹ Adonis Adonis was a beautiful youth who scorned Venus's love and died in a boar hunt. The story is told by Ovid in his Metamorphoses (1 CE) and by Shakespeare in his Venus and Adonis (1593).

¹⁰ to her mind As she chose.

¹¹ Hero ... mother Cupid's mother was Venus.

¹² Venus's nun Hero was a priestess of Venus.

Because she took more from her than she left
 And of such wondrous beauty her bereft;
 Therefore, in sign her treasure suffered wrack,^o wreck
 50 Since Hero's time hath half the world been black.
 Amorous Leander, beautiful and young
 (Whose tragedy divine Musaeus¹ sung)
 Dwelt at Abydos; since him dwelt there none
 For whom succeeding times make greater moan.
 55 His dangling tresses that were never shorn,
 Had they been cut and unto Colchos² borne,
 Would have allured the vent'rous youth of Greece
 To hazard more than for the Golden Fleece.
 Fair Cynthia³ wished his arms might be her sphere;^o orbit
 60 Grief makes her pale because she moves not there.
 His body was as straight as Circe's wand;⁴
 Jove⁵ might have sipped out nectar from his hand.
 Even as delicious meat is to the taste,
 So was his neck in touching, and surpassed
 65 The white of Pelops' shoulder.⁶ I could tell ye
 How smooth his breast was, and how white his belly,
 And whose immortal fingers did imprint
 That heavenly path with many a curious^o dint, exquisite
 That runs along his back, but my rude⁷ pen
 70 Can hardly blazon forth the loves of men,
 Much less of powerful gods; let it suffice
 That my slack^o muse sings of Leander's eyes, weak
 Those orient^o cheeks and lips, exceeding his radiant
 That leapt into the water for a kiss
 75 Of his own shadow, and despising many,
 Died ere he could enjoy the love of any.⁸

¹ Musaeus Greek poet (fifth or sixth century CE) who wrote an early version of the Hero and Leander story.

² Colchos Colchis, a district now in western Georgia, where the Argonauts (the "vent'rous youth") were said to have found the Golden Fleece.

³ Cynthia Moon.

⁴ Circe's wand In Homer's Odyssey, Circe turns Odysseus's crew into pigs with her wand.

⁵ Jove Supreme Roman god.

⁶ Pelops' shoulder In Ovid, Pelops was cut into pieces by his father, Tantalus, and served to the gods. The gods put him back together, except for his shoulder, which had already been eaten. They fashioned a new one out of ivory for him.

⁷ rude Unskilled.

⁸ his ... any Reference to Narcissus, who fell in love with his own reflection in the water and drowned.

Had wild Hippolytus⁹ Leander seen,
 Enamored of his beauty had he been;
 His presence made the rudest peasant melt,
 80 That in the vast uplandish country dwelt;
 The barbarous Thracian soldier, moved with naught,
 Was moved with him, and for his favor sought.
 Some swore he was a maid in man's attire,
 For in his looks were all that men desire:
 85 A pleasant smiling cheek, a speaking^o eye, expressive
 A brow for love to banquet royally;
 And such as knew he was a man would say,
 "Leander, thou art made for amorous play;
 Why art thou not in love, and loved of all?
 90 Though thou be fair, yet be not thine own thrall."
 The men of wealthy Sestos every year,
 For his sake whom their goddess held so dear,
 Rose-cheeked Adonis, kept a solemn feast.
 Thither resorted many a wand'ring guest
 95 To meet their loves; such as had none at all
 Came lovers home from this great festival,
 For every street, like to a firmament,
 Glistered with breathing stars, who where they went Frighted the melancholy earth, which deemed 100 Eternal heaven to burn, for so it seemed
 As if another Phaëton¹⁰ had got
 The guidance of the sun's rich chariot.
 But far above the loveliest Hero shined,
 And stole away th' enchanted gazer's mind;
 105 For like sea nymphs¹¹ inveigling harmony,
 So was her beauty to the standers by.
 Nor that night-wand'ring pale and watery star¹²
 (When yawning dragons draw her thirling car^o whirling chariot
 From Latmus's mount¹³ up to the gloomy sky,
 110 Where crowned with blazing light and majesty,
 She proudly sits) more over-rules the flood

⁹ Hippolytus Exceedingly beautiful young man in Greek mythology.

¹⁰ Phaëton Son of the Greek sun god Apollo. Phaëton drives the sun chariot so badly that Zeus blasts him from the sky to prevent him from setting fire to the earth.

¹¹ sea nymphs I.e., the Sirens, whose songs lured sailors to shipwreck on this island.

¹² night-wand'ring ... star Moon.

¹³ Latmus's mount Diana, the Roman moon goddess, nightly visited her sleeping beloved Endymion on Mount Latmus.

Than she the hearts of those that near her stood.
 Even as when gaudy nymphs pursue the chase,^o hunt
 Wretched Ixion's shaggy-footed race,¹
 115 Incensed with savage heat, gallop amain
 From steep pine-bearing mountains to the plain,
 So ran the people forth to gaze upon her,
 And all that viewed her were enamored on her.
 And as in fury of a dreadful fight,
 120 Their fellows being slain or put to flight,
 Poor soldiers stand with fear of death dead-strooken,
 So at her presence all surprised and taken
 Await the sentence of her scornful eyes;
 He whom she favors lives, the other dies.
 125 There might you see one sigh, another rage,
 And some, their violent passions to assuage,
 Compile sharp satires, but alas too late,
 For faithful love will never turn to hate.
 And many, seeing great princes were denied,
 130 Pined as they went, and thinking on her, died.
 On this feast day, oh cursed day and hour!
 Went Hero thorough^o Sestos, from her tower through
 To Venus's temple, where unhappily,
 As after chanced, they did each other spy.
 135 So fair a church as this had Venus none:
 The walls were of discolored^o jasper stone, multicolored
 Wherein was Proteus² carved, and o'erhead
 A lively^o vine of green sea agate spread, lifelike
 Where, by one hand, light-headed Bacchus³ hung, 140 And with the other, wine from grapes out-wrung.
 Of crystal shining fair the pavement was;
 The town of Sestos called it Venus's glass;^o mirror
 There might you see the gods in sundry shapes,
 Committing heady riots, incest, rapes:
 145 For know that underneath this radiant floor
 Was Danaë's statue in a brazen tower,
 Jove slyly stealing from his sister's bed
 To dally with Idalian Ganymede,
 And for his love Europa bellowing loud,

150 And tumbling with the rainbow in a cloud;⁴
 Blood-quaffing Mars heaving the iron net
 Which limping Vulcan and his Cyclops set;⁵
 Love kindling fire to burn such towns as Troy;⁶
 Sylvanus weeping for the lovely boy⁷
 155 That now is turned into a cypress tree,
 Under whose shade the wood gods love to be.
 And in the midst a silver altar stood;
 There Hero sacrificing turtles'⁸ blood,
 Vailed^o to the ground, veiling her eyelids close, bowed
 160 And modestly they opened as she rose;
 Thence flew love's arrow with the golden head,
 And thus Leander was enamored.
 Stone still he stood, and evermore he gazed,
 Till with the fire that from his countenance blazed,
 165 Relenting Hero's gentle heart was strook;
 Such force and virtue^o hath an amorous look. power
 It lies not in our power to love or hate,
 For will in us is overruled by fate.
 When two are stripped, long ere the course⁹ begin 170 We wish that one should lose, the other win;
 And one especially do we affect^o prefer
 Of two gold ingots,^o like in each respect. blocks of gold
 The reason no man knows; let it suffice,
 What we behold is censured^o by our eyes. judged
 175 Where both deliberate, the love is slight;
 Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight?
 He kneeled, but unto her devoutly prayed;
 Chaste Hero to herself thus softly said,
 "Were I the saint he worships, I would hear him,"
 180 And as she spake those words, came somewhat near him.

¹ Ixion's ... race Centaurs, fathered by Ixion, who was condemned to be bound to a burning wheel for all eternity.

² Proteus Greek lesser sea god able to change his shape rapidly.

³ Bacchus Roman god of wine.

⁴ Danaë's ... cloud Chronicle of the amorous exploits of Jove. He impregnated Danaë as a shower of gold while she was locked in a tower, married his sister Juno, kidnapped the beautiful youth Ganymede on Mount Ida, seduced Europa while in the form of a bull, and had a tryst with Iris, goddess of the rainbow (although this last conquest is a Renaissance addition to the myth).

⁵ Blood-quaffing ... set Vulcan, god of fire, used a net to catch his wife Venus in an affair with Mars, god of war. The Cyclopes were his assistants.

⁶ Love ... Troy Paris's abduction of Helen of Troy caused the Trojan Wars.

⁷ lovely boy The Roman wood god Sylvanus loved Cyparissus, who was turned into a cypress tree.

⁸ turtles Turtledoves, a symbol of fidelity.

⁹ course I.e., race course.

He started up; she blushed as one ashamed,
 Wherewith Leander much more was inflamed.
 He touched her hand; in touching it she trembled:
 Love deeply groundèd hardly is dissembled.¹
 185 These lovers parlèd° by the touch of hands; spoke
 True love is mute, and oft amazèd stands.
 Thus, while dumb signs their yielding hearts entangled,
 The air with sparks of living fire was spangled,
 And Night, deep drenched in misty Acheron,²
 190 Heaved up her head, and half the world upon
 Breathed darkness forth (dark night is Cupid's day),
 And now begins Leander to display
 Love's holy fire, with words, with sighs and tears,
 Which like sweet music entered Hero's ears,
 195 And yet at every word she turned aside
 And always cut him off as he replied.
 At last, like to a bold sharp sophister,³
 With cheerful hope thus he accosted her:
 "Fair creature, let me speak without offense;
 200 I would my rude words had the influence
 To lead thy thoughts as thy fair looks do mine;
 Then shouldst thou be his prisoner, who is thine.
 Be not unkind and fair; misshapen stuff⁴
 Are of behavior boisterous and rough.
 205 O shun me not, but hear me ere you go;
 God knows I cannot force° love, as you do. compel
 My words shall be as spotless as my youth,
 Full of simplicity and naked truth.
 This sacrifice, whose sweet perfume descending 210 From Venus's altar to your footsteps bending,° turning
 Doth testify that you exceed her far
 To whom you offer and whose nun you are.
 Why should you worship her? Her you surpass
 As much as sparkling diamonds flaring° glass. gaudy
 215 A diamond set in lead his worth retains;
 A heavenly nymph, beloved of human swains,° shepherds
 Receives no blemish but oftentimes more grace,
 Which makes me hope, although I am but base,
 Base in respect of⁵ thee, divine and pure,

220 Dutiful service may thy love procure;
 And I in duty will excel all other,
 As thou in beauty dost exceed Love's mother.° Venus
 Nor heaven, nor thou, were made to gaze upon;
 As heaven preserves all things, so save thou one.
 225 A stately builded ship, well-rigged and tall,
 The ocean maketh more majestic;
 Why vowest thou then to live in Sestos here,
 Who on Love's seas more glorious wouldst appear?
 Like untuned golden strings all women are,
 230 Which, long time lie untouched, will harshly jar.⁶
 Vessels of brass, oft handled, brightly shine;
 What difference betwixt the richest mine
 And basest mold,° but use? for both, not used, earth
 Are of like worth. Then treasure is abused
 235 When misers keep it; being put to loan,⁷
 In time it will return us two for one.
 Rich robes themselves and others do adorn;
 Neither themselves nor others, if not worn.
 Who builds a palace and rams up the gate
 240 Shall see it ruinous and desolate.
 Ah, simple Hero, learn thyself to cherish;
 Lone women, like to empty houses, perish.
 Less sins the poor rich man that starves himself
 In heaping up a mass of drossy pelf,⁸
 245 Than such as you: his golden earth remains,
 Which after his decease some other gains,
 But this fair gem, sweet in the loss alone,
 When you fleet hence⁹ can be bequeathed to none.
 Or if it could, down from th' enameled° sky glossy
 250 All heaven would come to claim this legacy,
 And with intestine broils¹⁰ the world destroy
 And quite confound Nature's sweet harmony.
 Well therefore by the gods decreed it is,
 We human creatures should enjoy that bliss.
 255 One is no number;¹¹ maids are nothing then
 Without the sweet society of men.

⁶ harshly jar Sound discordant.

⁷ put to loan Invested.

⁸ drossy pelf Gold ore that has not yet been refined; worthless wealth.

⁹ fleet hence Die.

¹⁰ intestine broils Civil wars.

¹¹ One ... number Aristotelian mathematical idea.

² Acheron River in the underworld.

³ sophister Here, student or scholar adept at rhetoric.

⁴ misshapen stuff Human beings.

⁵ in respect of Compared to.

Wilt thou live single still? One shalt thou be,
 Though never-singling Hymen¹ couple thee.
 Wild savages, that drink of running springs,
 260 Think water far excels all earthly things;
 But they that daily taste neat^o wine despise it. pure
 Virginity, albeit some highly prize it,
 Compared with marriage, had you tried them both,
 Differs as much as wine and water doth.
 265 Base bullion for the stamp's sake we allow,²
 Even so for men's impression do we you;
 By which alone, our reverend fathers say,
 Women receive perfection every way.
 This idol which you term Virginity
 270 Is neither essence,^o subject to the eye, a real thing
 No, nor to any one exterior sense;
 Nor hath it any place of residence,
 Nor is 't of earth or mold^o celestial, form
 Or capable of any form at all.
 275 Of that which hath no being, do not boast:
 Things that are not at all are never lost.
 Men foolishly do call it virtuous;
 What virtue is it that is born with us?³
 Much less can honor be ascribed thereto:
 280 Honor is purchased by the deeds we do.
 Believe me, Hero, honor is not won
 Until some honorable deed be done.
 Seek you for chastity, immortal fame,
 And know that some have wronged Diana's name:⁴
 285 Whose name is it, if she be false or not,
 So she be fair, but some vile tongues will blot?
 But you are fair, aye me! so wondrous fair,
 So young, so gentle, and so debonair,^o pleasant
 As Greece will think, if thus you live alone,
 290 Some one or other keeps you as his own.
 Then, Hero, hate me not, nor from me fly
 To follow swiftly-blasting infamy.
 Perhaps thy sacred priesthood makes thee loath.
 Tell me, to whom madest thou that heedless oath?"

² Base ... allow We allow poorer metal to gain worth by being stamped as coins.

³ What ... us? Virtues can only be acquired. We are not born with them.

⁴ Seek ... name? Even Diana, the Roman goddess of chastity, could not prove her chastity when it was slandered.

295 "To Venus," answered she, and as she spake,
 Forth from those two tralucient cisterns⁵ brake
 A stream of liquid pearl, which down her face
 Made milk-white paths, whereon the gods might trace^o follow
 To Jove's high court. He thus replied: "The rites
 300 In which Love's beauteous empress most delights
 Are banquets, Doric music,⁶ midnight revel,
 Plays, masques, and all that stern age counteth evil.
 Thee as a holy idiot doth she scorn,
 For thou, in vowing chastity, hast sworn,
 305 To rob her name and honor, and thereby
 Commit'st a sin far worse than perjury,
 Even sacrilege against her Deity,
 Through regular and formal purity.
 To expiate which sin, kiss and shake hands;
 310 Such sacrifice as this Venus demands."
 Thereat she smiled and did deny him so
 As put^o thereby, yet might he hope for mo.^o put aside / more
 Which makes him quickly reinforce his speech
 And her in humble manner thus beseech:
 315 "Though neither gods nor men may thee deserve,
 Yet for her sake whom you have vowed to serve,
 Abandon fruitless, cold Virginity,
 The gentle queen of Love's sole enemy.
 Then shall you most resemble Venus' nun,
 320 When Venus's sweet rites are performed and done.
 Flint-breasted Pallas⁷ joys in single life,
 But Pallas and your mistress are at strife.
 Love, Hero, then, and be not tyrannous,
 But heal the heart that thou hast wounded thus,
 325 Nor stain thy youthful years with avarice;
 Fair fools delight to be accounted nice.^o coy
 The richest corn^o dies if it be not reaped; grain
 Beauty alone is lost, too warily kept."

These arguments he used, and many more,
 330 Wherewith she yielded, that was won before.⁸
 Hero's looks yielded, but her words made war;
 Women are won when they begin to jar.^o argue
 Thus, having swallowed Cupid's golden hook,

⁵ tralucient cisterns Translucent eyes.

⁶ Doric music Militaristic music.

⁷ Pallas Athena, Greek virgin goddess of wisdom and war, often depicted dressed in armor.

⁸ that ... before I.e., she was, privately, already convinced.

The more she strived, the deeper was she strook.
 335 Yet, evilly feigning anger, strove she still
 And would be thought to grant against her will.
 So having paused a while, at last she said:
 "Who taught thee rhetoric to deceive a maid?
 Aye me, such words as these should I abhor,
 340 And yet I like them for the orator."
 With that, Leander stooped to have embraced her,
 But from his spreading arms away she cast her,^o herself
 And thus bespake him: "Gentle youth, forbear
 To touch the sacred garments which I wear.
 345 Upon a rock, and underneath a hill,
 Far from the town, where all is whist^o and still, hushed
 Save that the sea, playing on yellow sand,
 Sends forth a rattling murmur to the land,
 Whose sound allures the golden Morpheus¹
 350 In silence of the night to visit us,
 My turret stands, and there, God knows, I play
 With Venus' swans and sparrows² all the day.
 A dwarfish beldame^o bears me company, old woman
 That hops about the chamber where I lie
 355 And spends the night, that might be better spent,
 In vain discourse and apish^o merriment. foolish
 Come thither." As she spake this, her tongue tripped,
 For unawares "Come thither" from her slipped,
 And suddenly her former color changed,
 360 And here and there her eyes through anger ranged.
 And like a planet, moving several^o ways,³ various
 At one self^o instant, she, poor soul, assays^o same / tries
 Loving, not to love at all, and every part
 Strove to resist the motions of her heart;
 365 And hands so pure, so innocent, nay, such
 As might have made heaven stoop to have a touch,
 Did she uphold to Venus, and again
 Vowed spotless chastity, but all in vain.
 Cupid beats down her prayers with his wings;
 370 Her vows above the empty air he flings.
 All deep enraged, his sinewy^o bow he bent, tough
 And shot a shaft that burning from him went,
 Wherewith she, strooken, looked so dolefully,

¹ Morpheus Roman god of sleep and dreams.

² swans and sparrows Venus's chariot was drawn by swans and sparrows.

³ several ways According to ancient astronomy, the planets moved around the earth within their own orbits and were also affected by the movement of other heavenly bodies.

As made Love sigh to see his tyranny.
 375 And as she wept, her tears to pearl he turned,
 And wound them on his arm, and for her mourned.
 Then towards the palace of the Destinies,⁴
 Laden with languishment and grief, he flies,
 And to those stern nymphs humbly made request
 380 Both might enjoy each other and be blessed.
 But with a ghastly dreadful countenance,
 Threatening a thousand deaths at every glance,
 They answered Love, nor would vouchsafe so much
 As one poor word, their hate to him was such.
 385 Harken a while, and I will tell you why:
 Heaven's wingèd herald, Jove-born Mercury,⁵
 The selfsame day that he asleep had laid
 Enchanted Argus,⁶ spied a country maid
 Whose careless hair, instead of pearl t' adorn it,
 390 Glistered with dew, as one that seemed to scorn it,⁷
 Her breath as fragrant as the morning rose,
 Her mind pure, and her tongue untaught to glose.^o flatter
 Yet proud she was, for lofty pride that dwells
 In towered courts is oft in shepherds' cells,
 395 And too too well the fair vermilion^o knew, bright red
 And silver tincture of her cheeks, that drew
 The love of every swain. On her, this god
 Enamored was, and with his snaky rod⁸
 Did charm her nimble feet and made her stay;
 400 The while upon a hillock down he lay,
 And sweetly on his pipe began to play,
 And with smooth speech, her fancy to assay,
 Till in his twining arms he locked her fast,
 And then he wooed with kisses, and at last,
 405 As shepherds do, her on the ground he laid,
 And tumbling in the grass, he often strayed
 Beyond the bounds of shame, in being bold
 To eye those parts which no eye should behold,
 And like an insolent commanding lover,

⁴ Destinies Fates, three female entities in Greek mythology who controlled the destiny of all humans.

⁵ Mercury Roman messenger god, called Hermes by the Greeks. Mercury was depicted with winged feet.

⁶ Enchanted Argus Giant often depicted with many eyes, placed by Juno as a guard over Io to keep her away from Jupiter. Mercury put Argus to sleep.

⁷ it Pearl.

⁸ snaky rod Snake-entwined rod held by Mercury.

410 Boasting his parentage, would needs discover
 The way to new Elysium;¹ but she,
 Whose only dower was her chastity,
 Having striv'n in vain, was now about to cry
 And crave the help of shepherds that were nigh.
 415 Herewith he stayed his fury^o and began passion
 To give her leave to rise. Away she ran;
 After went Mercury, who used such cunning
 As she, to hear his tale, left off her running.
 Maids are not won by brutish force and might,
 420 But speeches full of pleasure and delight.
 And knowing Hermes courted her, was glad
 That she such loveliness and beauty had
 As could provoke his liking, yet was mute,
 And neither would deny nor grant his suit.
 425 Still vowed he love; she, wanting no excuse
 To feed him with delays, as women use,
 Or thirsting after immortality
 (All women are ambitious naturally),
 Imposed upon her lover such a task
 430 As he ought not perform, nor yet she ask.
 A draft of flowing nectar she requested,
 Wherewith the king of gods and men is feasted.
 He, ready to accomplish what she willed,
 Stole some from Hebe² (Hebe Jove's cup filled)
 435 And gave it to his simple rustic love,
 Which being known (as what is hid from Jove?)
 He inly^o stormed and waxed more furious inwardly
 Than for the fire filched by Prometheus,³
 And thrusts him down from heaven. He, wand'ring here,
 440 In mournful terms, with sad and heavy cheer,⁴
 Complained to Cupid. Cupid, for his sake,
 To be revenged on Jove did undertake;
 And those on whom heaven, earth, and hell relies
 (I mean the adamant^o Destinies) unyielding
 445 He wounds with love and forced them equally
 To dote upon deceitful Mercury.
 They offered him the deadly fatal knife

That shears the slender threads of human life;⁵
 At his fair feathered feet the engines^o laid instruments
 450 Which th' earth from ugly Chaos's den upweighed.⁶
 These he regarded not, but did entreat
 That Jove, usurper of his father's seat,
 Might presently be banished into hell,
 And agèd Saturn in Olympus dwell.
 455 They granted what he craved, and once again
 Saturn and Ops began their golden reign.⁷
 Murder, rape, war, lust, and treachery
 Were with Jove closed in Stygian empery.^o underworld
 But long this blessed time continued not;
 460 As soon as he his wishèd purpose got,
 He, reckless of his promise, did despise
 The love of th' everlasting Destinies.
 They seeing it, both Love and him abhorred,
 And Jupiter unto his place restored.
 465 And but that Learning, in despite of Fate,
 Will mount aloft and enter heaven gate,
 And to the seat of Jove itself advance,
 Hermes had slept in hell with Ignorance.
 Yet as a punishment they added this,
 470 That he and Poverty should always kiss.⁸
 And to this day is every scholar poor;
 Gross gold from them runs headlong to the boor.
 Likewise the angry sisters, thus deluded,
 To venge themselves on Hermes, have concluded
 475 That Midas' brood⁹ shall sit in Honor's chair,
 To which the Muses' sons are only heir.
 And fruitful wits, that inaspiring¹⁰ are

⁵ knife ... life The Fate Atropos caused a human death by cutting the thread of life.

⁶ engines ... upweighed The Fates were also said to be in charge of the pillars that held up the world since it emerged from Chaos.

⁷ Saturn ... reign Along with his consort Ops, Saturn was ruler of the gods during the Golden Age before his son Jove overcame him. Marlowe apparently invented this story of Saturn and Ops's temporary return to power.

⁸ Learning ... kiss Myth invented by Marlowe. Mercury (referred to here by his Greek name Hermes) is identified as god of learning. Mercury sleeps "in hell with Ignorance," yet Learning is so great a power that it raises him up to heaven ("the seat of Jove") despite the wishes of the Fates. The Fates punish Mercury for his inconstancy, linking Learning with Poverty.

⁹ Midas' brood I.e., the rich and the foolish.

¹⁰ inaspiring I.e., those that do not aspire toward wealth or honor.

¹ Elysium Section of the underworld in Greek mythology reserved for heroes. In the Renaissance this term could refer to Paradise.

² Hebe Greek goddess of youth, cupbearer for the gods.

³ Prometheus Greek Titan who stole fire from the gods.

⁴ terms Condition; cheer Expression.

Shall discontent run into regions far;
 And few great lords in virtuous deeds shall joy,
 480 But be surprised with every garish toy,
 And still enrich the lofty servile clown,^o boor
 Who, with encroaching guile, keeps learning down.
 Then muse not¹ Cupid's suit no better sped,
 Seeing in their loves the Fates were injured.
 485 By this, sad Hero, with love unacquainted,
 Viewing Leander's face, fell down and fainted.
 He kissed her and breathed life into her lips,
 Wherewith, as one displeased, away she trips.
 Yet as she went, full often looked behind,
 490 And many poor excuses did she find
 To linger by the way, and once she stayed,
 And would have turned again, but was afraid,
 In offering parley to be counted light.²
 So on she goes, and in her idle flight
 495 Her painted fan of curlèd plumes let fall,
 Thinking to train^o Leander therewithal. lure
 He, being a novice, knew not what she meant
 But stayed, and after her a letter sent,
 Which joyful Hero answered in such sort
 500 As he had hope to scale the beauteous fort
 Wherein the liberal Graces³ locked their wealth,
 And therefore to her tower he got by stealth.
 Wide open stood the door; he need not climb,
 And she herself before the pointed^o time appointed
 505 Had spread the board,⁴ with roses strewed the room,
 And oft looked out, and mused he did not come.
 At last he came; O who can tell the greeting
 These greedy lovers had at their first meeting?
 He asked, she gave, and nothing was denied;
 510 Both to each other quickly were affied.^o betrothed
 Look how their hands, so were their hearts united,
 And what he did she willingly requited.
 (Sweet are the kisses, the embracements sweet,
 When like desires and affections meet,
 515 For from the earth to heaven is Cupid raised,
 Where fancy is in equal balance peised.)^o weighed
 Yet she this rashness suddenly repented
 And turned aside and to herself lamented,

As if her name and honor had been wronged
 520 By being possessed of him for whom she longed.
 Ay, and she wished, albeit not from her heart,
 That he would leave her turret and depart.
 The mirthful god of amorous pleasure smiled
 To see how he this captive nymph beguiled,
 525 For hitherto he did but fan the fire
 And kept it down that it might mount the higher.
 Now waxed she jealous lest his love abated,
 Fearing her own thoughts made her to be hated.
 Therefore unto him hastily she goes
 530 And, like light Salmacis,⁵ her body throws
 Upon his bosom where, with yielding eyes,
 She offers up herself a sacrifice
 To slake his anger; if he were displeased,
 O what god would not therewith be appeased?
 535 Like Aesop's cock,⁶ this jewel he enjoyed,
 And as a brother with his sister toyed,
 Supposing nothing else was to be done,
 Now he her favor and good will had won.
 But know you not that creatures wanting sense^o intelligence
 540 By nature have a mutual appetite,^o attraction
 And wanting organs to advance a step,
 Moved by love's force, unto each other leap?
 Much more in subjects having intellect
 Some hidden influence breeds like effect.
 545 Albeit Leander, rude^o in love and raw, unsophisticated
 Long dallying with Hero, nothing saw
 That might delight him more, yet he suspected
 Some amorous rites or other were neglected.
 Therefore unto his body hers he clung;
 550 She, fearing on the rushes⁷ to be flung,
 Strived with redoubled strength; the more she strived,
 The more a gentle, pleasing heat revived,
 Which taught him all that elder lovers know.
 And now the same 'gan^o so to scorch and glow, began
 555 As in plain terms, yet cunningly, he craved it.
 Love always makes those eloquent that have it.

² In offering ... light By conversing to be considered improper.

³ Graces Three Greek goddesses of joy, charm, and beauty.

⁴ spread the board Set the table.

⁵ Salmacis Nymph who falls in love with Hermaphroditus. He rejects her, but she clings to him and prays that they will never be parted. The gods grant her wish by fusing their two bodies together.

⁶ Aesop's cock In Aesop's "The Cock and the Jewel" a rooster finds a jewel but sees no value in it, preferring barleycorns.

⁷ rushes Floors in Renaissance houses and castles were often strewn with reeds.

She, with a kind of granting, put him by it,
 And, ever as he thought himself most nigh it,
 Like to the tree of Tantalus,¹ she fled,
 560 And, seeming lavish, saved her maidenhead.
 Ne'er king more sought to keep his diadem^o crown
 Than Hero this inestimable gem.
 Above our life we love a steadfast friend,
 Yet when a token of great worth we send,
 565 We often kiss it, often look thereon,
 And stay the messenger that would be gone.
 No marvel then, though Hero would not yield
 So soon to part from that she dearly held.
 Jewels being lost are found again, this never;
 570 'Tis lost but once, and once lost, lost forever.
 Now had the Morn espied her lover's steeds,² Whereat she starts, puts on her purple weeds,^o clothes
 And, red for anger that he stayed so long,
 All headlong throws herself the clouds among.
 575 And now Leander, fearing to be missed,
 Embraced her suddenly, took leave, and kissed;
 Long was he taking leave, and loath to go,
 And kissed again, as lovers use to do.
 Sad Hero wrung him by the hand and wept,
 580 Saying, "Let your vows and promises be kept."
 Then standing at the door, she turned about,
 As loath to see Leander going out.
 And now the sun that through th' horizon peeps,
 As pitying these lovers, downward creeps,
 585 So that in silence of the cloudy night,
 Though it was morning, did he take his flight.
 But what the secret trusty night concealed,
 Leander's amorous habit^o soon revealed. clothing
 With Cupid's myrtle³ was his bonnet^o crowned; hat
 590 About his arms the purple riband^o wound ribbon
 Wherewith she wreathed her largely spreading hair;
 Nor could the youth abstain but he must wear
 The sacred ring wherewith she was endowed
 When first religious chastity she vowed;
 595 Which made his love through Sestos to be known,
 And thence unto Abydos sooner blown

¹ Tantalus Tantalus was cursed to stand under a fruit tree. Whenever he tried to reach the fruit, the branch rose out of reach; whenever he tried to drink, the water lowered beneath him.

² lover's steeds Horses that pull the sun's chariot.

³ myrtle Plant sacred to Venus and Cupid.

Than he could sail, for incorporeal Fame,
 Whose weight consists in nothing but her name,
 Is swifter than the wind, whose tardy plumes
 600 Are reeking water and dull earthly fumes.⁴
 Home when he came, he seemed not to be there,
 But like exilèd air thrust from his sphere,
 Set in a foreign place, and straight from thence,
 Alcides-like,⁵ by mighty violence
 605 He would have chased away the swelling main
 That him from her unjustly did detain.
 Like as the sun in a diameter⁶
 Fires and inflames objects removed far,
 And heateth kindly, shining lat'rally,^o at the horizon
 610 So beauty sweetly quickens when 'tis nigh,
 But being separated and removed,
 Burns where it cherished, murders where it loved.⁷
 Therefore, even as an index to a book,
 So to his mind was young Leander's look.
 615 O none but gods have power their love to hide:
 Affection by the count'nance is descried.⁸
 The light of hidden fire itself discovers,
 And love that is concealed betrays poor lovers.
 His secret flame apparently^o was seen; clearly 620 Leander's father knew where he had been,
 And for the same mildly rebuked his son,
 Thinking to quench the sparkles new begun.
 But love, resisted once, grows passionate,
 And nothing more than counsel lovers hate.
 625 For as a hot, proud horse highly disdains
 To have his head controlled, but breaks the reins,
 Spits forth the ringled^o bit, and with his hooves ringed
 Checks^o the submissive ground; so he that loves, paws
 The more he is restrained, the worse he fares.
 630 What is it now but mad Leander dares?⁹
 "O Hero, Hero!" thus he cried full oft,
 And then he got him to a rock aloft,
 Where, having spied her tower, long stared he on't

⁴ Are ... fumes I.e., are as fleeting as mist.

⁵ Alcides-like Like Hercules, who committed feats of strength.

⁶ in a diameter I.e., directly overhead.

⁷ being separated ... loved I.e., inaccessible love can be a destructive force.

⁸ Affection ... descried Love is visible on the face.

⁹ but mad ... dares? That Leander won't do?

And prayed the narrow toiling Hellespont
 635 To part in twain, that he might come and go,
 But still the rising billows answered "No!"
 With that he stripped him to the ivory skin,
 And crying, "Love, I come!" leapt lively in.
 Whereat the sapphire-visaged god¹ grew proud,
 640 And made his capering Triton² sound aloud;
 Imagining that Ganymede,³ displeased,
 Had left the heavens, therefore on him he seized.
 Leander strived; the waves about him wound
 And pulled him to the bottom, where the ground
 645 Was strewed with pearl, and in low coral groves
 Sweet singing mermaids sported with their loves
 On heaps of heavy gold and took great pleasure
 To spurn in careless sort the shipwreck treasure,
 For here the stately azure palace stood
 650 Where kingly Neptune and his train abode.^o dwelled
 The lusty god embraced him, called him love,
 And swore he never should return to Jove.
 But when he knew it was not Ganymede,
 For underwater he was almost dead,
 655 He heaved him up, and looking on his face,
 Beat down the bold waves with his triple mace,⁴
 Which mounted up, intending to have kissed him,
 And fell in drops like tears because they missed him.
 Leander being up, began to swim,
 660 And, looking back, saw Neptune follow him;
 Whereat aghast, the poor soul 'gan to cry,
 "O let me visit Hero ere I die!"
 The god put Helle's bracelet⁵ on his arm,
 And swore the sea should never do him harm.
 665 He clapped his plump cheeks, with his tresses played,
 And, smiling wantonly, his love bewrayed.^o exposed
 He watched his arms, and as they opened wide,
 At every stroke, betwixt them he would slide
 And steal a kiss, and then run out and dance
 670 And, as he turned, cast many a lustful glance

And threw him gaudy toys to please his eye,
 And dive into the water and there pry
 Upon his breast, his thighs, and every limb,
 And up again and close beside him swim
 675 And talk of love. Leander made reply,
 "You are deceived; I am no woman, I."
 Thereat smiled Neptune, and then told a tale,
 How that a shepherd, sitting in a vale,
 Played with a boy so fair and kind,
 680 As for his love both earth and heaven pined;
 That of the cooling river durst not drink,
 Lest water nymphs should pull him from the brink.
 And when he sported in the fragrant lawns,
 Goat-footed satyrs and up-staring fauns⁶
 685 Would steal him thence. Ere half this tale was done,
 "Ay me!" Leander cried, "th' enamored sun
 That now should shine on Thetis' glassy bower⁷
 Descends upon my radiant Hero's tower.
 O that these tardy arms of mine were wings!"
 690 And as he spake, upon the waves he springs.
 Neptune was angry that he gave no ear,
 And in his heart revenging malice bare.
 He flung at him his mace, but as it went
 He called it in, for love made him repent.
 695 The mace returning back, his own hand hit,
 As meaning to be venged for darting it.
 When this fresh bleeding wound Leander viewed,
 His color went and came, as if he rued
 The grief which Neptune felt. In gentle breasts
 700 Relenting thoughts, remorse, and pity rests;
 And who have hard hearts and obdurate minds
 But vicious, harebrained, and illit'rate hinds?^o boors
 The god, seeing him with pity to be moved,
 Thereon concluded that he was beloved.
 705 (Love is too full of faith, too credulous,
 With folly and false hope deluding us.)
 Wherefore Leander's fancy to surprise,
 To the rich ocean for gifts he flies.
 'Tis wisdom to give much; a gift prevails
 710 When deep persuading oratory fails.
 By this⁸ Leander, being near the land,
 Cast down his weary feet and felt the sand.

¹ sapphire-visaged god Neptune, Roman god of the sea.

² Triton Son of Neptune, who blew on a conch shell to raise the waves.

³ Ganymede Young man abducted by Jove and taken to the heavens to be the gods' cupbearer.

⁴ triple mace Three-pointed trident.

⁵ Helle's bracelet Fleeing a cruel stepmother on a flying ram, Helle fell into the Hellespont and, in most versions, drowned. She gave her name to the Hellespont. The bracelet appears to be Marlowe's invention.

⁶ up-staring fauns Wood creatures who divined the future by looking up at the stars.

⁷ Thetis' glassy bower Sea. Thetis was a sea nymph.

⁸ By this By this time.

Breathless albeit he were, he rested not Till to the solitary tower he got,
 715 And knocked and called, at which celestial noise
 The longing heart of Hero much more joys
 Than nymphs and shepherds when the timbrel¹ rings,
 Or crooked dolphin when the sailor sings.²
 She stayed not for her robes, but straight arose
 720 And, drunk with gladness, to the door she goes;
 Where, seeing a naked man, she screeched for fear
 (Such sights as this to tender maids are rare)
 And ran into the dark herself to hide.
 Rich jewels in the dark are soonest spied.
 725 Unto her was he led, or rather drawn
 By those white limbs, which sparkled through the lawn.
 The nearer that he came, the more she fled,
 And, seeking refuge, slipped into her bed.
 Whereon Leander sitting, thus began,
 730 Through numbing cold, all feeble, faint, and wan:
 "If not for love, yet, love, for pity sake
 Me in thy bed and maiden bosom take;
 At least vouchsafe these arms some little room,
 Who, hoping to embrace thee, cheerly^o swum. gladly
 735 This head was beat with many a churlish billow,³
 And therefore let it rest upon thy pillow."
 Herewith affrighted Hero shrunk away
 And in her lukewarm place Leander lay,
 Whose lively heat, like fire from heaven fet,^o fetch'd
 740 Would animate gross clay, and higher set
 The drooping thoughts of base declining souls
 Than dreary^o Mars carousing nectar bowls. gory
 His hands he cast upon her like a snare;
 She, overcome with shame and sallow fear,
 745 Like chaste Diana when Actaeon spied her,⁴
 Being suddenly betrayed, dived down to hide her,
 And as her silver body downward went,
 With both her hands she made the bed a tent,
 And in her own mind thought herself secure,
 750 O'ercast with dim and darksome coverture.^o covering

² crooked dolphin ... sings Arion, the musician, was saved from drowning by a dolphin (swimming in leaps, hence "crooked") who was charmed by his music.

³ churlish billow Angry wave.

⁴ Diana ... spied her Diana punished the hunter Actaeon for seeing her while she was bathing in a woodland pool.

And now she lets him whisper in her ear,
 Flatter, entreat, promise, protest, and swear;
 Yet ever as he greedily assayed
 To touch those dainties, she the Harpy⁵ played,
 755 And every limb did, as a soldier stout,
 Defend the fort and keep the foeman out.
 For though the rising ivory mount he scaled,
 Which is with azure circling lines empaled,^o surrounded
 Much like a globe (a globe may I term this, 760 By which love sails to regions full of bliss),
 Yet there with Sisyphus⁶ he toiled in vain,
 Till gentle parley did the truce obtain.
 Wherein Leander on her quivering breast,
 Breathless spoke something, and sighed out the rest;
 765 Which so prevailed, as he with small ado
 Enclosed her in his arms and kissed her, too.
 And every kiss to her was as a charm,
 And to Leander as a fresh alarm,⁷
 So that the truce was broke, and she, alas,
 770 Poor silly^o maiden, at his mercy was. weak
 Love is not full of pity, as men say,
 But deaf and cruel where he means to prey.
 Even as a bird which in our hands we wring
 Forth plungeth and oft flutters with her wing,
 775 She trembling strove; this strife of hers, like that
 Which made the world,⁸ another world begat
 Of unknown joy. Treason was in her thought,
 And cunningly to yield herself she sought.
 Seeming not won, yet won she was at length.
 780 (In such wars women use but half their strength.)
 Leander now, like Theban Hercules,⁹
 Entered the orchard of th' Hesperides,
 Whose fruit none rightly can describe but he
 That pulls or shakes it from the golden tree.¹⁰

⁵ Harpy Repellent monster that is part bird, part woman, known for snatching away food just before it is eaten.

⁶ Sisyphus Sisyphus was forever condemned to roll a stone up a hill; as he brought it to the top, it would roll down again.

⁷ alarm Call to arms.

⁸ like ... world The Greek philosopher Empedocles held that the world was created out of the tension between love and strife.

⁹ Hercules Hercules's eleventh task was to steal the golden apples of the Hesperides, nymphs who tended a beautiful garden.

¹⁰ She trembling ... golden tree In the first printing, lines 775–84 followed line 762. Some scholars have suggested that an error occurred during the first printing of this poem, [continued ...]

785 And now she wished this night were never done,
 And sighed to think upon th' approaching sun,
 For much it grieved her that the bright daylight
 Should know the pleasure of this blessed night,
 And them like Mars and Erycine¹ displayed,
 790 Both in each other's arms chained as they laid.
 Again she knew not how to frame her look
 Or speak to him who in a moment took
 That which so long, so charily^o she kept; carefully
 And fain by stealth away she would have crept
 795 And to some corner secretly have gone,
 Leaving Leander in the bed alone.
 But as her naked feet were whipping out,
 He on the sudden clinged her so about
 That mermaid-like unto the floor she slid:
 800 One half appeared, the other half was hid.
 Thus near the bed she blushing stood upright;
 And from her countenance behold ye might
 A kind of twilight break, which through the hair,
 As from an orient cloud, glims^o here and there, glimmers
 805 And round about the chamber this false morn
 Brought forth the day before the day was born.
 So Hero's ruddy cheek Hero betrayed,
 And her all naked to his sight displayed,
 Whence his admiring eyes more pleasure took 810 Than Dis² on heaps of gold fixing his look.
 By this Apollo's golden harp began
 To sound forth music to the Ocean,
 Which watchful Hesperus³ no sooner heard
 But he the day's bright-bearing car prepared,
 815 And ran before, as harbinger of light,
 And with his flaring beams mocked ugly Night
 Till she, o'ercome with anguish, shame, and rage,
 Danged^o down to hell her loathsome carriage. threw

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love

Come live with me and be my love,
 And we will all the pleasures prove^o experience
 That valleys, groves, hills, and fields,
 Woods, or steepy mountain yields.
 5 And we will sit upon the rocks,
 Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
 By shallow rivers to whose falls
 Melodious birds sing madrigals.⁵
 And I will make thee beds of roses
 10 And a thousand fragrant posies,
 A cap of flowers, and a kirtle^o skirt
 Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;
 A gown made of the finest wool
 Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
 15 Fair lined slippers for the cold,
 With buckles of the purest gold;
 A belt of straw and ivy buds,
 With coral clasps and amber studs:
 And if these pleasures may thee move,
 20 Come live with me, and be my love.
 The shepherd swains^o shall dance and sing rustic lovers
 For thy delight each May morning:
 If these delights thy mind may move,
 Then live with me and be my love.

in which two pages of Marlowe's original manuscript were reversed.

¹ Erycine Another name for Venus, caught in bed with Mars by her husband Vulcan, who trapped the lovers in a bronze net.

² Dis Another name for Pluto, god of the underworld and wealth.

³ Hesperus Evening star, the planet Venus.

⁴ Desunt nonnulla Latin: Some things are missing. Inserted by the first printer. Marlowe does not include the tragic end of the story as related by other authors. It is possible that he died before finishing the poem.

⁵ madrigals Part-songs for several voices, often with pastoral or amatory associations.

The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus

The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus is a work that employs belief from both the medieval and modern worlds. At its core is a story, of which there are various medieval versions, of a man selling his soul to the devil. Yet the play is plotted in a way that differs strikingly from the conventions of most medieval drama with, for example, a progression of scenes structured to suggest the passage of time in the real world. (Whereas in most medieval plays characters may exit at the end of one scene and reappear immediately at the beginning of the next in a different place or at a different time, Marlowe and Shakespeare broke new ground in the early 1590s, always providing for some passage of time in such circumstances.) The play posits sinister magical worlds that may seem far-fetched to the modern mind; in the late sixteenth century the lines that now divide what we term “science” from “superstition” had barely begun to be drawn and—again like Shakespeare—Marlowe mixes the comic and the tragic in ways that may jar on some modern sensibilities. Yet its treatment of the connections between the worlds of religion, magic, and science; of the connections between knowledge and power; and of the bitter fruits of excessive ambition resonate deeply with modern readers and modern audiences. So too does the material of the story itself, which has been recast by many authors in the intervening centuries—most notably by Goethe in the eighteenth century (Faust, 1790) and by Thomas Mann in the twentieth century (Dr. Faustus, 1947).

Not surprisingly, a somewhat uneasy relationship exists between Dr. Faustus and traditional Christian doctrine, Protestant or Catholic. However much the ambition of Faustus leads to damning sin, we are made to sense something attractive in his soaring visions. And in numerous other respects, too, the play puts forward religious notions from outside the mainstream (that hell may also be a state of mind, for example, and that there may be legitimate ties between the practices of magic and those of Christianity). Yet the play remains a memorable and provocative literary exploration of Christian doctrine. Do we have free will? What are the limits of God’s forgiveness?

Marlowe’s Dr. Faustus exists in two substantially different versions. There has been a great deal of scholarly discussion of the differences between the two, and debate over which is closest to what Marlowe himself wrote.

Marlowe probably completed the play in 1592 or early 1593 (he died on 30 May of that year). We know that between September of 1594 and October of 1597 the play was performed 25 times at the Rose Theatre by the Admiral’s Men, with Edward Alleyn playing Faustus. The same company added the play to their repertory again when they opened the Fortune Theatre as their new house in late 1602. (Payment of £4 was made at this time on behalf of the Admiral’s Men to two individuals “for there adicyones in doctor fostes.”)

The first printed text that has come down to us is that of 1604 (commonly known as the “A” text). A much longer version was published in 1616; it included numerous new scenes (the majority of them comic) and a variety of other revisions throughout. Some of these revisions were evidently forced by the 1606 “Act to restrain Abuses of Players,” which forbade actors “in any Stage play ... jestingly or prophanely” from speaking or using “the holy Name of God or of Christ Jesus, or of the Holy Ghoste or of the Trinitie, which are not to be spoken but with feare and reverence.” Thus Faustus’s characterization of God as “unpleasant, harsh, contemptible, and vile” 1.1.110 is cut from the 1616 (or “B”) text; similarly, his vision of Christ’s blood and the frowns of an angry God (5.2.70–77) are radically altered. The reasons for and the source of the various other differences between the A and B texts remain in dispute among scholars. Michael Keefer, whose edition of the play appears in these pages, has argued persuasively not only that the “A” text is “shorter, harsher, more focused, and more disturbing” than the 1616 “B” text but also that it is much closer to the play as it was performed in the 1590s. The edition here has been adapted from Keefer’s edition, which is based on the 1604 “A” text. For the text of all the 1616 revisions, together with a full scholarly discussion of the differences between the two versions, readers are invited to consult Keefer’s full edition of the play, which appears as part of the Broadview Editions series.

PROLOGUE

(Enter Chorus.)

CHORUS. Not marching now in fields of Thracimene
 Where Mars did mate¹ the Carthaginians,
 Nor sporting in the dalliance of love
 In courts of kings where state is overturn’d,
 5 Nor in the pomp of proud audacious deeds
 Intends our muse to vaunt^o his heavenly verse. display proudly
 Only this, gentlemen: we must perform
 The form of Faustus’ fortunes, good or bad.
 To patient judgments we appeal our plaud,²
 10 And speak for Faustus in his infancy:
 Now is he born, his parents base of stock,
 In Germany, within a town call’d Rhodes;³
 Of riper years to Wittenberg⁴ he went,
 Whereas his kinsmen chiefly brought him up.
 15 So soon he profits in divinity,
 The fruitful plot of scholarship grac’d,
 That shortly he was grac’d⁵ with doctor’s name,
 Excelling all whose sweet delight disputes⁶

² appeal our plaud Appeal for our applause.

³ Rhodes Roda (now Stadtroda), near Weimar.

⁴ Wittenberg The University of Wittenberg was famous under Martin Luther as a Protestant center of learning.

⁵ grac’d At Cambridge it was and still is by the “grace” or decree of the university Senate that degrees are conferred; Marlowe’s name appears in the Grace Book in 1584 and 1587 for the B.A. and M.A. degrees respectively.

⁶ whose ... disputes It is possible to construe “disputes” as a verb; more probably the expression is elliptical and means “whose sweet delight consists in disputes.”

20 In heavenly matters of theology,
 Till swoll'n with cunning¹ of a self-conceit,
 His waxen wings² did mount above his reach
 And melting heavens conspir'd his overthrow.
 For falling to a devilish exercise,
 And glutted now with learning's golden gifts,
 25 He surfeits upon cursed necromancy;
 Nothing so sweet as magic is to him,
 Which he prefers before his chiefest bliss:
 And this the man that in his study sits.

(Exit.)

ACT 1, SCENE 1³

(Faustus in his study.)

FAUSTUS. Settle thy studies, Faustus, and begin
 To sound the depth of that thou wilt profess.⁴
 Having commenc'd,⁵ be a divine in show,
 Yet level at the end of every art,⁶
 5 And live and die in Aristotle's works:
 Sweet Analytics,⁷ 'tis thou hast ravish'd me—
Bene disserere est finis logices.⁸
 Is to dispute well logic's chiefest end?
 Affords this art no greater miracle?
 10 Then read no more, thou hast attain'd the end.
 A greater subject fitteth Faustus' wit:⁹ understanding

² waxen wings Allusion to the story of Icarus (cf. Ovid, Metamorphoses 8.183–235): escaping with his father Daedalus from Minos's island kingdom of Crete, Icarus ignored his father's warning about the wings he had made for them and flew too close to the sun.

³ ACT 1, SCENE 1 Neither the 1604 nor the 1616 texts of the play contains any act or scene divisions; all such divisions in modern editions of the play are therefore editorial.

⁴ profess Affirm faith in or allegiance to.

⁵ commenc'd Taken a degree.

⁶ level ... art Take aim at the final purpose or limit of every discipline.

⁷ Analytics Name of two treatises on logic by Aristotle, whose works still dominated the university curriculum.

⁸ Bene ... logices Latin: To argue well is the end or purpose of logic (a definition derived not from Aristotle but from Cicero).

Bid *on kai me on*⁹ farewell; Galen¹⁰ come,
 Seeing ubi desinit philosophus, ibi incipit medicus.¹¹
 Be a physician Faustus, heap up gold,
 15 And be eterniz'd for some wondrous cure!
Summum bonum medicinae sanitas.¹²
 The end of physic^o is our bodies' health. medicine
 Why Faustus, hast thou not attain'd that end?
 Is not thy common talk sound aphorisms?¹³
 20 Are not thy bills hung up as monuments,
 Whereby whole cities have escap'd the plague,
 And thousand desperate maladies been eas'd?
 Yet art thou still but Faustus, and a man.
 Couldst thou make men to live eternally,
 25 Or being dead, raise them to life again,
 Then this profession were to be esteem'd.
 Physic farewell; where is Justinian?
Si una eademque res legatur duobus,
alter rem, alter valorem rei,¹⁴ etc.
 30 A petty case of paltry legacies!
Exhereditare filium non potest pater, nisi—¹⁵
 Such is the subject of the *Institute*¹⁶
 And universal body of the law.
 This study fits a mercenary drudge
 35 Who aims at nothing but external trash—

⁹ on kai me on Transliteration of Greek words meaning “being and not being,” the subject of an ancient Greek philosophical treatise.

¹⁰ Galen Claudius Galenus (c. 130–200 CE), most famous of ancient writers on medicine.

¹¹ ubi ... medicus Latin: where the philosopher leaves off, there the physician begins. Freely translated from Aristotle, Sense and Sensibilia 436a.

¹² Summum ... sanitas Latin: The supreme good of medicine is health. Translated from Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 1094a.

¹³ sound aphorisms Reliable medical precepts.

¹⁴ Si ... rei Latin: If one and the same thing is bequeathed to two persons, one of them shall have the thing, the other the value of the thing. Derived in part from 2.20 of the Institutes, a compilation of Roman law carried out at the command of the emperor Justinian in the sixth century.

¹⁵ Exhereditare ... nisi Latin: A father cannot disinherit his son except—. An incomplete formulation of a rule from Justinian's Institutes 2.12.

¹⁶ Institute “Institute” here means “founding principle,” and may refer also to Justinian's Institutes.

Too servile¹ and illiberal for me.
 When all is done, divinity is best:
 Jerome's Bible,² Faustus, view it well.
*Stipendium peccati mors est.*³ Ha! Stipendium, etc.
 40 The reward of sin is death? That's hard.
Si peccasse negamus, fallimur,
*et nulla est in nobis veritas:*⁴
 If we say that we have no sin
 We deceive ourselves, and there's no truth in us.
 45 Why then belike we must sin,
 And so consequently die.
 Ay, we must die, an everlasting death.
 What doctrine call you this? Che sarà, sarà,
 What will be, shall be? Divinity, adieu!
 50 These metaphysics⁵ of magicians
 And necromantic books are heavenly!
 Lines,⁶ circles,⁷ seals, letters and characters:⁸
 Ay, these are those that Faustus most desires,
 O, what a world of profit and delight,
 55 Of power, of honor, of omnipotence,

Is promis'd to the studious artisan!⁹
 All things that move between the quiet poles¹⁰
 Shall be at my command. Emperors and kings
 Are but obey'd in their several provinces,
 60 Nor can they raise the wind, or rend the clouds;¹¹
 But his dominion that exceeds^o in this excels
 Stretcheth as far as doth the mind of man!
 A sound magician is a mighty god:
 Here tire, my brains, to get^o a deity! beget

(Enter Wagner.)

65 Wagner, commend me to my dearest friends,
 The German Valdes and Cornelius;
 Request them earnestly to visit me.
 WAGNER. I will, sir.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. Their conference will be a greater help to me
 70 Than all my labors, plod I ne'er so fast.

(Enter the Good Angel and the Evil Angel.)

GOOD ANGEL. O Faustus, lay that damned book aside,
 And gaze not on it, lest it tempt thy soul
 And heap God's heavy wrath upon thy head!
 Read, read the Scriptures; that is blasphemy.
 75 EVIL ANGEL. Go forward, Faustus, in that famous art
 Wherein all nature's treasury is contain'd:
 Be thou on earth as Jove¹² is in the sky,
 Lord and commander of these elements!¹³

(Exeunt Angels.)

⁹ artisan Practitioner of an art.

¹⁰ quiet poles This could refer either to the poles of the outermost celestial sphere or, more probably, to those of the earth.

¹¹ raise ... clouds Blasphemous echo of Jeremiah 10.13 (which speaks of God's power over clouds, lightning and wind).

¹² Jove The substitution of the supreme god of the pagan Roman pantheon for the Christian God is common in Renaissance texts and in Elizabethan poetry.

¹³ these elements Earth, water, air and fire, here used as a metonymy for the world contained by the sphere of the moon which these elements were thought to constitute.

¹ Too servile To contrast the liberal arts with "servile" or "mechanical" studies and practices is an Elizabethan commonplace.

² Jerome's Bible Vulgate, prepared mainly by St. Jerome in the fourth century, was the Latin text of the Bible used by the Roman Catholic church.

⁴ Si peccasse ... veritas 1 John 1.8. Faustus has again quoted only the first half of an antithetical statement: he notices the condemnation of sinners by the law of God, but not the conditional promise of divine mercy which immediately follows in 1 John 1.9. In the Geneva Bible, 1 John 1.8–9 is rendered as follows: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive our selves, and truth is not in us. If we acknowledge our sins, he is faithful and just, to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

⁵ metaphysics Science of the supernatural.

⁶ Lines Reference to the occult art of geomancy, or divination by means of astrologically determined patterns of points and lines.

⁷ circles Magic circles protected the practitioner of ceremonial magic from evil spirits.

⁸ seals, letters and characters Talismanic symbols of the planets and of the angels, spiritual intelligences, and daemons that were believed to govern them.

FAUSTUS. How am I glutt'd with conceit¹ of this!

80 Shall I make spirits fetch me what I please,
Resolve me of all ambiguities,
Perform what desperate enterprise I will?
I'll have them fly to India for gold,
Ransack the ocean for orient pearl
85 And search all corners of the new found world
For pleasant fruits and princely delicates;
I'll have them read me strange philosophy
And tell the secrets of all foreign kings;
I'll have them wall all Germany with brass
90 And make swift Rhine² circle fair Wittenberg;
I'll have them fill the public schools with silk
Wherewith the students shall be bravely³ clad;
I'll levy soldiers with the coin they bring,
And chase the Prince of Parma⁴ from our land
95 And reign sole king of all our provinces;
Yea, stranger engines for the brunt^o of war assault, onset
Than was the fiery keel at Antwerp's bridge⁵
I'll make my servile spirits to invent.
Come, German Valdes and Cornelius,
100 And make me blest with your sage conference!

(Enter Valdes and Cornelius.)

Valdes, sweet Valdes, and Cornelius,
Know that your words have won me at the last
To practise magic and concealed arts:
Yet not your words only, but mine own fantasy,

² Rhine River in Germany.

³ bravely Splendidly. University regulations forbade students to wear fine clothing: their scholars' gowns were to be made of woolen cloth in somber colors, and silk-lined hoods could only be worn by the holders of doctoral degrees.

⁴ Prince of Parma Alessandro Farnese, Duke of Parma, a grandson of the emperor Charles V and the foremost general of his time. Parma served as Spanish governor of the Netherlands from 1578 until his death in 1592; he was hated by Protestants as a tyrant. He commanded the force that the Spanish Armada was to have transported across the Channel in 1588 for the invasion of England.

⁵ fiery ... bridge On 4 April 1585 the Netherlanders sent two fire-ships loaded with explosives against the pontoon bridge over the river Scheldt which formed part of Parma's siegeworks around Antwerp; one of them reached its target and destroyed part of the bridge, killing many Spanish soldiers. Parma had the bridge rebuilt, and Antwerp subsequently surrendered.

105 That will receive no object, for my head
But ruminates on necromantic skill.⁶
Philosophy is odious and obscure;
Both law and physic are for petty wits;
Divinity is basest of the three,
110 Unpleasant, harsh, contemptible and vile;
'Tis magic, magic, that hath ravish'd me.
Then, gentle friends, aid me in this attempt,
And I, that have with concise syllogisms⁷
Gravell'd^o the pastors of the German church confounded
115 And made the flowering pride of Wittenberg
Swarm to my problems as the infernal spirits
On sweet Musaeus⁸ when he came to hell,
Will be as cunning as Agrippa was,
Whose shadows⁹ made all Europe honor him.
120 VALDES. Faustus, these books, thy wit, and our experience
Shall make all nations canonize us.
As Indian Moors¹⁰ obey their Spanish lords,
So shall the subjects¹¹ of every element
Be always serviceable to us three:
125 Like lions shall they guard us when we please,
Like Almain rutters¹² with their horsemen's staves,^o lances
Or Lapland giants trotting by our sides;
Sometimes like women, or unwedded maids,
Shadowing^o more beauty in their airy brows harboring
130 Than has the white breasts of the queen of love.¹³
From Venice shall they drag huge Argosies,¹⁴

⁶ Yet ... skill Faustus is saying that his imagination is so preoccupied with thoughts of magic that he can think of no other subjects.

⁷ syllogisms Particular form of argument from logic.

⁸ Musaeus Legendary pre-Homeric Greek poet, a pupil of Orpheus. In Virgil's Aeneid, Musaeus is represented as standing in the midst of a crowd of spirits in the underworld, head and shoulders above the rest.

⁹ Agrippa ... shadows Henricus Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim (1486–1535), said to be "the greatest conjurer in Christendom." Agrippa distinguished between two kinds of necromancy: necyomantia, the reviving of corpses by means of a blood sacrifice, and scyomantia, in which only the shadow of a dead person is invoked.

¹⁰ Indian Moors Native peoples of the Americas.

¹¹ subjects Spirits. "Subjects" carries the additional implication of subjection to a sovereign will (here, that of the magician).

¹² Almain rutters German soldiers.

¹³ queen of love Venus, Roman goddess of love.

¹⁴ Argosies Richly laden merchant ships.

And from America the golden fleece¹
That yearly stuffs old Philip's treasury,²
If learned Faustus will be resolute.

135 FAUSTUS. Valdes, as resolute am I in this
As thou to live, therefore object it not.

CORNELIUS. The miracles that magic will perform
Will make thee vow to study nothing else.

He that is grounded in³ astrology,
140 Enrich'd with tongues,⁴ well seen in minerals,⁵
Hath all the principles magic doth require.
Then doubt not, Faustus, but to be renown'd
And more frequented^o for this mystery sought out
Than heretofore the Delphian oracle.⁶

145 The spirits tell me they can dry the sea
And fetch the treasure of all foreign wrecks,
Ay, all the wealth that our forefathers hid Within the massy^o entrails of the earth. heavy, massive
Then tell me Faustus, what shall we three want?

150 FAUSTUS. Nothing, Cornelius. O, this cheers my soul!
Come, show me some demonstrations magical,
That I may conjure in some lusty grove
And have these joys in full possession.

VALDES. Then haste thee to some solitary grove,
155 And bear wise Bacon's and Albanus' works,⁷
The Hebrew Psalter, and New Testament;
And whatsoever else is requisite
We will inform thee ere our conference cease.

CORNELIUS. Valdes, first let him know the words of art,
160 And then, all other ceremonies learn'd,
Faustus may try his cunning by himself.

VALDES. First I'll instruct thee in the rudiments,
And then wilt thou be perfecter than I.

¹ golden fleece In Greek mythology, Jason and his crew sailed in the Argo on a quest for the Golden Fleece.

² golden ... treasury Annual fleet that shipped gold and silver from the Americas to Spain.

³ grounded in Firmly established in.

⁴ Enrich'd with tongues Improved by knowledge of (ancient) languages.

⁵ well ... minerals Well versed in the properties of minerals.

⁶ Delphian oracle Oracle of Apollo at Delphi, the most famous and authoritative of ancient Greek oracles.

⁷ wise Bacon's and Albanus' works Roger Bacon (c. 1214–94), an English Franciscan philosopher, was reputed also to have been a magician “Albanus” is an error for Pietro d'Abano or Petrus de Aponus (c. 1250–1316), a physician who was posthumously convicted of sorcery and burned in effigy by the Inquisition.

FAUSTUS. Then come and dine with me, and after meat

165 We'll canvas every quiddity⁸ thereof.
For ere I sleep I'll try what I can do;
This night I'll conjure though I die therefore.

(Exeunt.)

ACT I, SCENE 2

(Enter two scholars.)

FIRSTSCHOLAR. I wonder what's become of Faustus, that was wont to make our schools ring with sic probo.⁹

SECOND SCHOLAR. That shall we presently^o know, for at once see: here comes his boy.

(Enter Wagner.)

5 FIRSTSCHOLAR. How now sirrah,¹⁰ where's thy master?
WAGNER. God in heaven knows.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Why, dost not thou know?

WAGNER. Yes, I know, but that follows not.

FIRSTSCHOLAR. Go to sirrah, leave your jesting, and tell 10 us where he is.

WAGNER. That follows not necessary by force of argument, which you, being licentiate,¹¹ should stand upon;¹² therefore acknowledge your error and be attentive.

15 SECOND SCHOLAR. Why, didst thou not say thou knew'st?

WAGNER. Have you any witness on't?

FIRSTSCHOLAR. Yes, sirrah, I heard you.

WAGNER. Ask my fellow if I be a thief!

20 SECOND SCHOLAR. Well, you will not tell us.

⁸ canvas every quiddity Discuss every essential particular.

⁹ sic probo Latin: thus I prove; the cry of triumph with which Faustus would have clinched his victories in disputation.

¹⁰ sirrah Term of address that expresses the speaker's contempt, the addressee's social inferiority, or both.

¹¹ licentiate Licensed by an academic degree to proceed to further studies.

¹² stand upon Insist on.

WAGNER. Yes sir, I will tell you; yet if you were not dunces¹ you would never ask me such a question, for is not he corpus naturale, and is not that mobile?² Then wherefore should you ask me such a question? But that 25 I am by nature phlegmatic, slow to wrath and prone to lechery (to love I would say), it were not for you to come within forty foot of the place of execution³—although I do not doubt but to see you both hanged the next sessions. Thus having triumphed over you, I will
 30 set my countenance like a precisian,⁴ and begin to speak thus: Truly, my dear brethren, my master is within at dinner with Valdes and Cornelius, as this wine if it could speak would inform your worships; and so the Lord bless you, preserve you, and keep you,⁵ my dear
 35 brethren, my dear brethren.

(Exit.)

FIRST SCHOLAR. Nay then, I fear he is fallen into that damned art, for which they two are infamous through the world.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Were he a stranger, and not allied to 40 me, yet should I grieve for him. But come, let us go and inform the Rector, and see if he by his grave counsel can reclaim him.

FIRST SCHOLAR. O, but I fear me nothing can reclaim him.

45 SECOND SCHOLAR. Yet let us try what we can do.

(Exeunt.)

¹ dunces Renaissance humanists opposed both the hair-splitting complexity of scholastic logic. As a result, the name of Johannes Duns Scotus (c. 1265–1308), one of the most subtle medieval logicians, came to connote sophistical quibbling and, by extension, stupidity.

² corpus naturale ... mobile Latin: a body that is natural or subject to change—an adaptation of Aristotle's statement of the subject-matter of physics.

³ place of execution Scene of action; in this case, the dining-room.

⁴ precisian Puritan, one who is precise and scrupulous about religious observances. Having parodied the logic of scholastic disputation, Wagner proceeds to parody the discourse of excessive piety.

⁵ the Lord ... keep you Numbers 6.24. In quoting these words as an exit line, Wagner is mocking the language with which religious services were (and are) commonly brought to a close.

ACT 1, SCENE 3

(Enter Faustus to conjure.)

FAUSTUS. Now that the gloomy shadow of the earth,
 Longing to view Orion's drizzling look,⁶
 Leaps from th'antarctic world⁷ unto the sky
 And dims the welkin° with her pitchy breath, sky
 5 Faustus, begin thine incantations,
 And try if devils will obey thy hest,° command
 Seeing thou hast pray'd and sacrific'd to them.
 Within this circle is Jehovah's name,
 Forward and backward anagrammatiz'd,⁸
 10 The breviated° names of holy saints, abbreviated
 Figures of every adjunct to° the heavens,
 And characters of signs and erring stars¹⁰
 By which the spirits are enforc'd to rise;
 Then fear not, Faustus, but be resolute,
 15 And try the uttermost magic can perform.
*Sint mihi dei Acherontis propitii! Valeat numen triplex
 Iehovae! Ignei, aerii, aquatici spiritus salvet! Orientis princeps Belzebub, inferni ardentis monarcha, et Demogorgon, propitia-*
 20 mus vos ut appareat etsurgat Mephastophilis. Quid tu moraris?
*Per Iehovam, Gehennam et consecratam aquam quam nunc spargo, signumque crucis quod nunc facio, et per vota nostra, ipse nunc surgat nobis dicatus Mephastophilis.*¹¹

⁶ Orion's drizzling look Constellation of Orion associated in classical poetry with winter storms.

⁷ th'antarctic world If one believes the sun to revolve around the earth, and lives in the northern hemisphere, then the sun will be conceived of as shining on the southern hemisphere when it is night in the northern, and re-emerging from "th'antarctic world" at dawn.

⁸ anagrammatiz'd Cabalist mystics believed that hidden meanings were present in every possible recombination of letters in the Hebrew scriptures, and practitioners of Cabalistic magic saw the names of God in particular as containing occult secrets of divine power and knowledge.

⁹ adjunct to Heavenly body attached to.

¹⁰ characters ... stars Diagrams representing the constellations of the zodiac (one Latin term for which was signa) and the planets.

¹¹ Sint ... Mephastophilis Latin: May the gods of Acheron be propitious to me. Away with the threefold divinity of Jehovah! Hail, spirits of fire, air, and water! Belzebub, Prince of the East, monarch of burning hell, and Demogorgon, we invoke your favor that Mephastophilis may appear and ascend. Why do you delay? By Jehovah, Gehenna, and the holy water which I now sprinkle, by the sign of the cross which I now make, and by our vows, may Mephastophilis himself now rise to serve us! [continued ...]

(Enter a devil.)

I charge thee to return and change thy shape.
Thou art too ugly to attend on me;
25 Go, and return an old Franciscan friar:
That holy shape becomes a devil best.

(Exit devil.)

I see there's virtue¹ in my heavenly words,
Who would not be proficient in this art?
How pliant is this Mephistophilis,
30 Full of obedience and humility:
Such is the force of magic and my spells!
Now, Faustus, thou art conjurer laureate²
That canst command great Mephistophilis!
*Quin redis, Mephistophilis, fratris imagine?*³

(Enter Mephistophilis.)

35 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Now, Faustus, what wouldst thou have me do?

FAUSTUS. I charge thee wait upon me whilst I live
To do whatever Faustus shall command,
Be it to make the moon drop from her sphere
Or the ocean to overwhelm the world.

40 MEPHASTOPHILIS. I am a servant to great Lucifer,⁴
And may not follow thee without his leave;
No more than he commands must we perform.

FAUSTUS. Did not he charge thee to appear to me?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. No, I came hither of my own accord.

45 FAUSTUS. Did not my conjuring speeches raise thee?
Speak.

Mephistophilis Compound of three Greek words indicating negation (me), light (phos), and loving (philis); in its original form, the name thus means "not-light-loving"—perhaps parodying the Latin "Lucifer," or "light-bearer."

² laureate Crowned with laurel; of proved distinction.

³ Quin ... imagine Latin: Why do you not return, Mephistophilis, in the shape of a friar!

⁴ Lucifer The name appears in Isaiah 14.12.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. That was the cause, but yet per accidens,⁵
For when we hear one rack^o the name of God, torture
Abjure the Scriptures and his saviour Christ,
We fly, in hope to get his glorious⁶ soul;
50 Nor will we come unless he use such means
Whereby he is in danger to be damn'd.
Therefore the shortest cut for conjuring
Is stoutly⁷ to abjure the Trinity,⁸
And pray devoutly to the prince of hell.

55 FAUSTUS. So Faustus hath already done,
And holds this principle:
There is no chief but only Belzebub,
To whom Faustus doth dedicate himself.
This word "damnation" terrifies not him,
60 For he confounds hell in Elysium:⁹
His ghost be with the old philosophers!
But leaving these vain trifles of men's souls,
Tell me, what is that Lucifer thy lord?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Arch-regent and commander of all spirits.

65 FAUSTUS. Was not that Lucifer an angel once?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Yes Faustus, and most dearly lov'd of God.

FAUSTUS. How comes it then that he is prince of devils?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. O, by aspiring pride and insolence,
For which God threw him from the face of heaven.

70 FAUSTUS. And what are you that live with Lucifer?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Unhappy spirits that fell with Lucifer,
Conspir'd against our God with Lucifer,
And are for ever damn'd with Lucifer.

FAUSTUS. Where are you damn'd?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. In hell.

75 FAUSTUS. How comes it then that thou art out of hell?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why this is hell, nor am I out of it:
Think'st thou that I who saw the face of God
And tasted the eternal joys of heaven

⁵ per accidens Scholastics distinguished between an efficient cause, i.e., an agent which itself produced an effect, and a cause per accidens, which was related to the final effect only in having provided an occasion for the intervention of some external agent.

⁶ glorious Splendid; possibly also boastful.

⁷ stoutly Courageously, resolutely.

⁸ Trinity In orthodox Christian belief, the three persons (God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit) of the Godhead.

⁹ confounds ... Elysium Identifies Hell with Elysium; confuses the two; undoes Hell through belief in Elysium (in ancient Greece, the place in the afterworld reserved for heroes).

ACT 1, SCENE 4

Am not tormented with ten thousand hells

80 In being depriv'd of everlasting bliss?

O Faustus, leave these frivolous demands,

Which strike a terror to my fainting soul.

FAUSTUS. What, is great Mephistophilis so passionate

For being deprived of the joys of heaven?

85 Learn thou of Faustus manly fortitude

And scorn those joys thou never shalt possess.

Go, bear these tidings to great Lucifer:

Seeing Faustus hath incurr'd eternal death

By desperate thoughts against Jove's deity,

90 Say he surrenders up to him his soul,

So¹ he will spare him four and twenty years,

Letting him live in all voluptuousness,

Having thee ever to attend on me

To give me whatsoever I shall ask,

95 To tell me whatsoever I demand,

To slay mine enemies and aid my friends,

And always be obedient to my will.

Go, and return to mighty Lucifer,

And meet me in my study at midnight,

100 And then resolve me of thy master's mind.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I will, Faustus.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. Had I as many souls as there be stars

I'd give them all for Mephistophilis!

By him I'll be a great emperor of the world,

105 And make a bridge thorough² the moving air

To pass the ocean with a band of men;

I'll join the hills that bind the Afric shore,

And make that country continent to³ Spain,

And both contributory to my crown;

110 The emperor shall not live but by my leave,

Nor any potentate of Germany.

Now that I have obtain'd what I desire,

I'll live in speculation of this art

Till Mephistophilis return again.

(Exit.)

(Enter Wagner and the Clown.)⁴

WAGNER. Sirrah boy, come hither.

CLOWN. How, "boy"? Swowns⁵ boy, I hope you have seen many boys with such pickadevaunts⁶ as I have.

"Boy," quotha?

5 WAGNER. Tell me sirrah, hast thou any comings in?⁷

CLOWN. Ay, and goings out⁸ too, you may see else.

WAGNER. Alas, poor slave: see how poverty jesteth in his nakedness. The villain is bare, and out of service,⁹ and so hungry that I know he would give his soul to the devil

10 for a shoulder of mutton, though it were blood raw.

CLOWN. How, my soul to the devil for a shoulder of mutton though 'twere blood raw? Not so, good friend:
b'urlady¹⁰ I had need have it well roasted, and good sauce to it, if I pay so dear.

15 WAGNER. Well, wilt thou serve me, and I'll make thee go like Qui mihi discipulus?¹¹

CLOWN. How, in verse?

WAGNER. No sirrah, in beaten silk¹² and stavesacre.¹³

CLOWN. How, how, knave's acre? Ay, I thought that 20 was all the land his father left him. Do ye hear, I would be sorry to rob you of your living.

WAGNER. Sirrah, I say in stavesacre!

CLOWN. Oho, oho, stavesacre! Why then belike,¹⁴ if I

⁴ Clown Boorish rustic, a fool. This character is presumably to be identified with the Robin of 2.2 and 3.2.

⁵ Swowns Contraction of "God's wounds" (a mild oath).

⁶ pickadevaunts Short beards trimmed to a point; apparently from the French piqué devant, "peaked in front," possibly with an obscene double entendre.

⁷ comings in Earnings.

⁸ goings out Expenses; a punning reference to the fact that the Clown is bursting out of his tattered clothes.

⁹ out of service Unemployed.

¹⁰ b'urlady Contraction of "by Our Lady."

¹¹ Qui mihi discipulus Latin: You who are my pupil. The opening words of a didactic poem which appeared in the standard elementary Latin textbook used in Elizabethan schools.

¹² beaten silk Embroidered silk; with a punning suggestion that Wagner will thrash his servant.

¹³ stavesacre Preparation against lice made from the seeds of a plant related to the delphinium.

¹⁴ belike In all likelihood.

¹ So On condition that.

² thorough I.e., through.

³ continent to Continuous with.

were your man I should be full of vermin.

25 WAGNER. So thou shalt, whether thou beest with me or no. But sirrah, leave your jesting, and bind yourself presently unto me for seven years,¹ or I'll turn all the lice about thee into familiars,² and they shall tear thee to pieces.

30 CLOWN. Do you hear, sir? You may save that labor: they are too familiar with me already, swowns they are as bold with my flesh as if they had paid for my meat and drink.

WAGNER. Well, do you hear, sirrah? Hold, take these guilders.

CLOWN. Gridirons, what be they?

WAGNER. Why, French crowns.

CLOWN. Mass, but for the name of French crowns, a man were as good have as many English counters.³ And 40 what should I do with these?

WAGNER. Why now, sirrah, thou art at an hour's warning whensoever or wheresoever the devil shall fetch thee.

CLOWN. No, no; here, take your gridirons again.

45 WAGNER. Truly, I'll none of them.

CLOWN. Truly, but you shall.

WAGNER. Bear witness I gave them him!

CLOWN. Bear witness I give them you again!

WAGNER. Well, I will cause two devils presently to fetch 50 thee away. Baliol,⁴ and Belcher!

CLOWN. Let your Balio and Belcher come here, and I'll knock them, they were never so knocked since they were devils! Say I should kill one of them, what would folks say? "Do ye see yonder tall⁵ fellow in the round slop,⁶ he has killed the devil": so I should be called "kill-devil" all the parish over.

(Enter two devils, and the clown runs up and down crying.)

WAGNER. Balio and Belcher, spirits away!

(Exeunt.)

CLOWN. What, are they gone? A vengeance on them, they have vile long nails. There was a he-devil and a she-devil. I'll tell you how you shall know them: all he-devils 60 has horns,⁷ and all she-devils has clefts⁸ and cloven feet.

WAGNER. Well sirrah, follow me.

CLOWN. But do you hear: If I should serve you, would you teach me to raise up Banios and Belcheos?

65 WAGNER. I will teach thee to turn thyself to anything: to a dog, or a cat, or a mouse, or a rat, or any thing.

CLOWN. How? A Christian fellow to a dog or a cat, a mouse or a rat? No, no, sir. If you turn me into anything, let it be in the likeness of little pretty frisking flea, that I may be here and there and everywhere: O, I'll 70 tickle the pretty wenches' plackets,⁹ I'll be amongst them i'faith!

WAGNER. Well sirrah, come.

CLOWN. But do you hear, Wagner?

75 WAGNER. How? Baliol and Belcher!

CLOWN. O Lord! I pray sir, let Banio and Belcher go sleep.

WAGNER. Villain, call me Master Wagner, and see that you walk attentively, and let your right eye be always 80 diametrically fixed upon my left heel, that thou mayest quasi vestigiis nostris insitere.¹⁰

(Exit.)

¹ seven years Standard period of time for an apprenticeship or a contract of indentured labor.

² familiars Attendant spirits of witches and sorcerers, who took the form of animals.

³ guilders ... English counters Wagner professes to give the Clown Dutch guilders. Observing, it would seem, that the coins have holes punched in them, the Clown mis-hears the word as "gridirons"—whereupon Wagner re-identifies the coins as French crowns. A proclamation of 1587 authorized members of the public to strike holes in French crowns, which in the late 1580s and early 1590s were notoriously debased, and often counterfeit. From the sixteenth until the early nineteenth century, English merchants issued privately minted counters or tokens which circulated without having any officially accepted value; "counter" often denoted a debased or counterfeit coin; Mass An oath: "by the Mass."

⁴ Baliol Deformation of "Belial," a name which occurs in the Bible (e.g., 2 Corinthians 6.15).

⁵ tall Valiant, handsome.

⁶ round slop Baggy breeches.

⁷ horns Standard demonic equipment, perhaps with an overtone of cuckoldry.

⁸ clefts Vulvas.

⁹ plackets Pockets in women's skirts; metaphorically, a woman's genitals.

¹⁰ quasi vestigiis nostris insitere Latin: as if walking in our footsteps.

CLOWN. God forgive me, he speaks Dutch fustian.¹
Well, I'll follow him, I'll serve him, that's flat.

(Exit.)

ACT 2, SCENE 1

(Enter Faustus in his study.)

FAUSTUS. Now Faustus, must thou needs be damn'd,
And canst thou not be saved.
What boots° it then to think of God or heaven? avails
Away with such vain fancies, and despair,
5 Despair in God, and trust in Belzebub.
Now go not backward: no Faustus, be resolute.
Why waverest thou? O, something soundeth in mine ears:
"Abjure this magic, turn to God again."
Ay, and Faustus will turn to God again.
10 To God? He loves thee not;
The god thou serv'st is thine own appetite,
Wherein is fix'd the love of Belzebub:
To him I'll build an altar and a church,
And offer lukewarm blood of new-born babes!

(Enter Good Angel, and Evil.)

15 GOOD ANGEL. Sweet Faustus, leave that execrable art.
FAUSTUS. Contrition, prayer, repentance: what of these?
GOOD ANGEL. O, they are means to bring thee unto heaven.
EVIL ANGEL. Rather illusions, fruits of lunacy,
That makes men foolish that do trust them most.
20 GOOD ANGEL. Sweet Faustus, think of heaven and heavenly things.
EVIL ANGEL. No Faustus, think of honor and of wealth.

(Exeunt Angels.)

FAUSTUS. Of wealth?

Why, the signory° of Emden² shall be mine! lordship, rule
When Mephistophilis shall stand by me
25 What God can hurt me?³ Faustus, thou art safe;
Cast° no more doubts. Come, Mephistophilis, emit, ponder
And bring glad tidings⁴ from great Lucifer!
Is't not midnight? Come Mephistophilis,
*Veni, veni, Mephistophilis!*⁵

(Enter Mephistophilis.)

30 Now tell me, what says Lucifer thy lord?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. That I shall wait on Faustus whilst he lives,
So he will buy my service with his soul.
FAUSTUS. Already Faustus hath hazarded that for thee.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. But now thou must bequeath it solemnly,
35 And write a deed of gift with thine own blood,
For that security craves great Lucifer.
If thou deny it I will back to hell.
FAUSTUS. Stay Mephistophilis, and tell me,
What good will my soul do thy lord?
40 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Enlarge his kingdom.
FAUSTUS. Is that the reason why he tempts us thus?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Solamen miseris socios habuisse
*doloris.*⁶
FAUSTUS. Why, have you any pain that tortures others?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. As great as have the human souls of men.
45 But tell me, Faustus, shall I have thy soul?
And I will be thy slave and wait on thee,
And give thee more than thou hast wit to ask.
FAUSTUS. Ay Mephistophilis, I give it thee.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Then stab this arm courageously,
50 And bind thy soul, that at some certain day
Great Lucifer may claim it as his own:

² Emden Prosperous port in northwest Germany which conducted an extensive trade with England.

³ When ... me? Blasphemous distortion of Romans 8.31: "If God be on our side, who can be against us?"

⁴ glad tidings Cf. Luke 2.10: "I bring you glad tidings of great joy."

⁵ Veni, veni, Mephistophilis! Latin: Come, O come, Mephistophilis!—a blasphemous echo of the twelfth-century Advent hymn Veni, veni, Emmanuel (Come, O Come Redeemer).

⁶ Solamen ... doloris Latin: It is a comfort to the wretched to have had companions in misfortune.

¹ fustian Bombast, nonsense. Fustian was a coarse cloth made of cotton and flax; the word was metaphorically applied to inflated or inappropriately lofty language.

And then be thou as great as Lucifer!

FAUSTUS. Lo Mephastophilis, for love of thee
I cut mine arm, and with my proper^o blood own
55 Assure my soul to be great Lucifer's,
Chief lord and regent of perpetual night.
View here the blood that trickles from mine arm,
And let it be propitious for my wish.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. But Faustus, thou must 60 Write it in manner of a deed¹ of gift.

FAUSTUS. Ay, so I will. But Mephastophilis,
My blood congeals, and I can write no more.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I'll fetch thee fire to dissolve it straight.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. What might the staying of my blood portend?

65 Is it unwilling I should write this bill?^o contract
Why streams it not, that I may write afresh?
"Faustus gives to thee his soul": ah, there it stay'd.
Why should'st thou not? Is not thy soul thine own?
Then write again: "Faustus gives to thee his soul."

(Enter Mephastophilis with a chafer² of coals.)

70 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Here's fire: come Faustus, set it on.

FAUSTUS. So: now the blood begins to clear again;
Now will I make an end immediately.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. (Aside.) O, what will not I do to obtain his soul!

FAUSTUS. Consummatum est:³ this bill is ended,
75 And Faustus hath bequeath'd his soul to Lucifer.
But what is this inscription on mine arm?
*Homo fuge!*⁴ Whither should I fly?

If unto God he'll throw thee down to hell.
My senses are deceiv'd: here's nothing writ.

80 O yes, I see it plain! Even here is writ

Homo fuge; yet shall not Faustus fly.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I'll fetch him somewhat to delight his mind.

(Exit. Enter with devils, giving crowns and rich apparel to Faustus, and dance, and then [the devils] depart.)

FAUSTUS. Speak Mephastophilis: what means this show?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Nothing, Faustus, but to delight thy mind,

85 And let thee see what magic can perform.

FAUSTUS. But may I raise such spirits when I please?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay Faustus, and do greater things than these.

FAUSTUS. Then there's enough for a thousand souls!

Here Mephastophilis, receive this scroll,

90 A deed of gift, of body and of soul:

But yet conditionally, that thou perform

All articles prescrib'd between us both.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Faustus, I swear by hell and Lucifer
To effect all promises between us made.

95 FAUSTUS. Then hear me read them.

On these conditions following:

*First, that Faustus may be a spirit in form and substance;
Secondly, that Mephastophilis shall be his servant, and at his command;*

Thirdly, that Mephastophilis shall do for him, and bring him whatsoever;

100 Fourthly, that he shall be in his chamber or house invisible;

Lastly, that he shall appear to the said John Faustus at all times, in what form or shape soever he please;

I, John Faustus of Wittenberg, Doctor, by these presents⁵ do give both body and soul to Lucifer, Prince of the East, and his minister Mephastophilis, and furthermore grant 105 unto him that four and twenty years being expired, and these articles above written being inviolate, full power to fetch or carry the said John Faustus, body and soul, flesh, blood, or goods, into their habitation wheresoever.

By me, John Faustus.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Speak Faustus, do you deliver this as your deed?

110 FAUSTUS. Ay, take it, and the devil give thee good on't.

² chafer Saucepan or chafing-dish.

³ Consummatum est Latin: It is finished. According to the Gospel of John, these were the last words of Jesus on the cross (John 19.30).

⁴ Homo fuge! Latin: Man, flee! The words occur in the Vulgate text of 1 Timothy 6.11, but this line as a whole alludes more distinctly to Psalm 139.7–8: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend into heaven, thou art there: if I lie down in hell, thou art there."

⁵ these presents Legal articles being presented.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. So. Now, Faustus, ask me what thou wilt.

FAUSTUS. First will I question with thee about hell. Tell me, where is the place that men call hell?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Under the heavens.

115 FAUSTUS. Ay, so are all things else; but whereabouts?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Within the bowels of these elements, Where we are tortur'd and remain forever.

Hell hath no limits, nor is circumscrib'd

In one self^o place, but where we are is hell, single, particular

120 And where hell is there must we ever be;

And to be short, when all the world dissolves

And every creature shall be purify'd,

All places shall be hell that is not heaven.

FAUSTUS. Come, I think hell's a fable.

125 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay, think so still, till experience change thy mind.

FAUSTUS. Why, think'st thou then that Faustus shall be damn'd?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay, of necessity, for here's the scroll Wherein thou hast given thy soul to Lucifer.

FAUSTUS. Ay, and body too, but what of that?

130 Think'st thou that Faustus is so fond^o to imagine foolish That after this life there is any pain?

Tush, these are trifles and mere old wives' tales.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. But I am an instance to prove the contrary,

For I tell thee I am damn'd, and now in hell.

135 FAUSTUS. Nay, and this be hell, I'll willingly be damn'd!

What, sleeping, eating, walking and disputing?

But leaving this, let me have a wife, the fairest maid in Germany, for I am wanton and lascivious, and cannot live without a wife.

140 MEPHASTOPHILIS. How, a wife? I prithee Faustus, talk not of a wife.

FAUSTUS. Nay, sweet Mephistophilis, fetch me one, for I will have one.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Well, thou wilt have one. Sit there
145 till I come; I'll fetch thee a wife in the devil's name.

(Enter a devil dressed like a woman, with fireworks.)¹

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Tell, Faustus: how dost thou like thy wife?

FAUSTUS. A plague on her for a hot whore!

(Exit devil.)

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Tut, Faustus, marriage is but a ceremonial toy.^o trifle

If thou lov'st me, think no more of it.

150 I'll cull thee out the fairest courtesans

And bring them every morning to thy bed.

She whom thine eye shall like, thy heart shall have,

Be she as chaste as was Penelope,²

As wise as Saba,³ or as beautiful

155 As was bright Lucifer before his fall.

Hold, take this book: peruse it thoroughly.

The iterating of these lines brings gold;

The framing of this circle on the ground

Brings whirlwinds, tempests, thunder and lightning.

160 Pronounce this thrice devoutly to thyself,

And men in armor shall appear to thee,

Ready to execute what thou desir'st.

FAUSTUS. Thanks, Mephistophilis; yet fain would I have a book wherein I might behold all spells and incantations, that I might raise up spirits when I please.

165 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Here they are in this book.

(There turn to them.)

FAUSTUS. Now would I have a book where I might see all characters⁴ and planets of the heavens, that I might know their motions and dispositions.

170 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Here they are too.

(Turn to them.)

FAUSTUS. Nay, let me have one book more, and then I have done, wherein I might see all plants, herbs, and trees that grow upon the earth.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Here they be.

² Penelope Faithful wife of Odysseus, hero of the Trojan War and Homer's Odyssey.

³ Saba Queen of Sheba, who in 1 Kings 10.1–13 comes to Jerusalem to test King Solomon's knowledge of God.

⁴ characters Talismanic symbols of the planets and of the spiritual powers that govern them.

¹ fireworks In the comic sequences of sixteenth-century pageants and plays, fireworks were often attached to the costumes of devils and clowns in ways designed to make fun of sexual and excretory functions.

175 FAUSTUS. O, thou art deceived.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Tut, I warrant thee.¹

(Turn to them. Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 2²

(Enter Robin the ostler with a book in his hand.)

ROBIN. O, this is admirable! Here I ha' stolen one of Doctor Faustus' conjuring books, and i'faith I mean to search some circles³ for my own use: now will I make all the maidens in our parish dance at my pleasure stark
5 naked before me, and so by that means I shall see more than I ever felt, or saw yet.

(Enter Rafe, calling Robin.)

RAFE. Robin, prithee come away! There's a gentleman tarries to have his horse, and he would have his things rubbed and made clean: he keeps such a chafing with 10 my mistress about it, and she has sent me to look thee out; prithee come away!

ROBIN. Keep out, keep out, or else you are blown up, you are dismembered. Rafe! Keep out, for I am about a roaring⁴ piece of work.

15 RAFE. Come, what dost thou with that same book? Thou canst not read.

ROBIN. Yes, my master and mistress shall find that I can read: he for his forehead,⁵ she for her private study.⁶ She's born to bear with⁷ me, or else my art fails.

20 RAFE. Why Robin, what book is that?

ROBIN. What book? Why, the most intolerable book for conjuring that e'er was invented by any brimstone devil!

RAFE. Canst thou conjure with it?

ROBIN. I can do all these things easily with it: first, I can 25 make thee drunk with hippocras⁸ at any tavern in Europe for nothing; that's one of my conjuring works.

RAFE. Our master parson says that's nothing.

ROBIN. True, Rafe. And more, Rafe, if thou hast any mind to Nan Spit our kitchen maid, then turn her and 30 wind her⁹ to thine own use, as often as thou wilt, and at midnight.

RAFE. O brave Robin, shall I have Nan Spit, and to mine own use? On that condition I'll feed thy devil with horse-bread¹⁰ as long as he lives, of free cost.

35 ROBIN. No more, sweet Rafe: let's go and make clean our boots which lie foul upon our hands; and then to our conjuring, in the devil's name!

(Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 3

(Enter Faustus in his study, and Mephistophilis.)

FAUSTUS. When I behold the heavens then I repent
And curse thee, wicked Mephistophilis,
Because thou hast depriv'd me of those joys.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why Faustus,
5 Think'st thou heaven is such a glorious thing?
I tell thee 'tis not half so fair as thou
Or any man that breathes on earth.

FAUSTUS. How prov'st thou that?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. 'Twas made for man,
Therefore is man more excellent.

10 FAUSTUS. If it were made for man, 'twas made for me:
I will renounce this magic and repent.

¹ I warrant thee I assure you.

² ACT 2, SCENE 2 In both the 1604 and the 1616 texts of the play this scene, together with the scene numbered Act 3, Scene 2 in the present edition, appear in succession.

³ circles Magic circles, and also women's vaginas.

⁴ roaring Noisy, riotous.

⁵ forehead Deceived husbands or cuckolds were said to wear horns on their foreheads.

⁶ private study With a quibble on private parts.

⁷ to bear with To put up with; also (another bawdy quibble) to lie under, to bear the weight of his body.

⁸ hippocras Wine flavored with spices.

⁹ Nan Spit ... wind her One of the humblest occupations in the kitchen of a large household or inn was that of the turnspit, whose job was to stand by the open fireplace and crank the horizontally mounted spit on which roasting meat was impaled. Robin tempts Rafe with the thought of sexually impaling and "turning" this kitchen maid—of treating her, in effect, as she treats a roast of meat.

¹⁰ horse-bread Bread made of beans, bran, etc. for horses—but apparently sometimes eaten also by the very poor. Rafe seems to be aware of the popular superstition according to which familiar spirits took the form of animals, and were fed like pets by the witches to whom they attached themselves.

(Enter Good Angel and Evil Angel.)

GOOD ANGEL. Faustus, repent yet, God will pity thee.

EVIL ANGEL. Thou art a spirit, God cannot pity thee.

FAUSTUS. Who buzzeth^o in mine ears I am a spirit? whispers

15 Be I a devil, yet God may pity me.

Ay, God will pity me if I repent.

EVIL ANGEL. Ay, but Faustus never shall repent.

(Exeunt Angels.)

FAUSTUS. My heart's so harden'd I cannot repent.

Scarce can I name salvation, faith, or heaven,

20 But fearful echoes thunders in mine ears,

"Faustus, thou art damn'd!" Then swords and knives,

Poison, guns, halters,¹ and envenom'd steel

Are laid before me to dispatch myself,

And long ere this I should have done the deed

25 Had not sweet pleasure conquer'd deep despair.

Have I not made blind Homer sing to me

Of Alexander's love and Oenone's death?²

And hath not he that built the walls of Thebes

With ravishing sound of his melodious harp³

30 Made music with my Mephistophilis?

Why should I die, then, or basely despair?

I am resolv'd: Faustus shall ne'er repent.

Come Mephistophilis, let us dispute again,

And reason of divine astrology.⁴

35 Speak, are there many spheres above the moon?

Are celestial bodies but one globe,

² Alexander's ... death These are matters which Homer left unsung; Faustus would have been the first to hear them from his lips. Paris (also named Alexandros), a son of King Priam and Queen Hecuba of Troy, was cast out by his parents (for it was prophesied that he should cause the destruction of Troy) and brought up among the shepherds of Mount Ida, where he won the love of Oenone. Asked by Hera, Athena, and Aphrodite to award a golden apple to the most beautiful goddess, he succumbed to Aphrodite's bribe of the love of the fairest woman alive, abandoned Oenone and abducted Helen from Sparta, thus provoking the Trojan War. Later, having been wounded by a poisoned arrow, he could have been healed only by Oenone; after jealously refusing to cure him, she was overwhelmed with remorse and threw herself onto his funeral pyre.

³ he ... harp Amphion and his brother built the walls of Thebes; the music of Amphion's lyre magically moved huge stones into place.

⁴ astrology Not clearly distinguished from astronomy until the seventeenth century.

As is the substance of this centric earth?⁵

MEPHASTOPHILIS. As are the elements, such are the heavens,

Even from the moon unto the empyreal orb,

40 Mutually folded on each other's spheres,

And jointly move upon one axle-tree

Whose termine is term'd the world's wide pole.

Nor are the names of Saturn, Mars, or Jupiter

Feign'd, but are erring stars.

45 FAUSTUS. But tell me, have they all one motion, both situ et tempore?⁶

MEPHASTOPHILIS. All jointly move from east to west in four and twenty hours upon the poles of the world, but differ in their motions upon the poles of the zodiac.

50 FAUSTUS. These slender questions Wagner can decide: Hath Mephistophilis no greater skill?

Who knows not the double notion of the planets?⁷

The first is finish'd in a natural day,

The second thus: Saturn in thirty years,

55 Jupiter in twelve, Mars in four, the Sun, Venus, and Mercury in a year, the Moon in twenty-eight days.⁸

⁵ the substance of this centric earth The elements (earth, water, air, and fire) that make up "the substance of this centric earth" were thought to be concentrically disposed; so also, in the old geocentric cosmology, were the spheres that governed the motions of those wandering or "erring" stars, the planets. Mephistophilis says there are nine spheres: those of the planets, including the moon and the sun; the firmament, to which the fixed stars are attached; and the empyrean, the outermost and motionless sphere of the universe. (He apparently conflates the primum mobile, thought of by some astronomers as a distinct sphere that imparts motion to the heavens, with the firmament.) All of this is utterly commonplace. The systems developed by ancient astronomers were enormously more complex: Eudoxus (fourth century BCE) required twenty-seven, and Ptolemy (second century CE) more than eighty variously revolving spheres, including epicyclic and eccentric ones, to explain the motions of the planets.

⁶ situ et tempore Latin: in position and time; i.e., in the direction of their revolutions around the earth and in the time these take.

⁷ poles ... planets The apparent diurnal motion of the planetary spheres "upon one axle-tree" (the northern "termine" of which nearly coincides with the star Polaris) is of course due, in post-Copernican terms, to the earth's rotation upon its axis. The second component of the planets' apparent "double motion" is an effect of the differences between the earth's period of revolution around the sun and theirs.

⁸ first ... days The periods of planetary revolution given by Faustus correspond for the most part to the then-accepted figures: Saturn 28 years, Jupiter 12 years, Mars 2 years, Venus, Mercury, and, of course, the sun 1 year, and the moon 1 month. The actual—as opposed to apparent—periods for the inner planets are of course much less: $7\frac{1}{2}$ and 3 months respectively.

Tush, these are freshmen's suppositions! But tell me, hath every sphere a dominion or intelligentia?¹

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay.

60 FAUSTUS. How many planets or spheres are there?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Nine: the seven planets, the firmament, and the empyreal heaven.

FAUSTUS. But is there not coelum igneum, et crystallinum?²

MEPHASTOPHILIS. No, Faustus, they be but fables.

65 FAUSTUS. Resolve me then in this one question: Why are not conjunctions, oppositions, aspects,³ eclipses all at one time, but in some years we have more, in some less?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Per inaequalem motum respectu totius.⁴

70 FAUSTUS. Well, I am answered. Now tell me who made the world.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I will not.

FAUSTUS. Sweet Mephistophilis, tell me.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Move^o me not, Faustus. anger

FAUSTUS. Villain, have I not bound thee to tell me any thing?

75 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay, that is not against our kingdom. This is. Thou are damn'd, think thou of hell.

FAUSTUS. Think, Faustus, upon God that made the world!

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Remember this.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. Ay, go accursed spirit to ugly hell:

80 'Tis thou hast damn'd distressed Faustus' soul.
Is't not too late?

(Enter Good Angel and Evil Angel.)

EVIL ANGEL. Too late.

GOOD ANGEL. Never too late, if Faustus can repent.

EVIL ANGEL. If thou repent, devils shall tear thee in pieces.

GOOD ANGEL. Repent, and they shall never raze^o thy skin. graze

(Exeunt Angels.)

85 FAUSTUS. Ah Christ, my Saviour,
Seek to save distressed Faustus' soul!

(Enter Lucifer, Belzebub, and Mephistophilis.)

LUCIFER. Christ cannot save thy soul, for he is just;
There's none but I have interest in⁵ the same.

FAUSTUS. O, what art thou that look'st so terribly?

90 LUCIFER. I am Lucifer, and this is my companion prince in hell.

FAUSTUS. O Faustus, they are come to fetch away thy soul!

LUCIFER. We come to tell thee thou dost injure us.

Thou talk'st of Christ, contrary to thy promise.

BELZEBUB. Thou should'st not think of God.

LUCIFER. Think of the devil.

95 BELZEBUB. And of his dam^o too. woman

FAUSTUS. Nor will I henceforth:⁶ pardon me in this,

And Faustus vows never to look to heaven,

Never to name God or to pray to him,

To burn his Scriptures, slay his ministers,

100 And make my spirits pull his churches down.

LUCIFER. So shalt thou show thyself an obedient servant,
and we will highly gratify thee for it.

BELZEBUB. Faustus, we are come from hell to show thee some pastime. Sit down, and thou shalt behold the 105 Seven Deadly Sins appear to thee in their own proper shapes and likeness.

FAUSTUS. That sight will be as pleasing unto me as Paradise was to Adam, the first day of his creation.

LUCIFER. Talk not of Paradise, or creation, but mark the show.

110 Go, Mephistophilis, fetch them in.

(Enter the Seven Deadly Sins.)

¹ dominion or intelligentia It was widely believed that the planets were moved or guided by angels or intelligences.

² coelum igneum, et crystallinum Latin: a fiery, and a crystalline heaven.

³ conjunctions ... aspects Astrological terms referring respectively to the apparent proximity of two planets, to their positioning on opposite sides of the sky, and to any other angular relation between their positions.

⁴ Per inaequalem motum respectu totius Latin: Through an unequal motion with respect to the whole.

⁵ interest in Legal claim upon.

⁶ Nor ... henceforth I.e., think of God.

BELZEBUB. Now Faustus, question them of their names and dispositions.

FAUSTUS. That shall I soon: what art thou, the first?

PRIDE. I am Pride. I disdain to have any parents. I am 115 like Ovid's flea,¹ I can creep into every corner of a wench: sometimes like a periwig I sit upon her brow;
 next like a necklace I hang about her neck; then like a fan of feathers I kiss her lips; and then, turning myself to a wrought smock, do what I list. But fie, what a smell 120 is here? I'll not speak a word more, unless the ground be perfumed and covered with a cloth of arras.²

FAUSTUS. Thou art a proud knave indeed. What art thou, the second?

COVETOUSNESS. I am Covetousness, begotten of an old 125 churl in an old leathern bag; and might I have my wish,
 I would desire that this house and all the people in it were turned to gold, that I might lock you up in my good chest. O, my sweet gold!

FAUSTUS. What art thou, the third?

WRATH. I am Wrath. I had neither father nor mother;
 I leapt out of a lion's mouth when I was scarce half an hour old, and ever since I have run up and down the world with this case³ of rapiers, wounding myself when I had nobody to fight withal. I was born in hell, and 135 look to it: for some of you shall be my father.

FAUSTUS. What art thou, the fourth?

ENVY. I am Envy, begotten of a chimney-sweeper and an oyster wife.⁴ I cannot read, and therefore wish all 140 books were burned; I am lean with seeing others eat. O, that there would come a famine through all the world,
 that all might die, and I live alone: then thou should'st see how fat I would be. But must thou sit and I stand?
 Come down, with a vengeance!⁵

FAUSTUS. Away, envious rascal! What art thou, the fifth?

145 GLUTTONY. Who I, sir? I am Gluttony. My parents are all dead, and the devil a penny they have left me, but a bare pension, and that buys me thirty meals a day and ten bevers:⁶ a small trifle to suffice nature. O, I come of a royal parentage: my grandfather was a gammon of 150 bacon,⁷ my grand-mother a hogshead⁸ of claret⁹ wine.

 My god-fathers were these: Peter Pickleherring¹⁰ and Martin Martlemas-beef.¹¹ O, but my godmother she was a jolly gentlewoman, and well-beloved in every good town and city: her name was Mistress Margery March-155 beer.¹² Now, Faustus, thou hast heard all my progeny, wilt thou bid me to supper?

FAUSTUS. No, I'll see thee hanged: thou wilt eat up all my victuals.

GLUTTONY. Then the devil choke thee.

160 FAUSTUS. Choke thyself, glutton! What art thou, the sixth?

SLOTH. I am Sloth. I was begotten on a sunny bank, where I have lain ever since, and you have done me great injury to bring me from thence. Let me be carried 165 thither again by Gluttony and Lechery. I'll not speak another word for a king's ransom.

FAUSTUS. What are you, mistress minx,¹³ the seventh and last?

170 LECHERY. Who I, sir? I am one that loves an inch of raw mutton¹⁴ better than an ell¹⁵ of fried stock-fish,¹⁶ and the first letter of my name begins with Lechery.

LUCIFER. Away, to hell, to hell.

⁶ bevers Drinks; also light meals or snacks.

⁷ gammon of bacon Bottom piece of a flitch of bacon.

⁸ hogshead Wine-barrel of a standard size, holding (in modern terms) 225 liters or 63 American gallons—the equivalent of 25 cases of a dozen bottles of wine.

⁹ claret Light red wine from the Bordeaux region.

¹⁰ Pickleherring Clown figure associated with carnival festivities and popular farces.

¹¹ Martlemas-beef Martinmas, or St. Martin's Day (November 11), was the traditional time to slaughter cattle that could not be fed over the winter, and to commence the production of salt beef; it was therefore also a time for feasting on "green" or unsalted beef.

¹² March-beer Strong beer brewed in March.

¹³ minx Hussy, wanton woman.

¹⁴ raw mutton Metaphor for prostitutes; the expression here takes on a phallic meaning.

¹⁵ ell Measure of length (equal in England to some forty-five inches), commonly contrasted to an inch.

¹⁶ stock-fish Unsalted dried fish, sometimes abusively associated with the flaccid male organ.

¹ Ovid's flea The poem being referenced, Elegia de pulice, was written in imitation of Ovid, and wrongly ascribed to him. In it is a line addressed to the flea: "You go wherever you wish; nothing, savage, is hidden from you."

² cloth of arras Tapestry fabric of the kind woven at Arras in Flanders; to use it as a floor covering would be grossly ostentatious.

³ case Pair.

⁴ begotten ... wife I.e., filthy and foul-smelling woman.

⁵ with a vengeance With a curse on you.

(Exeunt the Sins.)

Now Faustus, how dost thou like this?

FAUSTUS. O, this feeds my soul.

175 LUCIFER. Tut, Faustus, in hell is all manner of delight.

FAUSTUS. O, might I see hell, and return again, how happy were I then!

LUCIFER. Thou shalt. I will send for thee at midnight. In mean time, take this book, peruse it thoroughly, and 180 thou shalt turn thyself into what shape thou wilt.

FAUSTUS. Great thanks, mighty Lucifer:

This will I keep as chary^o as my life. carefully

LUCIFER. Farewell, Faustus, and think on the devil.

FAUSTUS. Farewell, great Lucifer. Come, Mephistophilis.

(Exeunt all.)

ACT 3, CHORUS.

(Enter the Chorus [Wagner].)

WAGNER. Learned Faustus,

To know the secrets of astronomy
Graven in the book of Jove's high firmament,

Did mount him up to scale Olympus' top,¹

5 Where sitting in a chariot burning bright,²
Drawn by the strength of yoked dragons' necks,
He views the clouds, the planets and the stars,

The tropics, zones, and quarters³ of the sky,
From the bright circle of the horned moon

10 Even to the height of primum mobile,⁴

And whirling round with this circumference
Within the concave compass of the pole,
From east to west his dragons swiftly glide,

¹ to scale Olympus' top I.e., to ascend to the dwelling-place of the gods, on the top of Mount Olympus.

² chariot ... bright Parodic echo of the vision of the divine chariot-throne in Ezekiel 1.13–28.

³ tropics ... quarters Tropics of Cancer and Capricorn, the arctic and antarctic circles and the equator divided the celestial sphere into five belts or zones; traditional astronomy also quartered the celestial sphere with two other circles that passed through its north and south poles: the solstitial colure, which intersects the two tropics at the solstitial points (those at which the ecliptic meets the tropics); and the equinoctial colure, which intersects the equator at the equinoctial points (those at which the ecliptic crosses the equator).

⁴ From ... mobile From the lowest to the highest of the spheres.

And in eight days did bring him home again.

15 Not long he stay'd within his quiet house

To rest his bones after his weary toil,
But new exploits do hale him out again,

And mounted then upon a dragon's back
That with his wings did part the subtle^o air, rarified

20 He now is gone to prove cosmography,⁵
That measures coasts and kingdoms of the earth.

And as I guess, will first arrive at Rome

To see the Pope, and manner of his court,

And take some part of holy Peter's⁶ feast,

25 The which this day is highly solemniz'd.

(Exit.)

ACT 3, SCENE 1

(Enter Faustus and Mephistophilis.)

FAUSTUS. Having now, my good Mephistophilis,

Pass'd with delight the stately town of Trier,⁷

Environ'd round with airy mountain tops,
With walls of flint, and deep entrenched lakes,

5 Not to be won by any conquering prince;
From Paris next, coasting the realm of France,
We saw the river Main fall into Rhine,
Whose banks are set with groves of fruitful vines;
Then up to Naples, rich Campania,⁸

10 Whose buildings, fair and gorgeous to the eye
(The streets are straightforth and pav'd with finest brick),
Quarters the town in four equivalents.

There saw we learned Maro's⁹ golden tomb,

⁵ to prove cosmography To put geography to the test. Cosmography was sometimes thought of as a science that maps the universe as a whole, thus incorporating geography and astronomy.

⁶ holy Peter St. Peter.

⁷ Trier City on the Moselle River, capital of an electoral state of the Holy Roman Empire, which under the rule of Elector-Archbishop Johann von Schöenberg was subjected during the 1580s and 1590s to a violent wave of witch-hunts.

⁸ Campania In ancient usage, the plain surrounding the city of Capua; since medieval times, Naples has been the principal city of this region. (In modern Italy the name Campania is applied to a much larger area.)

⁹ Maro Virgil, or Publius Vergilius Maro, died at Naples in 19 BCE. In part because his fourth Eclogue was interpreted as a prophecy of the coming of Christ, he acquired a reputation during the medieval period as a necromancer. His supposed tomb stands [continued ...]

15 The way¹ he cut, an English mile in length,
 Thorough a rock of stone in one night's space.
 From thence to Venice, Padua, and the rest,
 In midst of which a sumptuous temple stands,
 That threatens the stars² with her aspiring top.
 Thus hitherto hath Faustus spent his time.
 20 But tell me now, what resting place is this?
 Hast thou, as erst^o I did command, first
 Conducted me within the walls of Rome?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Faustus, I have, and because we will not be unprovided,

I have taken up his Holiness' privy chamber³ for our use.

25 FAUSTUS. I hope his Holiness will bid us welcome.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Tut, 'tis no matter, man, we'll be bold with his good cheer.

And now my Faustus, that thou may'st perceive

What Rome containeth to delight thee with,

Know that this city stands upon seven hills

30 That underprop the groundwork of the same;

Just through the midst runs flowing Tiber's stream,

With winding banks that cut it in two parts,

Over the which four stately bridges lean,

That make safe passage to each part of Rome.

35 Upon the bridge call'd Ponte Angelo

Erected is a castle passing strong,⁴

Within those walls such stores of ordnance are,

And double cannons,⁵ fram'd of carved brass,

As match the days within one complete year—

40 Besides the gates and high pyramides⁶

Which Julius Caesar brought from Africa.

FAUSTUS. Now, by the kingdoms of infernal rule, on the promontory of Posilipo on the Bay of Naples, at the Naples end of a tunnel, nearly half a mile in length, which cuts through the promontory—and which, as Petrarch wrote, “the insipid masses conclude was made by Virgil with magical incantations.”

² sumptuous ... stars Saint Mark's in Venice. The “aspiring top” would have to be that of the campanile, which stands at some distance from the church.

³ privy chamber Bedchamber.

⁴ castle ... strong Papal fortress of Castel San Angelo.

⁵ double cannons Cannons of very large caliber.

⁶ pyramides Obelisk, in this case the one brought to Rome from Egypt by the emperor Caligula (not Julius Caesar), and moved to its present site in the Piazza San Pietro in 1586. The word is singular, not plural.

Of Styx, Acheron, and the fiery lake
 Of ever-burning Phlegethon,⁷ I swear
 45 That I do long to see the monuments
 And situation of bright splendent Rome.
 Come therefore, let's away.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Nay Faustus, stay: I know you'd fain see the Pope,

And take some part of^o holy Peter's feast, in

50 Where thou shalt see a troop of bald-pate friars
 Whose *summum bonum*⁸ is in belly-cheer.

FAUSTUS. Well, I am content to compass^o contrive
 then some sport,

And by their folly make us merriment.

Then charm me, that I may be invisible,

55 To do what I please

Unseen of any whilst I stay in Rome.

(Mephastophilis charms him.)⁹

MEPHASTOPHILIS. So, Faustus: now

Do what thou wilt, thou shalt not be discern'd.

(*Sound a sennet.*¹⁰ *Enter the Pope and the Cardinal of Lorraine*¹¹ to the banquet, with Friars attending.)

POPE. My lord of Lorraine, will't please you draw near?

60 FAUSTUS. Fall to, and the devil choke you and you spare.¹²

⁷ Styx, Acheron ... Phlegethon Three of the four rivers of Hades, the Greek underworld.

⁸ summum bonum Latin: highest good.

⁹ Mephastophilis charms him According to Henslowe's Diary the Admiral's Men owned a “robe for to go invisible,” a prop which may have been used here.

¹⁰ sennet Flourish on the trumpet to announce a ceremonial entrance.

¹¹ Cardinal of Lorraine This position was held during the sixteenth century by several members of the powerful Guise family: Jean de Guise (1498–1550); Charles de Guise (1524–74), who helped foment the wars of religion that convulsed France for decades after 1562 and acquired a reputation for dissimulation and cruelty; and Louis de Guise (1555–88), who along with his brother, Henri, third Duc de Guise (1550–88), was assassinated by King Henri III. As leaders of the pro-Spanish and ultra-Catholic Ligue, and thus major figures in the Spanish-led campaign against Protestantism, Louis and Henri de Guise were feared and detested in England.

¹² and you spare If you eat sparingly.

POPE. How now, who's that which spake? Friars, look about!

FRIAR. Here's nobody, if it like¹ your Holiness.

POPE. My lord, here is a dainty dish was sent me from the Bishop of Milan.

65 FAUSTUS. I thank you, sir.

(Snatch it.)

POPE. How now, who's that which snatched the meat from me? Will no man look? My lord, this dish was sent me from the Cardinal of Florence.

FAUSTUS. You say true, I'll ha' it.

(Snatch it.)

70 POPE. What, again! My lord, I'll drink to your grace.

FAUSTUS. I'll pledge your grace.

(Snatch it.)

LORRAINE. My lord, it may be some ghost newly crept out of purgatory come to beg a pardon of your Holiness.

POPE. It may be so. Friars, prepare a dirge² to lay the 75 fury of this ghost. Once again, my lord, fall to. (*The Pope crosses himself.*³)

FAUSTUS. What, are you crossing your self? Well, use that trick no more, I would advise you.

(Cross again.)

FAUSTUS. Well, there's the second time. Aware the 80 third, I give you fair warning.

(Cross again, and Faustus hits him a box of the ear, and they all run away.)

Come on, Mephistophilis, what shall we do?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Nay, I know not; we shall be cursed with bell, book and candle.⁴

FAUSTUS. How? Bell, book and candle, candle, book and bell,

85 Forward and backward, to curse Faustus to hell.
Anon you shall hear a hog grunt, a calf bleat, and an ass bray,
Because it is Saint Peter's holy day!

(Enter all the Friars to sing the dirge.)

FRIAR. Come brethren, let's about our business with good devotion.

(They sing this:)

Cursed be he that stole away his Holiness' meat from the table.
90 *Maledicat dominus!*⁵

Cursed be he that struck his Holiness a blow on the face.
Maledicat dominus!

Cursed be he that took Friar Sandelo a blow on the pate.
Maledicat dominus!

95 Cursed be he that disturbeth our holy dirge.
Maledicat dominus!

Cursed be he that took away his Holiness' wine.
*Maledicat dominus! Et omnes sancti!*⁶ Amen.

(Faustus and Mephistophilis beat the Friars and fling fireworks among them, and so exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 2

(Enter Robin and Rafe with a silver goblet.)

ROBIN. Come Rafe, did I not tell thee we were for ever made by this Doctor Faustus' book? Ecce signum,⁷ here's

² dirge Originally "dirige," the first word of the Latin antiphon at matins in the Office of the Dead ("Dirige, Domine, Deus meus, in conspectu tuo viam meum": "Direct, O Lord, my God, my way in thy sight").

³ crosses himself Makes the sign of the cross, the preliminary to Roman Catholic prayer.

⁴ bell, book and candle At the end of the ritual of excommunication, which is performed to debar a member of the Church from the sacraments, the bell is tolled, the book closed, and the candle extinguished. That ritual is confused here with the office of exorcism, performed to banish evil spirits.

⁵ Maledicat dominus Latin: May the Lord curse him.

⁶ Et omnes sancti! Latin: And (may) all the saints (curse him).

⁷ Ecce signum Latin: Behold the sign.

a simple purchase for horse-keepers! Our horses shall eat no hay as long as this lasts.

(Enter the Vintner.)

- 5 RAFE. But Robin, here comes the Vintner.
 ROBIN. Hush, I'll gull¹ him supernaturally. Drawer,² I hope all is paid. God be with you; come Rafe.
 VINTNER. Soft,³ sir; a word with you. I must yet have a goblet paid from you ere you go.
 10 ROBIN. I a goblet? Rafe, I a goblet? I scorn you, and you are but a etc.⁴ I a goblet? Search me!
 VINTNER. I mean so, sir, with your favor.

(Searches Robin.)

- ROBIN. How say you now?
 VINTNER. I must say somewhat to your fellow. You, sir.
 15 RAFE. Me, sir? Me, sir! Search your fill! Now, sir, you may be ashamed to burden honest men with a matter of truth.
 VINTNER. Well, t'one of you hath this goblet about you.
 ROBIN. You lie, drawer, 'tis afore me. Sirrah you, I'll 20 teach ye to impeach⁵ honest men: stand by, I'll scour you for a goblet. Stand aside, you had best, I charge you in the name of Belzebub! Look to the goblet, Rafe.⁶
 VINTNER. What mean you, sirrah?
 ROBIN. I'll tell you what I mean.

(He reads.)

² Drawer An insult: Robin pretends to mistake the Vintner (or innkeeper) for his employee, the tapster or drawer who serves the customers.

³ Soft Softly, slowly; here carrying an imperative force, as in "not so fast!"

⁴ etc. Substitute for a scatological or obscene expression.

⁵ impeach Accuse.

⁶ Look ... Rafe Robin and Rafe are apparently passing the goblet back and forth between them.

- 25 Sanctabulorum periphrasticon—Nay, I'll tickle you, Vintner! Look to the goblet, Rafe. *Polypragmos Belseborams framanto pacostiphos tostu Mephastophilis, etc.*⁷

(Enter Mephastophilis; sets squibs⁸ at their backs; they run about.)

- VINTNER. O nomine Domine! What mean'st thou, Robin? Thou hast no goblet!
 30 RAFE. Peccatum peccatorum! Here's thy goblet, good Vintner!
 ROBIN. *Misericordia pro nobis!*⁹ What shall I do? Good devil, forgive me now, and I'll never rob thy library more!
 35 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Monarch of hell, under whose black survey
 Great potentates do kneel with awful fear,
 Upon whose altars thousand souls do lie,
 How am I vexed with these villains' charms!
 From Constantinople am I hither come
 40 Only for pleasure of these damned slaves.
 ROBIN. How, from Constantinople? You have had a great journey, will you take sixpence in your purse to pay for your supper, and be gone?
 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Well villains, for your presumption,
 45 I transform thee into an ape, and thee into a dog, and so be gone!
 (Exit.)

- ROBIN. How, into an ape? That's brave, I'll have fine sport with the boys; I'll get nuts and apples enow.¹⁰
 RAFE. And I must be a dog.
 50 ROBIN. I faith, thy head will never be out of the pottage pot.

(Exeunt.)

⁷ Sanctabulorum ... Mephastophilis, etc. Robin's incantation is gibberish, though some of it comes close to deviating into sense. The Greek periphrastikos means "circumlocutory." In Greek polypragmosyne means "curiosity" or "meddlesomeness," and a polypragmon is a "busybody." The first four words of the invocation might then be translated as "Busy-body Belseborams ... of beating-around-the-bush holy-molydoms!"

⁸ squibs Fireworks.

⁹ O ... nobis Garbled scraps of liturgical Latin.

¹⁰ enow Enough.

ACT 4, CHORUS

(Enter Chorus.)

CHORUS. When Faustus had with pleasure ta'en the view
 Of rarest things and royal courts of kings,
 He stay'd his course, and so returned home,
 Where such as bear his absence but with grief,
 5 I mean his friends and nearest companions,
 Did gratulate his safety with kind words,
 And in their conference of what befell
 Touching his journey through the world and air
 They put forth questions of astrology,
 10 Which Faustus answer'd with such learned skill
 As¹ they admir'd and wonder'd at his wit.
 Now is his fame spread forth in every land;
 Amongst the rest of Emperor is one,
 Carolus the Fifth,² at whose palace now
 15 Faustus is feasted 'mongst his noblemen.
 What there he did in trial of his art
 I leave untold, your eyes shall see perform'd.

(Exit.)

ACT 4, SCENE 1

(Enter Emperor, Faustus, and a Knight, with attendants.)

EMPEROR. Master Doctor Faustus, I have heard strange report of thy knowledge in the black art, how that none in my empire, nor in the whole world, can compare with thee for the rare³ effects of magic: they say thou hast a familiar spirit, by whom thou canst accomplish
 5 what thou list.⁴ This therefore is my request: that thou let me see some proof of thy skill, that mine eyes may be witnesses to confirm what mine ears have heard reported; and here I swear to thee, by the honor of mine 10 imperial crown, that whatever thou doest, thou shalt be no ways prejudiced or endamaged.⁵KNIGHT. (Aside.) I'faith, he looks much like a conjurer.

FAUSTUS. My gracious sovereign, though I must confess myself far inferior to the report men have published, 15 and nothing answerable⁶ to the honor of your imperial Majesty, yet for that⁷ love and duty binds me thereunto,
 I am content to do whatsoever your Majesty shall command me.

EMPEROR. Then Doctor Faustus, mark what I shall say.

As I was sometime solitary set
 20 Within my closet,⁸ sundry thoughts arose
 About the honor of mine ancestors:
 How they had won by prowess such exploits,
 Got riches, subdu'd so many kingdoms,
 25 As we that do succeed,⁹ or they that shall Hereafter possess our throne shall,
 I fear me, never attain to that degree
 Of high renown and great authority;
 Amongst which kings is Alexander the Great,
 30 Chief spectacle of the world's pre-eminence,¹⁰
 The bright shining of whose glorious acts
 Lightens the world with his reflecting beams,
 As when I hear but motion^o made of him mention
 It grieves my soul I never saw the man.
 35 If therefore thou, by cunning of thine art,
 Canst raise this man from hollow vaults below
 Where lies entomb'd this famous conqueror,
 And bring with him his beauteous paramour,¹¹
 Both in their right shapes, gesture, and attire
 40 They us'd to wear during their time of life,
 Thou shalt both satisfy my just desire
 And give me cause to praise thee whilst I live.

FAUSTUS. My gracious lord, I am ready to accomplish your request, so far forth as by art and power of my 45 spirit I am able to perform.

KNIGHT. (Aside.) I'faith that's just nothing at all.

FAUSTUS. But if it like your Grace, it is not in my ability to present before your eyes the true substantial bodies of those two deceased princes, which long since are consumed to dust.

² Carolus the Fifth Charles V (1500–58), King of Spain and Holy Roman Emperor from 1518 and 1519 respectively until his abdication in 1555. The historical Doctor Faustus never made an appearance at the imperial court. Contemporary magi, however, had connections with the courts of both the emperor Maximilian (Charles V's grandfather and immediate predecessor) and Charles V.

³ rare Remarkable, extraordinary.⁴ what thou list Whatever you wish.⁵ endamaged Harmed.⁶ nothing answerable Quite unequal.⁷ for that Because.⁸ closet Study, inner chamber.⁹ succeed Follow in dynastic succession.¹⁰ pre-eminence Pre-eminent people.¹¹ paramour Mistress, consort (i.e., Roxane of Oxyartes).

KNIGHT. (Aside.) Ay, marry¹ Master Doctor, now there's a sign of grace in you when you will confess the truth.

FAUSTUS. But such spirits as can lively resemble Alexander and his paramour shall appear before your Grace, in that manner that they best lived in, in their most flourishing estate, which I doubt not shall sufficiently content your imperial Majesty.

EMPEROR. Go to,² Master Doctor, let me see them presently.³

KNIGHT. Do you hear, Master Doctor? You bring Alexander and his paramour before the Emperor?

FAUSTUS. How then, sir?

KNIGHT. I'faith, that's as true as Diana turned me to a stag.

FAUSTUS. No sir, but when Actaeon⁴ died, he left the horns for you. Mephistophilis, be gone.

(Exit Mephistophilis.)

KNIGHT. Nay, and⁵ you go to conjuring, I'll be gone.

(Exit Knight.)

FAUSTUS. I'll meet with⁶ you anon for interrupting me so. Here they are, my gracious lord.

(Enter Mephistophilis with Alexander and his paramour.)

EMPEROR. Master Doctor, I heard this lady while she lived had a wart or mole in her neck. How shall I know whether it be so or no?

FAUSTUS. Your highness may boldly go and see.

(Emperor does so; then spirits exeunt.)

² Go to Normally an expression of incredulity, it appears here to express mild demurral, or perhaps encouragement, with the same range of meanings as "Come, come."

³ presently At once.

⁴ Diana ... Actaeon Actaeon, a hunter, witnessed the goddess Diana and her nymphs bathing; the goddess transformed him into a stag and he was torn to pieces by his own dogs.

⁵ and If.

⁶ meet with Get even with.

EMPEROR. Sure these are no spirits, but the true substantial bodies of these two deceased princes.⁷

FAUSTUS. Will't please your highness now to send for the knight that was so pleasant with me here of late?

EMPEROR. One of you call him forth.

(Enter the Knight with a pair of horns on his head.)

How now, sir knight? Why, I had thought thou had'st been a bachelor, but now I see thou hast a wife, that not only gives thee horns but makes thee wear them. Feel on thy head!

KNIGHT. Thou damned wretch and execrable dog, Bred in the concave of some monstrous rock,

How dar'st thou thus abuse a gentleman? Villain, I say, undo what thou hast done!

FAUSTUS. O not so fast, sir; there's no haste but good.⁸ Are you remembered how you crossed me in my conference with the Emperor? I think I have met with you for it.

EMPEROR. Good Master Doctor, at my entreaty release him. He hath done penance sufficient.

FAUSTUS. My gracious lord, not so much for the injury⁹ he offered me here in your presence, as to delight you with some mirth, hath Faustus worthily requited this injurious knight; which being all I desire, I am content to release him of his horns. And sir knight, hereafter speak well of scholars. Mephistophilis, transform him straight.¹⁰ Now, my good lord, having done my duty, I humbly take my leave.

EMPEROR. Farewell, Master Doctor; yet ere you go, expect from me a bounteous reward.

(Exeunt Emperor, Knight, and attendants.)

ACT 4, SCENE 2

FAUSTUS. Now Mephistophilis, the restless course That time doth run with calm and silent foot, Shortening my days and thread of vital life,

⁷ princes Used in this period to refer, not to a male ruler, but any ruler.

⁸ there's ... good Common proverb: "No haste but good (speed)."

⁹ injury Insult.

¹⁰ straight At once.

Calls for the payment of my latest years.

5 Therefore, sweet Mephistophilis,
Let us make haste to Wittenberg.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. What, will you go on horseback, or on foot?

FAUSTUS. Nay, till I am past this fair and pleasant green
I'll walk on foot.

(Enter a Horse-courser.)¹

10 HORSE-COURSER. I have been all this day seeking one Master Fustian; mass,² see where he is. God save you, Master Doctor.

FAUSTUS. What, horse-courser, you are well met.

HORSE-COURSER. Do you hear, sir? I have brought you 15 forty dollars for your horse.

FAUSTUS. I cannot sell him. If thou lik'st him for fifty, take him.

HORSE-COURSER. Alas sir, I have no more. I pray you, speak for me.

20 MEPHASTOPHILIS. I pray you, let him have him. He is an honest fellow, and he has a great charge,³ neither wife nor child.

FAUSTUS. Well, come, give me your money. My boy will deliver him to you. But I must tell you one thing before 25 you have him: ride him not into the water at any hand.⁴

HORSE-COURSER. Why sir, will he not drink of all waters?

FAUSTUS. O yes, he will drink of all waters, but ride him not into the water. Ride him over hedge or ditch, or 30 where thou wilt, but not into the water.

HORSE-COURSER. Well, sir, now am I a made man for ever! I'll not leave⁵ my horse for forty. If he had but the quality of hey ding ding, hey ding ding, I'd make a brave living on him: he has a buttock so slick as an eel.⁶

² Fustian Clownish deformation of "Faustus"; bombast, nonsense;
mass Contraction of "By the Mass."

³ charge Burden (of family responsibilities).

⁴ at any hand Under any circumstances.

⁵ leave Sell.

⁶ hey ding ding ... eel "Hey ding-a-ding" is a common refrain in popular songs. The phrase has sexual overtones, and "buttock so slick as an eel" implies sexual potency; thus, the "brave living" that the horse-courser anticipates will presumably come from stud fees.

35 Well, God-bye⁷ sir, your boy will deliver him me. But hark ye sir, if my horse be sick or ill at ease, if I bring his water⁸ to you, you'll tell me what it is?

FAUSTUS. Away, you villain! What, dost thou think I am a horse-doctor?

(Exit Horse-courser.)

40 What art thou, Faustus, but a man condemn'd to die?
Thy fatal time⁹ doth draw to final end;
Despair doth drive distrust into my thoughts.
Confound these passions with a quiet sleep:
Tush, Christ did call the thief upon the cross.¹⁰

45 Then rest thee, Faustus, quiet in conceit.

(Sleeps in his chair. Enter Horse-courser all wet, crying.)

HORSE-COURSER. Alas, alas, Doctor Fustian, quotha?
Mass, Doctor Lopus¹¹ was never such a doctor: has given me a purgation,¹² has purged me of forty dollars, I shall never see them more. But yet like an ass as I was, I 50 would not be ruled by him, for he bade me I should ride him into no water. Now I, thinking my horse had some rare quality that he would not have had me know of, I like a venturesome youth rid him into the deep pond at the town's end. I was no sooner in the middle of the pond, 55 but my horse vanished away, and I sat upon a bottle¹³ of hay, never so near drowning in my life! But I'll seek out my doctor, and have my forty dollars again, or I'll make

⁷ God-bye Contraction of "God be with you."

⁸ water Urine.

⁹ fatal time Time allotted by fate.

¹⁰ the thief ... cross See Luke 23.43.

¹¹ Doctor Lopus Doctor Roderigo Lopez, a Portuguese marrano, or Christianized Jew, and personal physician to Queen Elizabeth. Lopez incurred the enmity of the Earl of Essex, who in January 1594 accused him of high treason; he was tried (and convicted) on 28 February on charges that included attempting to poison the queen, and was executed on 7 June—more than a year after Marlowe's death. Although Lopez was well-known even before his appointment as the queen's physician in 1586 (he had previously been household physician to the Earl of Leicester), the past-tense allusion to him suggests that in its present form this scene must have been written after Marlowe's death.

it dearest¹ horse. O, yonder is his snipper-snapper.² Do you hear? you, hey-pass,³ where's your master?

60 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why sir, what would you? You cannot speak with him.

HORSE-COURSER. But I will speak with him.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why, he's fast asleep; come some other time.

65 HORSE-COURSER. I'll speak with him now, or I'll break his glass windows⁴ about his ears.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I tell thee, he hath not slept this eight nights.

HORSE-COURSER. And he have not slept this eight 70 weeks I'll speak with him.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. See where he is, fast asleep.

HORSE-COURSER. Ay, this is he. God save ye Master Doctor! Master Doctor, Master Doctor Fustian, forty dollars, forty dollars for a bottle of hay!

75 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why, thou seest he hears thee not.

HORSE-COURSER. So ho, ho! So ho, ho!⁵ (Hallow in his ear.) No, will you not wake? I'll make you wake ere I go!

(Pull him by the leg, and pull it away.)

Alas, I am undone! What shall I do?

80 FAUSTUS. O my leg, my leg! Help, Mephastophilis! Call the officers, my leg, my leg!

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Come villain, to the constable.

HORSE-COURSER. O Lord, sir: let me go, and I'll give you forty dollars more.

85 MEPHASTOPHILIS. Where be they?

HORSE-COURSER. I have none about me; come to my ostry,⁶ and I'll give them you.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Be gone, quickly.

(Horse-courser runs away.)

90 FAUSTUS. What, is he gone? Farewell he, Faustus has his leg again, and the horse-courser, I take it, a bottle of hay for his labor. Well, this trick shall cost him forty dollars more.

(Enter Wagner.)

How now, Wagner, what's the news with thee?

WAGNER. Sir, the Duke of Vanholt doth earnestly 95 entreat your company.

FAUSTUS. The Duke of Vanholt! An honorable gentleman, to whom I must be no niggard⁷ of my cunning. Come Mephastophilis, let's away to him.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 4, SCENE 3

(Enter to them the Duke, and the Duchess; the Duke speaks.)

DUKE. Believe me, Master Doctor, this merriment hath much pleased me.

FAUSTUS. My gracious lord, I am glad it contents you so well. But it may be, madam, you take no delight in this.

5 I have heard that great-bellied⁸ women do long for some dainties or other: what is it, madam? Tell me, and you shall have it.

DUCHESS. Thanks, good Master Doctor, and for I see your courteous intent to pleasure me, I will not hide
10 from you the thing my heart desires; and were it now summer, as it is January, and the dead time of winter, I would desire no better meat⁹ than a dish of ripe grapes.

FAUSTUS. Alas, madam, that's nothing. Mephastophilis, be gone.

(Exit Mephastophilis.)

15 Were it a greater thing than this, so it would content you, you should have it.

(Enter Mephastophilis with the grapes.)

Here they be, madam, will't please you to taste on them?

20 DUKE. Believe me, Master Doctor, this makes me wonder above the rest, that being in the dead time of

² snipper-snapper Conceited young fellow, smart-aleck.

³ hey-pass Expression used by fairground conjurors or jugglers.

⁴ glass windows Spectacles.

⁵ So ho, ho Huntsman's cry.

winter, and in the month of January, how you should come by these grapes.

FAUSTUS. If it like your Grace, the year is divided into two circles over the whole world, that when it is here
 25 winter with us, in the contrary circle it is summer with them, as in India, Saba, and farther countries in the east;¹ and by means of a swift spirit that I have, I had them brought hither, as ye see. How do you like them, madam, be they good?

30 DUCHESS. Believe me, Master Doctor, they be the best grapes that e'er I tasted in my life before.

FAUSTUS. I am glad they content you so, madam.

DUKE. Come, madam, let us in, where you must well reward this learned man for the kindness he hath 35 showed to you.

DUCHESS. And so I will, my lord, and whilst I live rest beholden for this courtesy.

FAUSTUS. I humbly thank your Grace.

DUKE. Come Master Doctor, follow us, and receive your 40 reward.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 5, SCENE 1

(Enter Wagner alone.)

WAGNER. I think my master means to die shortly,
 For he hath given to me all his goods;
 And yet methinkes² if that death were near
 He would not banquet and carouse and swill
 5 Amongst the students, as even now he doth,
 Who are at supper with such belly-cheer
 As Wagner ne'er beheld in all his life.
 See where they come: belike the feast is ended.

(Exit. Enter Faustus with two or three scholars.)

FIRST SCHOLAR. Master Doctor Faustus, since our 10 conference about fair ladies, which was the beautiful'st in all the world, we have determined with³ our selves

¹ two circles ... east The two "circles" should of course be the northern and southern hemispheres. Saba is the land of the Queen of Sheba, now Yemen.

² methinkes Modernized spelling would upset the rhythm of this line.

³ determined with Settled among.

that Helen of Greece was the admirablest lady that ever lived. Therefore, Master Doctor, if you will do us so much favor as to let us see that peerless dame of Greece, 15 whom all the world admires for majesty, we should think ourselves much beholding unto you.

FAUSTUS. Gentlemen,

For that⁴ I know your friendship is unfeign'd
 (And Faustus' custom is not to deny
 20 The just requests of those that wish him well),
 You shall behold that peerless dame of Greece
 No otherways for pomp and majesty
 Than when Sir Paris cross'd the seas with her
 And brought the spoils to rich Dardania.⁵
 25 Be silent then, for danger is in words.

(Music sounds, and Helen passeth over the stage.)

SECOND SCHOLAR. Too simple is my wit to tell her praise,

Whom all the world admires for majesty.

THIRD SCHOLAR. No marvel though the angry Greeks pursued⁶

With ten years' war the rape^o of such a queen, abduction
 30 Whose heavenly beauty passeth all compare.

FIRST SCHOLAR. Since we have seen the pride of nature's works,
 And only paragon of excellence,

(Enter an old man.)

Let us depart, and for this glorious deed
 Happy and blest be Faustus evermore.

35 FAUSTUS. Gentlemen, farewell, the same I wish to you.

(Exeunt scholars.)

OLD MAN. Ah, Doctor Faustus, that I might prevail
 To guide thy steps unto the way of life,
 By which sweet path thy may'st attain the goal
 That shall conduct thee to celestial rest.
 40 Break heart, drop blood, and mingle it with tears,
 Tears falling from repentant heaviness

⁴ For that Because.

⁵ Dardania Troy, referred to here by the name of the founder of the Trojan dynasty, Dardanus.

⁶ pursued Sought to avenge.

Of thy most vile and loathsome filthiness,
 The stench whereof corrupts the inward soul
 With such flagitious¹ crimes of heinous sins
 As no commiseration may expel
 But mercy, Faustus, of thy Saviour sweet,
 Whose blood alone must wash away thy guilt.²

FAUSTUS. Where art thou, Faustus?³ wretch, what hast thou done?

Damn'd art thou, Faustus, damn'd, despair and die!
 Hell claims his right, and with a roaring voice
 Says, "Faustus, come, thine hour is almost come!"

(Enter Mephistophilis, who gives him a dagger.)

And Faustus now will come to do thee right.

OLD MAN. Ah stay, good Faustus, stay thy desperate steps:
 I see an angel hovers o'er thy head,
 And with a vial full of precious grace⁴
 Offers to pour the same into thy soul:
 Then call for mercy and avoid despair.

FAUSTUS. Ah my sweet friend, I feel thy words
 To comfort my distressed soul.

Leave me awhile to ponder on my sins.

OLD MAN. I go, sweet Faustus, but with heavy cheer,
 Fearing the ruin of thy hopeless soul.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. Accursed Faustus, where is mercy now?
 I do repent, and yet I do despair:

Hell strives with grace for conquest in my breast;
 What shall I do to shun the snares of death?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Thou traitor, Faustus, I arrest thy soul
 For disobedience to my sovereign lord.
 Revolt,⁵ or I'll in piece-meal tear thy flesh!

² no ... guilt Cf. Revelation 1.5: "Jesus Christ ... loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." The Prayer-Book of Queen Elizabeth (1559) specifies that if a person in "extremity of sickness ... do truly repent him of his sins, and steadfastly believe that Jesus Christ ... shed his blood for his redemption" (135), this is the equivalent of taking communion.

³ Where ... Faustus? Cf. Genesis 3.9: "The Lord God called to the man, and said unto him, Where art thou?"

⁴ vial ... grace The old man here individualizes an image from Revelation 5.8, in which elders worshiping before the throne of God carry "golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints."

⁵ Revolt Reverse your course of action.

FAUSTUS. I do repent I e'er offended him.
 Sweet Mephistophilis, entreat thy lord
 To pardon my unjust presumption,
 And with my blood again I will confirm
 My former vow I made to Lucifer.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Do it then quickly, with unfeigned heart,

Lest greater danger do attend thy drift.⁶

FAUSTUS. Torment, sweet friend, that base and crooked age

That durst dissuade me from thy Lucifer,
 With greatest torments that our hell affords.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. His faith is great, I cannot touch his soul.

But what I may afflict his body with
 I will attempt, which is but little worth.

FAUSTUS. One thing, good servant, let me crave of thee
 To glut the longing of my heart's desire:

That I might have unto^o my paramour as
 That heavenly Helen which I saw of late,
 Whose sweet embracings may extinguish clean
 These thoughts that do dissuade me from my vow,
 And keep mine oath I made to Lucifer.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Faustus, this, or what else thou shalt desire

Shall be perform'd in the twinkling of an eye.

(Enter Helen.)

FAUSTUS. Was this the face that launch'd a thousand ships
 And burnt the topless^o towers of Ilium?^o soaring / Troy
 Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss;

Her lips suck forth my soul, see where it flies!
 Come Helen, come, give me my soul again;
 Here will I dwell, for heaven be in these lips,
 And all is dross that is not Helena.

(Enter old man.)

I will be Paris, and for love of thee

Instead of Troy shall Wittenberg be sack'd,
 And I will combat with weak Menelaus⁷

⁶ drift Conscious or unconscious tendency or aim.

⁷ weak Menelaus Book 3 of Homer's Iliad recounts the duel between Alexandros or Paris and Menelaus. Paris challenged all the best of the Achaeans to single combat, but recoiled in fear from Menelaus. Having agreed that Helen and her possessions should go to the victor, Paris was defeated, but saved from [continued ...]

And wear thy colours on my plumed crest;
Yea, I will wound Achilles in the heel
And then return to Helen for a kiss.

105 O, thou art fairer than the evening air
Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars;
Brighter art thou than flaming Jupiter
When he appear'd to hapless Semele,¹
More lovely than the monarch of the sky
110 In wanton Arethusa's² azur'd arms,
And none but thou shalt be my paramour.

(Exeunt.)

OLD MAN. Accursed Faustus, miserable man,
That from thy soul exclud'st the grace of heaven
And fliest the throne of his tribunal seat!

(Enter the devils.)

115 Satan begins to sift me³ with his pride;
As in this furnace God shall try my faith,
My faith, vile hell, shall triumph over thee!
Ambitious fiends, see how the heaven smiles
At your repulse, and laughs your state to scorn:
120 Hence, hell, for hence I fly unto my God.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 5, SCENE 2

(Enter Faustus with the scholars.)

FAUSTUS. Ah, gentlemen!

FIRST SCHOLAR. What ails Faustus?

FAUSTUS. Ah, my sweet chamber-fellow, had I lived with thee, then had I lived still, but now I die eternally.

5 Look, comes he not, comes he not?

death by Aphrodite, who carried him in a mist into his own bedchamber. There, although shamed in Helen's eyes as in everyone else's, he promptly took her to bed.

¹ hapless Semele One of Jupiter's human mistresses, she was persuaded by Juno to ask him to come to her in the same form in which he embraced Juno in heaven, and was consumed by fire.

² Arethusa Nymph who, bathing in the river Alpheus, aroused the river-god's lust; fleeing from him, she was transformed into a fountain. No classical myth links her with Jupiter or the sun-god.

³ sift me Cf. Christ's words to Peter at the last supper: "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, and he may sift you as wheat" (Luke 22.31).

SECOND SCHOLAR. What means Faustus?

THIRD SCHOLAR. Belike he is grown into some sickness, by being over-solitary.

FIRST SCHOLAR. If it be so, we'll have physicians to cure
10 him. 'Tis but a surfeit,⁴ never fear, man.

FAUSTUS. A surfeit of deadly sin, that hath damned both body and soul.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Yet Faustus, look up to heaven;
remember, God's mercies are infinite.

15 FAUSTUS. But Faustus' offence can ne'er be pardoned:
the serpent that tempted Eve may be saved, but not Faustus. Ah gentlemen, hear me with patience, and tremble not at my speeches. Though my heart pants and quivers to remember that I have been a student here 20 these thirty years, O would I had never seen Wittenberg, never read book: and what wonders I have done, all Germany can witness, yea all the world, for which Faustus hath lost both Germany and the world, yea heaven itself, heaven the seat of God, the throne of the 25 blessed, the kingdom of joy, and must remain in hell for ever—hell, ah, hell, for ever! Sweet friends, what shall become of Faustus, being in hell for ever?

THIRD SCHOLAR. Yet Faustus, call on God.

FAUSTUS. On God, whom Faustus hath abjured? on 30 God, whom Faustus hath blasphemed? Ah my God, I would weep, but the devil draws in my tears. Gush forth blood instead of tears, yea life and soul! Oh, he stays my tongue; I would lift up my hands, but see, they hold them, they hold them!

35 ALL. Who, Faustus?

FAUSTUS. Lucifer and Mephistophilis. Ah, gentlemen,
I gave them my soul for my cunning.⁵

ALL. God forbid!

FAUSTUS. God forbade it indeed, but Faustus hath done
40 it: for the vain pleasure of four and twenty years hath Faustus lost eternal joy and felicity. I writ them a bill with mine own blood, the date is expired, the time will come, and he will fetch me!

FIRST SCHOLAR. Why did not Faustus tell of this before,
45 that divines might have prayed for thee?

FAUSTUS. Oft have I thought to have done so, but the devil threatened to tear me in pieces if I named God, to fetch both body and soul if I once gave ear to divinity,

⁴ surfeit Excessive indulgence in food or drink, and the resulting disorder of the system.

⁵ cunning Knowledge.

and now 'tis too late: gentlemen, away, lest you perish
50 with me.

SECOND SCHOLAR. O what may we do to save Faustus?

FAUSTUS. Talk not of me, but save yourselves, and depart.

THIRD SCHOLAR. God will strengthen me, I will stay
55 with Faustus.

FIRST SCHOLAR. Tempt not God, sweet friend, but let us into the next room, and there pray for him.

FAUSTUS. Ah, pray for me, pray for me; and what noise 60 soever¹ ye hear, come not unto me, for nothing can rescue me.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Pray thou, and we will pray that God may have mercy upon thee.

FAUSTUS. Gentlemen, farewell. If I live till morning, I'll visit you; if not, Faustus is gone to hell.

65 ALL. Faustus, farewell.

(Exeunt scholars. The clock strikes eleven.)

FAUSTUS. Ah Faustus,

Now hast thou but one bare hour to live,

And then thou must be damn'd perpetually.

Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of heaven.

70 That time may cease, and midnight never come!

Fair nature's eye, rise, rise again, and make

Perpetual day, or let this hour be but a year,

A month, a week, a natural day,

That Faustus may repent, and save his soul.

75 *O lente lente currite noctis equi!*²

The stars move still, time runs, the clock will strike,

The devil will come, and Faustus must be damn'd.

O, I'll leap up to my God: who pulls me down?

See, see where Christ's blood streams in the firmament:

80 One drop would save my soul, half a drop! Ah, my Christ,

Ah rend not my heart for the naming of my Christ,³

Yet I will call on him, oh spare me Lucifer!

Where is it now? 'tis gone,

And see where God stretcheth out his arm

85 And bends his ireful brows!

² O lente ... equi Latin: O gallop slowly, slowly, you horses of the night! Ovid, Amores 1.8.40.

³ rend ... Christ Cf. Joel 2.12–13, where, faced by a terrifying prospect of destruction that makes the earth quake and the heavens tremble, and that darkens the sun, moon and stars, the Israelites are exhorted to "rend their hearts in repentance."

Mountains and hills, come, come, and fall on me
And hide me from the heavy wrath of God.⁴

No, no?

Then will I headlong run into the earth.

90 Earth, gape! O no, it will not harbor me.

You stars that reign'd at my nativity,

Whose influence hath allotted death and hell,

Now draw up Faustus like a foggy mist

Into the entrails of yon laboring cloud,

95 That when you vomit forth into the air

My limbs may issue from your smoky mouths,

So that my soul may but ascend to heaven.

(The watch^o strikes.)

clock

Ah, half the hour is past: 'twill all be past anon.

Oh God, if thou wilt not have mercy on my soul,

100 Yet for Christ's sake, whose blood hath ransom'd me,

Impose some end to my incessant pain:

Let Faustus live in a hell a thousand years,

A hundred thousand, and at last be sav'd.

O, no end is limited to damned souls.⁵

105 Why wert thou not a creature wanting soul?

Or why is this immortal that thou hast?

Ah, Pythagoras' metempsychosis,⁶ were that true

This soul should fly from me, and I be chang'd

Unto some brutish beast.

110 All beasts are happy, for when they die

Their souls are soon dissolv'd in elements,

But mine must live still to be plagu'd in hell.

Curst be the parents that engender'd me;

No Faustus, curse thyself, curse Lucifer

115 That hath depriv'd thee of the joys of heaven!

(The clock strikes twelve.)

O it strikes, it strikes, now body, turn to air

Or Lucifer will bear thee quick^o to hell!

alive

(Thunder and lightning.)

O soul, be changed into little water drops

And fall into the ocean, ne'er be found;

120 My God, my God, look not so fierce on me!

⁴ Mountains ... God Cf. Luke 23.30, Revelation 6.16, Hosea 10.8.

⁵ no end ... souls I.e., damnation is endless.

⁶ metempsychosis Doctrine of the transmigration of souls.

(Enter devils.)

Adders and serpents, let me breathe awhile!
Ugly hell gape not, come not Lucifer,
I'll burn my books, ah Mephistophilis!

(Exeunt with him.)

EPILOGUE

(Enter Chorus.)

CHORUS. Cut is the branch that might have grown full
straight,

And burned is Apollo's laurel bough
That sometime grew within this learned man:
Faustus is gone, regard his hellish fall,
Whose fiendful fortune may exhort the wise
Only to wonder¹ at unlawful things,
Whose deepness doth entice such forward wits
To practice more than heavenly power permits.

(Exit.)

IN CONTEXT

Dr. Faustus

from Anonymous, The History of the Damnable Life, and Deserved Death of Dr. John Faustus (1592)

¹² Though much of the story of Marlowe's Dr. Faustus and of its principal source, the prose History of the Damnable Life, and Deserved Death of Dr. John Faustus, are obviously legendary or mythic in nature, there was indeed a historical Dr. Faustus. Like Marlowe himself, the historical Faustus was, in Michael Keefer's words, "a transgressor both of sexual and of ideological codes."

The historical Faustus was Georgius of Helmstadt (c. 1466–c. 1537), a magician from the village of Helmstadt who attended the University of Heidelberg from 1483 until 1489 or thereabouts, and who by 1507 had established himself as a magician styling himself as "Magister Georgius Sabellicus, the younger Faustus, Chief of Necromancers, Astrologer, the Second Magus, Palmist, Diviner by Earth and Fire, Second in the Art of Divination by Water." Georgius Faustus seems to have had a very mixed career; he was hired in 1520 to cast the horoscope of the Bishop of Bamberg, and consulted in 1536 by a close associate of Erasmus's to predict the fortunes of an expedition to the new world—but he was also accused of being a braggart, a blasphemer, and worse. (When, in 1507, Faustus for a time took an appointment as a schoolmaster, he was accused of having indulged "in the most abominable kind of fornication with the boys," and fled to escape punishment.)

There was no suggestion during the life of the historical Faustus of a pact with the devil. Even before his death, however, the historical figure had evidently become something of a magnet for anecdotes of all sorts about sorcerers, charlatans, and demons. Interestingly, Martin Luther seems to have played a key role in the formation of the Faustus legend; the earliest record that survives of many of the anecdotes about Faustus is the written record of the "table talk" of Luther in the 1530s.

² Terminat ... opus Latin: The hour ends the day; the author ends his work.

The direct source of the legend of Faustus selling his soul to the devil is the Historia von D. Johann Fausten of 1587, translated into English as The History of the Damnable Life, and Deserved Death of Dr. John Faustus in 1592. Marlowe evidently drew on this work extensively for his Dr. Faustus, a few key passages are reproduced below.

from CHAPTER 1. John Faustus, born in the town of Rhode, lying in the province of Weimar in Germ[any], his father a poor husbandman and not [able] well to bring him up: but having an uncle at Wittenberg, a rich man and without issue, took this J. Faustus from his father and made him his heir, in so much that his father was no more troubled with him, for he remained with his uncle at Wittenberg, where he was kept at the university in the same city to study divinity. But Faustus, being of a naughty mind and otherwise addicted, applied not his studies, but took himself to other exercises: the which his uncle oftentimes hearing, rebuked him for it, as Eli oft times rebuked his children for sinning against the Lord: even so this good man labored to have Faustus apply his study of divinity, that he might come to the knowledge of God and his laws. But it is manifest that many virtuous parents have wicked children, as Cain, Reuben, Absolom and such like have been to their parents: so this Faustus having godly parents, and seeing him to be of a toward wit, were very desirous to bring him up in those virtuous studies, namely, of divinity: but he gave himself secretly to study necromancy and conjuration, in so much that few or none could perceive his profession.

But to the purpose: Faustus continued at study in the university, and was by the Rectors and sixteen Masters afterwards examined how he had profited in his studies; and being found by them that none for his time were able to argue with him in divinity, or for the excellency of his wisdom to compare with him, with one consent they made him Doctor of Divinity. But Doctor Faustus, within short time after he had obtained his degree, fell into such fantasies and deep cogitations that he was marked of many, and of the most part of the students was called the Speculator; and sometime he would throw the scriptures from him as though he had no care of his former profession: so that he began a very ungodly life, as hereafter more at large may appear; for the old proverb saith, Who can hold that will away? So who can hold Faustus from the devil, that seeks after him with all his endeavor? For he accompanied himself with divers that were seen in those devilish arts, and that had the Chaldean, Persian, Hebrew, Arabian, and Greek tongues, using figures, characters, conjurations, incantations, with many other ceremonies belonging to these infernal arts, as necromancy, charms, soothsaying, witchcraft, enchantment, being delighted with their books, words, and names so well that he studied day and night therein: in so much that he could not abide to be called doctor of divinity, but waxed a worldly man, and named himself an astrologian, and a mathematician: and for a shadow sometimes a physician, and did great cures, namely with herbs, roots, waters, drinks, receipts, and clisters. And without doubt he was passing wise, and excellent perfect in the holy scriptures: but he that knoweth his master's will and doth it not, is worthy to be beaten with many stripes. It is written, No man can serve two masters, and Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God: but Faustus threw all this in the wind, and made his soul of no estimation, regarding more his worldly pleasure than the joys to come: therefore at the day of judgment there is no hope of his redemption.

CHAPTER 2. You have heard before, that all Faustus' mind was set to study the arts of necromancy and conjuration, the which exercise he followed day and night: and taking to him the wings of an eagle, thought to fly over the whole world, and to know the secrets of heaven and earth; for his speculation was so wonderful, being expert in using his vocabula, figures, characters, conjurations, and other ceremonial actions, that in all the haste he put in practice to bring the devil before him. And taking his way to a thick wood near to Wittenberg, called in the German tongue Spisser Waldt..., he came into the same wood towards evening into a cross way, where he made with a wand a circle in the dust, and within that many more circles and characters: and thus he passed away the time, until it was nine or ten of the clock in the night, then began Doctor Faustus to call for Mephostophiles the spirit, and to charge him in the name of Beelzebub to appear there personally without any long stay: then presently the devil began so great a rumor in the wood, as if heaven and earth would have come together with wind, the trees bowing their tops to the ground; then fell the devil to bleat as if the whole wood had been full of lions, and suddenly about the circle ran the devil as if a thousand wagons had been running together on paved stones. ...Faustus commanded that the next morning at twelve of the clock he should appear to him at his house, but the devil would in no wise grant. Faustus began again to conjure him in the name of Beelzebub, that he should fulfil his request: whereupon the spirit agreed, and so they departed each one his way.

from CHAPTER 3. Doctor Faustus having commanded the spirit to be with him, at his hour appointed he came and appeared in his chamber, demanding of Faustus what his desire was: then began Doctor Faustus anew with him to conjure him that he should be obedient unto him, and to answer him certain articles, and to fulfil them in all points.

1. That the spirit should serve him and be obedient unto him in all things that he asked of him from that hour until the hour of his death.
2. Farther, any thing that he desired of him he should bring it to him.
3. Also, that in all Faustus his demands or interrogations the spirit should tell him nothing but that which is true.

Hereupon the spirit answered and laid his case forth, that he had no power of himself, until he had first given his prince (that was ruler over him) to understand thereof, and to know if he could obtain so much of his lord: Therefore speak farther that I may do thy whole desire to my prince: for it is not in my power to fulfil without his leave....

Doctor Faustus upon this arose where he sat, and said, I will have my request, and yet I will not be damned. The spirit answered, Then shalt thou want thy desire, and yet art thou mine notwithstanding; if any man would detain thee it is in vain, for thine infidelity hath confounded thee.

Hereupon spake Faustus: Get thee hence from me, and take Saint Valentine's farewell and Crisam with thee, yet I conjure thee that thou be here at evening, and bethink thyself on that I have asked thee, and ask thy prince's counsel therein. Mephostophiles the spirit, thus answered, vanished away, leaving Faustus in his study, where he sat pondering with himself how he might obtain his request of the devil without loss of his soul: yet fully he was resolved in himself rather than to want his pleasure, to do whatsoever the spirit and his lord should condition upon.

from CHAPTER 4. Faustus continuing in his devilish cogitations, never moving out of the place where the spirit left him (such was his fervent love to the devil), the night approaching, this swift flying spirit appeared to Faustus, offering himself with all submission to his service, with full authority from his prince to do whatsoever he would request, if so be Faustus would promise to be his: This answer I bring thee, and an answer must thou make by me again, yet will I hear what is thy desire, because thou hast sworn me to be here at this time. Doctor Faustus gave him this answer, though faintly (for his soul's sake): That his request was none other but to become a devil, or at least a limb of him, and that the spirit should agree unto these articles as followeth.

1. That he might be a spirit in shape and quality.
2. That Mephostophiles should be his servant, and at his commandment.
3. That Mephostophiles should bring him any thing, and do for him whatsoever.
4. That at all times he should be in his house, invisible to all men, except only to himself, and at his commandment to show himself.
5. Lastly, that Mephostophiles should at all times appear at his command, in what form or shape soever he would.

Upon these points the spirit answered Doctor Faustus, that all this should be granted him and fulfilled, and more if he would agree unto him upon certain articles as followeth.

First, that Doctor Faustus should give himself to his lord Lucifer, body and soul.

Secondly, for confirmation of the same, he should make him a writing, written with his own blood.

Thirdly, that he would be an enemy to all Christian people.

Fourthly, that he would deny his Christian belief.

Fifthly, that he let not any man change his opinion, if so be any man should go about to dissuade or withdraw him from it.

Further, the spirit promised Faustus to give him certain years to live in health and pleasure, and when such years were expired, that then Faustus should be fetched away, and if he should hold these articles and conditions, then he should have all whatsoever his heart would wish or desire; and that Faustus should quickly perceive himself to be a spirit in all manner of actions whatsoever. Hereupon Doctor Faustus his mind was so inflamed that he forgot his soul, and promised Mephostophiles to hold all things as he had mentioned them: he thought the devil was not so black as they use to paint him, nor hell so hot as the people say, etc.

from CHAPTER 6. How Doctor Faustus set his blood in a saucer on warm ashes, and writ as followeth. ... [N]ow have I, Doctor John Faustus, unto the hellish prince of Orient and his messenger Mephostophiles, given both body and soul, upon such condition that they shall learn me, and fulfil my desire in all things, as they have promised and vowed unto me, with due obedience unto me, according to the articles mentioned between us.

Further, I covenant and grant them by these presents, that at the end of 24 years next ensuing the date of this present letter ... I give them full power to do with me at their pleasure, to rule, to send, fetch, or carry me or mine, be it either body, soul, flesh, blood, or goods, into their habitation, be it wheresoever: and hereupon, I defy God and his Christ, all the host of heaven, and all living creatures that bear the shape of God, yea all that lives; and again I say it, and it shall be so. And to the more strengthening of this writing, I have written it with mine own hand and blood. ...

from Henricus Cornelius Agrippa, De Occulta Philosophia (Of Occult Philosophy),¹ 1533

Early in Dr. Faustus Faustus imagines that he “will be as cunning as Agrippa was, / Whose shadows made all Europe honour him.” Agrippa (1486–1535) was a contemporary of the historical Dr. Faustus, and the two names were often linked in sixteenth century attacks on magic. Agrippa’s De Occulta Philosophia is an encyclopaedic survey of magical beliefs and practices which also expounds a magical form of Christianity; Agrippa draws on Hermetic, Cabalistic, and Neoplatonic writings as well as on the canonical scriptures in developing his own notions of rebirth and deification. Not surprisingly, his efforts to associate non-Christian magical practices and traditions with the Christian scriptures were widely denounced. The groundbreaking Protestant thinker Jean Calvin termed him an atheist (1550), and André Thevet described his doctrines as “mortal poison” in 1584.

from AUTHOR'S PREFACE

I do not doubt but that the title of our book, Of Occult Philosophy, or of Magic, may by its rarity entice a large number to read it, among whom some twisted, feeble-minded people, and also many ill-disposed and hostile to my talents, will approach: these, in their rash ignorance taking the name of magic in the worse sense, will cry out, hardly having beheld the title, that I teach forbidden arts, sow the seed of heresy, am an offence to pious ears and to outstanding minds a stumbling block; that I am a sorcerer, a superstitious man, and a demoniac, because I am a magician. To these people I would reply that magus among learned men does not signify a sorcerer, nor a superstitious man, nor one possessed, but one who is a wise man, a priest, a prophet. The Sibyls were magicians; hence they prophesied most plainly of Christ. And indeed the Magi knew by the wonderful secrets of the world that Christ the author of the world itself was born, and were the first of all to come and worship him. And the name itself of magic was accepted by philosophers, extolled by theologians, and was also not displeasing to the gospel itself. Yet I believe those censors to be of such steadfast arrogance that they will forbid themselves the Sibyls and the holy magicians, and even the gospel itself, sooner than that the name of magic should be admitted into favour; to such a degree are they careful of their conscience, that neither Apollo, nor all the Muses, nor an angel from heaven would be able to deliver me from their curse. And I advise them now that they neither read, nor understand, nor remember our treatise, for it is harmful, it is poisonous, the gate of Acheron is in this book, it speaks stones: let them take heed lest it beat out their brains. ...

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

The plays of Shakespeare are foundational works of Western culture; in the English-speaking world they have influenced subsequent literary culture more broadly and more deeply than any other group of texts except the books of the Bible. The language and imagery of the plays; their ways of telling stories; their innovative dramatic qualities; the characters that populate them (and the ways in which these characters are created); the issues and ideas the plays explore (and the ways in which they explore them)—all these have powerfully shaped English literature and culture over the past four centuries. And this shaping influence has continually touched popular culture as well as more “elevated” literary and academic worlds. From the eighteenth century on Shakespeare’s plays have held the stage with far greater frequency than those of any other playwright, and in the twentieth century many have been made into popular films (some of the best of which are films in Japanese and in Russian). Even outside the English-speaking world the plays of Shakespeare receive unparalleled exposure; in the Netherlands, for example, his plays have been performed in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries more than twice as often as those of any other playwright. In 2000 he headed the list both on the BBC “person of the millennium” poll and on the World Almanac’s poll listing the 10 “most influential people of the second millennium.” The fact that a playwright, a member of the popular entertainment industry, has continued to enjoy this kind of cultural status—ranked above the likes of Newton, Churchill, Galileo, and Einstein—is worth pausing over. Why are these plays still performed, read, watched, filmed, studied, and appropriated four centuries after they were written? What is the source of his ongoing cultural currency?

There are many ways to answer this question. One is surely that the plays tell great stories. Fundamental, psychologically sophisticated stories, about love, death, growing up, families, communities, guilt, revenge, jealousy, order and disorder, self-knowledge and identity. Another, just as surely, is that they tell them with extraordinary verbal facility in almost all respects: Shakespeare is generally regarded as unsurpassed in his choice of individual words and his inventiveness in conjuring up striking images; in his structuring of the rhythm of poetic lines; in balancing sentences rhetorically; in shaping long speeches; and in crafting sparkling dialogue. A third is that the characters within the stories are uniquely engaging and memorable. In large part this can be attributed to Shakespeare’s ingenuity: within the English literary tradition he more or less invented the psychologically realistic literary character; within the European literary tradition he more or less also invented the strong, independent female character. The bare bones of his characters are typically provided by other sources, but the flesh and blood is of Shakespeare’s making. Fourth, and perhaps most important of all, Shakespeare’s plays tell their stories in ways that are open-ended emotionally and intellectually: no matter how neatly the threads of story may be knitted together at the end, the threads of idea and of emotion in Shakespeare’s plays are never tied off. It is this openness of the plays, their availability for reinterpretation, that enables them to be endlessly re-staged, rewritten, re-interpreted—and to yield fresh ideas and fresh feelings time and time again.

Given the centrality of Shakespeare to Western culture, the wish of many readers to know far more than we do about his life is understandable. In fact we do know a fair amount about the facts of his life—given late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century norms, perhaps more than we might expect to know of someone of his class and background. But we know a good deal less of Shakespeare than we do of some other leading writers of his era—Ben Jonson, for example, or John Donne. And, perhaps most frustrating of all, we know almost nothing of an intimate or personal nature about Shakespeare.

Shakespeare (whose surname also appears on various documents as Shakespear, Shakspeare, Shaxpere, and Shagspere) was baptized in Stratford-upon-Avon on 26 April 1564. Reasonable conjecture, given the customs of the time, suggests that he was born two-to-four days earlier; the date that has been most frequently advanced is 23 April (the same day of the year on which he died in 1616, and also the day on which St. George, England's patron saint, is traditionally honored). His father, John, was a glove-maker and also a local politician: first an alderman and then bailiff, a position equivalent to mayor. Some scholars have argued that he had remained a Catholic in newly-Protestant England, and that Shakespeare thus grew up in a clandestinely Catholic home; though the evidence for this is suggestive, it is not conclusive. (If Shakespeare had grown up Catholic, that background might lead readers to see some of his history plays in a different perspective, and might lend even greater poignancy to images such as that of the "bare ruined choirs" of Sonnet 73, with its suggestion of the destruction of the monasteries destroyed by Henry VIII following the break with Rome.)

Stratford-upon-Avon had a good grammar school, which is generally presumed to have provided William's early education, though no records exist to confirm this. Not surprisingly, he did not go on to university, which at the time would have been unusual for a person from the middle class. (Even Ben Jonson, one of the finest classicists of the period, did not attend university.) Shakespeare's first exposure to theater was probably through the troupes of traveling players that regularly toured the country at that time.

On 28 November 1562, when Shakespeare was eighteen, he was married to Anne Hathaway, who was eight years his senior. Six months later, in May of 1583, Anne gave birth to their first daughter, Susanna; given the timing, it seems reasonable to speculate that an unexpected pregnancy may have prompted a sudden marriage. In February 1585, twins, named Hamnet (Shakespeare's only son, who was to die at the age of eleven) and Judith, were born. Some time later, probably within the next three years, Shakespeare moved to London, leaving his young family behind. There has been considerable speculation as to his reasons for leaving Stratford-upon-Avon, but no solid evidence has been found to support any of the numerous theories. Certainly London was then (as now) a magnet for ambitious young men, and in the late 1580s it was effectively the only English city conducive to the pursuit of a career as a writer or in the theater.

It is not known exactly when Shakespeare joined the professional theater in London, but by 1592 several of his plays had reached the stage—the three parts of Henry VI, probably The Comedy of Errors and Titus Andronicus, possibly others. The earliest extant mention of him in print occurs in 1592: a sarcastic jibe by an embittered older playwright, Robert Greene. Greene calls Shakespeare "an upstart crow beautified with our feathers," probably referring to Shakespeare's work on the series of Henry VI plays, which may well have involved the revision of material by other writers who had originally worked on the play. In any case, from 1594 on, Will Shakespeare is listed as a member of the company called The Lord Chamberlain's Men (later called The King's Men, when James I became their patron).

Professional theater in London did not become firmly established until 1576, when the first permanent playhouses opened. By the late 1580s four theaters were in operation—an unprecedented level of activity, and one that in all probability helped to nurture greater sophistication on the part of audiences. Certainly it was a hothouse that nurtured an extraordinary growth of theatrical agility on the part of Elizabethan playwrights. Shakespeare, as both playwright and actor in The Lord Chamberlain's Men, was afforded opportunities of forging, testing and reworking his written work in the heat of rehearsals and performances—opportunities that were not open to other playwrights.¹ And in Christopher Marlowe he had a rival playwright of a most extraordinary sort. It seems safe to conjecture that the two learned a good deal about play construction from each other. In the late 1580s and early 1590s they both adopt virtually simultaneously the practice of having their characters express their intentions in advance of the unfolding action, thereby encouraging the formation of audience expectations; they also begin to make it a practice to interpose some other action between the exit and the re-entry of any character, thereby further fostering the creation of a sense of temporal and spatial illusion of a sort quite new to the English stage.

In his early years in London Shakespeare also established himself as a non-dramatic poet—and sought aristocratic patronage in doing so. In the late sixteenth century the writing of poetry was accorded considerable respect, the writing of plays a good deal less. It was conventional for those not of aristocratic birth themselves to seek a patron for their writing—as Shakespeare evidently did with the Earl of Southampton, a young noble to whom he dedicated two substantial poems of mythological narrative, Venus and Adonis (1593) and The Rape of Lucrece (1594). (It is a measure of the enormity of Shakespeare's achievement that these poems, which would be regarded as major works of almost any other writer of the period, are an afterthought in most considerations of Shakespeare's work.) Before the end of the century Shakespeare was also circulating his sonnets, as we know from the praise of Francis Meres, who wrote in 1598 that the "sweet, witty soul" of the classical poet of love, Ovid, "lives in mellifluous and honey-tongued Shakespeare, witness his Venus and Adonis, his Lucrece, his sugared sonnets among his private friends, etc." Such circulation among "private friends" was common practice at the time, and was not necessarily followed by publication. When Shakespeare's sonnets were finally published, in 1609, the dedication was from the printer rather than the author, suggesting that Shakespeare may not have authorized their publication.

There are thirty-eight extant plays by Shakespeare (if Two Noble Kinsmen is included in the total). Unlike most other playwrights of the age, he wrote in every major dramatic genre. His history plays (most of them written in the 1590s) include Richard III, Henry IV, Part 1 and Part 2, and Henry V. He wrote comedies throughout his playwriting years; the succession of comedies that date from the years 1595–1601, including Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It and Twelfth Night, may represent his most successful work in this genre, though some have argued that The Merchant of Venice (c. 1596) and the "dark comedies" which date from between 1601 and 1604 (including All's Well That Ends Well and Measure for Measure) resonate even more deeply. The period of the "dark comedies" substantially overlaps with the period in which Shakespeare wrote a succession of great tragedies. Hamlet may have been written as early as 1598–99, but Othello, King Lear, and Macbeth were written in succession between 1601 and 1606. Several of his last plays are romance-comedies—notably Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale and The Tempest (all of which date from the period 1608–11).

Shakespeare was a shareholder in The Lord Chamberlain's Men, and it was in that capacity rather than as a playwright or actor that he made a good deal of money. There was at the time no equivalent to modern laws of copyright, or to modern conventions of payment to the authors of published works. Nineteen of Shakespeare's plays were printed individually during Shakespeare's lifetime, but it is clear that many of these publications did not secure his co-operation. It has often been hypothesized that some of the printers of the most obviously defective texts (referred to by scholars as "bad quartos") are pirated editions dictated from memory to publishers by actors; there is some evidence to support this theory, though even if correct it leaves many textual issues unresolved.

The first publication of Shakespeare's collected works did not occur until 1623, several years after his death, when two of his fellow actors, John Heminges and Henry Condell, arranged to have printed the First Folio, a carefully prepared volume (by the standards of the time) that included thirty-six of Shakespeare's plays. Eighteen of these were appearing for the first time, and four others for the first time in a reliable edition. (Two Noble Kinsmen, which was written in collaboration with a younger playwright, John Fletcher, and Pericles, of which it appears Shakespeare was not the sole author, were both excluded, although the editors did include Henry VIII, which is now generally believed to have been another work in which Fletcher had a hand.)

A vital characteristic of Shakespeare's plays is their extraordinary richness of language. After several centuries of forging a new tongue out of its polyglot sources, the English language in the sixteenth century had entered a period of steady growth in its range, as vocabulary expanded to meet the needs of an increasingly complex society. Yet its structure over this same time (no doubt in connection with the spread of print culture) was becoming increasingly stable. When we compare the enormous difference between the language of Chaucer, who was writing in the late fourteenth century, and that of Shakespeare, writing in the late sixteenth century, it is remarkable to see how greatly the language changed over those two centuries—considerably more than it has changed in the four centuries from Shakespeare's time to our own. English was still effectively a new language in his time, with immense and largely unexplored possibilities for conveying subtleties of meaning. More than any other, Shakespeare embarked on that exploration; his reading was clearly very wide,¹ as was his working vocabulary. But he expanded the language as well as absorbing it; a surprising number of the words Shakespeare used are first recorded as having been used in his work.

The popular image of Shakespeare's last few years is that first expressed by Nicholas Rowe in 1709:

The latter part of his life was spent, as all men of good sense wish theirs may be, in ease, retirement, and the conversation of his friends. He had the good fortune to gather together an estate equal to his occasion, and, in that, to his wish; and is said to have spent some years before his death at his native Stratford.

We know for a fact that around 1610 Shakespeare moved from London to Stratford, where his family had continued to live throughout the years he had spent in London, and the move has often been referred to as a "retirement." Shakespeare did not immediately give up playwriting, however: The Tempest (1611), Henry VIII (c. 1612) and Two Noble Kinsmen (c. 1613) all date from after his move to Stratford. By the time he left London Shakespeare was indeed a relatively wealthy man, with substantial investments both in real estate and in the tithes of the town (an arrangement that would be comparable to buying government bonds today).

After 1613 we have no record of any further writing; he died on 23 April 1616, aged 52. In his will, Shakespeare left his extensive property to the sons of his daughter, Susanna (described in her epitaph as “witty above her sex”). To his wife, he left his “second-best bed”—a bequest which many have found both puzzling and provocative. He was buried as a respectable citizen in the chancel of the parish church, where his gravestone is marked not with a name, but a simple poem:

Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
To dig the dust enclosed here.
Blest be the man that spares these stones,
And curst be he that moves my bones.

Shakespeare's work appears to have been extremely well regarded in his lifetime; soon after his death a consensus developed that his work—his plays in particular—constitute the highest achievement in English literature. In some generations he has been praised most highly for the depth of his characterization, in others for the dense brilliance of his imagery, in others for the extraordinary intellectual suggestiveness of the ideas that his characters express (and occasionally embody). But in every generation since the mid-seventeenth century a consensus has remained that Shakespeare stands without peer among English authors.

In most generations the study of Shakespeare has also helped to shape the development of literary criticism and theory. From John Dryden and Samuel Johnson to Samuel Taylor Coleridge to Northrop Frye, works central to the development of literary theory and criticism have had Shakespeare as their subject. And in the past 50 years Shakespeare has been a vital test case in the development of feminist literary theory, of post-colonial theory, and of political, cultural, and new historicist criticism: just as with each generation people of the theater develop new ways of playing Shakespeare that yield fresh insight, so too do scholars develop new ways of reading texts through reading Shakespeare.

The Sonnets

begun in the 1590s, intermittently revised, and with some of its contents already circulating, Shakespeare's Sonnets was printed in 1609 under obscure circumstances. Did Shakespeare authorize publication by the printer Thomas Thorpe? Did he organize the sonnets himself? Is there a pattern to them? The 154 sonnets, concluding with two light poems on Cupid, are followed by a long “Lover's Complaint” in a female voice. How does this poem fit the volume, and do we know with any certainty that Shakespeare is the author of it as well?

The volume's structure parallels that of sonnet collections in the 1590s, such as Samuel Daniel's Delia and Spenser's Epithalamion and Amoretti. Is Shakespeare merely following this example or subtly commenting on it? Who is the “W.H.” whom the printer Thorpe calls “the only begetter” of the sonnets? No one knows. Nor, despite sometimes wild speculation, do we know the identity of the beautiful but faithless young man to whom many of the sonnets are addressed (or if there is only one young man), or that of the “dark lady” whom the lover treats with erotic admiration and moral contempt, or that of the rival poet to whom some sonnets allude. Is the lady always the same woman? Sonnet 145 seems to pun on “Hathaway,” maiden name of Shakespeare's wife, Anne. Who is the presumed speaker of these sonnets? Several sonnets pun on the “Will”—a useful name, for it could also denote a faculty of the soul, sexual desire, and even the genitals.

For many years the sonnets received little attention or respect. The second edition of Shakespeare's poems, a shabby volume published by John Benson (1640), feminizes some pronouns, runs some sonnets together, and plagiarizes some commentary; it did the sonnets' reputation no good, and it was not until relatively recently that their splendor and power was fully acknowledged.

One source of older generations' unease with the sonnets was the passion with which the speaker addresses a younger man. It is conventional to think that the first 126 sonnets are to or about this youth and most of the remainder to or about a "dark lady," but many of the sonnets leave the gender of the addressee unspecified. Some of those undeniably involving the young man are clearly expressive of strong homoerotic desire, but the extent to which such desire is acted upon is much less clear. Sonnet 20 seems to say that a sexual relation between the speaker and his friend is impossible, but for some recent critics the poem's puns hint at the opposite. However we read them, such ardent expressions of love and longing for a fellow man are unusual, although not unparalleled, in the literature either of Renaissance England or the Continent.

Also unusual is the lover's sexually reciprocated but problematic love for a compliant if unfaithful woman. This is another respect in which Shakespeare makes a show of revising the Petrarchan tradition familiar to him from Renaissance poetry, in which the love of the male wooer was typically not reciprocated by his female beloved. Much as Shakespeare was clearly indebted to the Petrarchan tradition, he departed from it in a variety of ways.

In form, Petrarch and most other Italian poets had made it a practice to divide their sonnets formally into an octave followed by a sestet. Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, had been instrumental in the development of an "English" sonnet pattern of three quatrains followed by a couplet. Shakespeare varies the structure of his sonnets in a number of ways, but generally employs rhyme schemes deriving from the "English" pattern (most commonly: abab cdcd efef gg).

Whether or not we read Sonnets as a sequence, certain recurrent motifs are worth noticing: desire and "will" in every sense, the ruinous passage of time together with the physical and poetic means of surmounting its ravages, the cyclical and poignant beauty of the natural world, and the paradoxes involved in loving the unworthy. Just as notable is the language, which offers an astonishing array of puns, syntactic or lexical ambiguities, and metaphors that evolve through associative connections with a logic just below the surface sense of the verse. Note, for example, how Sonnet 60 moves from ocean waves, to crooked eclipses that must involve the moon (which affects the ocean), to the (curved) plow that makes agricultural furrows, that parallels the wrinkles of bent age, and to Time's curved scythe. Shakespeare can also be funny, though—as witness Sonnet 135's bawdy insinuations, or the resigned (bitter? amused?) puns in Sonnet 138 on lying to and lying with a lover.

Sonnets

From fairest creatures we desire increase,^o progeny
 That thereby beauty's rose might never die,
 But as the ripper should by time¹ decease
 His tender^o heir might bear his memory: young
 5 But thou, contracted² to thine own bright eyes,
 Feed'st thy light's flame with self-substantial fuel,³
 Making a famine where abundance lies,⁴
 Thyself thy foe, to thy sweet self too cruel.
 Thou that art now the world's fresh^o ornament, unspoiled
 10 And only herald to the gaudy⁵ spring,
 Within thine own bud buriest thy content,⁶
 And, tender churl, mak'st waste in niggarding.⁷
 Pity the world, or else this glutton⁸ be,
 To eat the world's due, by the grave and thee.⁹

2

When forty¹⁰ winters shall besiege thy brow,
 And dig deep trenches in thy beauty's field,
 Thy youth's proud livery,^o so gazed on now, uniform
 Will be a tattered weed^o of small worth held: garment
 5 Then being asked, where all thy beauty lies,
 Where all the treasure of thy lusty^o days, vigorous
 To say, within thine own deep-sunken eyes,

¹ But But rather that; riper Older; by time Because of the passage of time.

² contracted Betrothed; also confined.

³ Feed'st ... fuel Like a candle, you consume your own substance with self-love; cf. the story of Narcissus in Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.464 ("I am burned by love of myself / I produce and am consumed by flames").

⁴ Making ... lies Cf. Metamorphoses 3.466 ("my very abundance makes me poor").

⁵ only Chief; gaudy Brightly colored, but not in the modern pejorative sense.

⁶ content Contentment; also, essence.

⁷ churl Here, miser; mak'st ... niggarding Cf. Romeo and Juliet 1.1.223; niggarding Behaving in a miserly fashion.

⁸ this glutton This kind of glutton.

⁹ To ... thee What should belong to the world will be consumed first by yourself, then by death.

¹⁰ forty Number signifying many and, in Shakespeare's time, corresponding to late middle age.

Were an all-eating shame and thriftless¹¹ praise.

How much more praise deserved thy beauty's use¹²

10 If thou couldst answer, "This fair child of mine

Shall sum my count, and make my old excuse,"¹³

Proving his beauty by succession^o thine: legal inheritance

This were to be new made when thou art old,

And see thy blood warm when thou feel'st it cold.

12

When I do count the clock¹⁴ that tells the time,

And see the brave^o day sunk in hideous splendid
 night;

When I behold the violet past prime,

And sable curls all silvered o'er with white:

5 When lofty trees I see barren of leaves,

Which erst from heat did canopy the herd,¹⁵

And summer's green all girded^o up in sheaves bundled

Borne on the bier with white and bristly beard:¹⁶

Then of thy beauty do I question make,

10 That thou among the wastes of time must go,

Since sweets and beauties do themselves forsake,¹⁷

And die as fast as they see others grow,

And nothing 'gainst time's scythe can make defence

Save breed^o to brave^o him, when he reproduce / defy takes thee hence.

15

When I consider^o everything that grows consider that

Holds in perfection but a little moment;

That this huge stage presenteth naught but shows¹⁸

¹¹ thriftless Wasteful or unprofitable.

¹² deserved ... use Would thy beauty's use deserve; use Proper employment, also engagement for profit, as in money on loan.

¹³ sum my count Display the total of my assets; make ... excuse Justify or make reparation for my old age.

¹⁴ count the clock Count the sounds of the clock.

¹⁵ erst Formerly; canopy the herd Provide shade for livestock.

¹⁶ bier Barrow or litter for carrying crops, but more often associated with the bearing of a corpse to the grave; white ... beard As on wheat or barley after harvest.

¹⁷ sweets Pleasures, or people or things affording pleasure; themselves forsake Lose their essence through time.

¹⁸ this huge stage The world as stage was a common notion in the Renaissance; cf. Shakespeare's As You Like It 2.7.139–40: "All the world's a stage / And all the men and women merely players"; shows Theatrical displays.

Whereon the stars in secret influence¹ comment;
 5 When I perceive that men as plants increase,
 Cheered and checked even by the self-same sky,
 Vaunt² in their youthful sap, at height decrease, exult
 And wear their brave state out of memory:²
 Then the conceit of this inconstant stay³
 10 Sets you, most rich in youth, before my sight,
 Where wasteful⁴ time debateth with decay
 To change your day of youth to sullied⁵ night:
 And all in war with time for love of you
 As he takes from you, I engraft⁶ you new.

16

But wherefore^o do not you a mightier way why
 Make war upon this bloody tyrant, time,
 And fortify yourself in your decay
 With means more blessed than my barren rhyme?
 5 Now stand you on the top of happy hours,
 And many maiden gardens, yet unset,^o unplanted
 With virtuous wish would bear your living flowers,
 Much liker⁷ than your painted counterfeit:
 So should the lines of life that life repair,⁸
 10 Which this, time's pencil or my pupil pen,
 Neither in inward worth nor outward fair,^o beauty
 Can make you live yourself in eyes of men:
 To give away yourself⁹ keeps yourself still,^o always
 And you must live drawn by your own sweet skill.

18

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
 Thou art more lovely and more temperate:

¹ secret influence The supposed life effects of the stars on human life and temperament.

² wear ... memory Decay until their glory fades from memory.

³ conceit Thought; conception; inconstant stay Constant state ("stay") of inconstancy, or change, as in the aging process.

⁴ wasteful In the sense of wasting or destructive.

⁵ sullied Tarnished; made gloomy or dull.

⁶ engraft Insert a scion, or shoot, from one tree into the bark of another, from which it gains sustenance.

⁷ liker More like you.

⁸ lines of life Bloodlines of your descendants, or the outlines of you reflected in them; repair Restore.

⁹ give away yourself Marry.

Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
 And summer's lease hath all too short a date:
 5 Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
 And often is his gold complexion dimmed;
 And every fair^o from fair sometime declines, beauty
 By chance, or nature's changing course, untrimmed:
 But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
 10 Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st,^o own
 Nor shall death brag thou wander'st in his shade
 When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st:
 So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
 So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

19

Devouring time, blunt thou the lion's paws,
 And make the earth devour her own sweet brood;
 Pluck the keen teeth from the fierce tiger's jaws,
 And burn the long-lived Phoenix in her blood;¹⁰
 5 Make glad and sorry seasons as thou fleet'st,
 And do whate'er thou wilt, swift-footed time,
 To the wide world and all her fading sweets:^o pleasures
 But I forbid thee one most heinous crime,
 O carve not with thy hours my love's fair brow,
 10 Nor draw no lines there with thine antique¹¹ pen;
 Him in thy course untainted¹² do allow
 For beauty's pattern to succeeding men.
 Yet do thy worst, old Time, despite thy wrong,
 My love shall in my verse ever live young.

20

A woman's face with nature's own hand painted
 Hast thou, the master mistress of my passion;
 A woman's gentle heart, but not acquainted
 With shifting change, as is false women's fashion;
 5 An eye more bright than theirs, less false in rolling,¹³
 Gilding the object whereupon it gazeth;
 A man in hue,^o all hues in his controlling, appearance
 Which steals men's eyes and women's souls amazeth;
 And for a woman wert thou first created,

¹⁰ Phoenix Mythical bird that after living five or six centuries burns itself in a nest of spices and then rises from the ashes renewed to begin another cycle; in her blood Alive.

¹¹ antique Ancient.

¹² untainted Unmarked, unhurt.

¹³ rolling Glancing at lovers.

10 Till nature as she wrought thee fell a-doting,
 And by addition¹ me of thee defeated,
 By adding one thing to my purpose nothing:
 But since she pricked² thee out for women's pleasure,
 Mine be thy love, and thy love's use³ their treasure.

23

As an unperfect actor⁴ on the stage,
 Who with his fear is put besides⁵ his part;
 Or some fierce thing, replete with too much rage,
 Whose strength's abundance weakens his own heart;
 5 So I, for fear of trust,⁶ forget to say
 The perfect ceremony⁷ of love's right,[°] due
 And in mine own love's strength seem to decay,
 O'ercharged with burden of mine own love's might:
 O let my books be then the eloquence
 10 And dumb presagers⁸ of my speaking breast,
 Who plead for love, and look for recompense,
 More than that tongue that more hath more expressed:
 O learn to read what silent love hath writ!
 To hear with eyes belongs to love's fine wit.⁹

29

When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes
 I all alone beweep my outcast state,
 And trouble deaf heav'n with my bootless[°] cries, unavailing
 And look upon myself, and curse my fate,
 5 Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
 Featured like him,¹⁰ like him with friends possessed,
 Desiring this man's art[°] and that man's scope, skill
 With what I most enjoy contented least;
 Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,

² pricked Selected; "prick" was also slang for penis.

³ love's use Sexual pleasure and probably the suggestion of reproduction and increase, with a pun on "usury."

⁴ unperfect actor Actor who does not remember his lines accurately.

⁵ is put besides Loses track of, forgets.

⁶ for ... trust Afraid to trust myself, or perhaps afraid of not being trusted.

⁷ perfect ceremony Precise words demanded by the situation.

⁸ dumb presagers Silent signals.

⁹ belongs ... wit Is characteristic of love's subtle intelligence.

¹⁰ Featured like him With physical attractions like his.

10 Haply[°] I think on thee, and then my state, by chance
 Like to the lark at break of day arising,
 From sullen[°] earth sings hymns at dark, gloomy
 heaven's gate;
 For thy sweet love remembered such wealth brings
 That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

30

When to the sessions[°] of sweet silent judicial sittings thought
 I summon up remembrance of things past,¹¹
 I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
 And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste;
 5 Then can I drown an eye (unused to flow)
 For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
 And weep afresh love's long since cancelled woe,
 And moan th'expense[°] of many a vanished sight. loss
 Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,[°] past
 10 And heavily from woe to woe tell[°] o'er count
 The sad account of fore-bemoanéd moan,
 Which I new pay, as if not paid before;
 But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
 All losses are restored, and sorrows end.

33

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
 Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye,
 Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
 Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy;
 5 Anon[°] permit the basest clouds to ride soon
 With ugly rack¹² on his celestial face,
 And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
 Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace:
 Even so my sun one early morn did shine
 10 With all triumphant splendour on my brow;
 But out alack,¹³ he was but one hour mine,
 The region cloud¹⁴ hath masked him from me now.
 Yet him for this, my love no whit¹⁵ disdaineth:

¹¹ summon Call to court; remembrance ... past Cf. Geneva Bible (1560), Wisdom 11.10: "For their grief was double with mourning, and the remembrance of things past."

¹² rack Mass of clouds driven by the wind in the upper air.

¹³ out alack An expression of sharp regret.

¹⁴ region cloud Clouds of the upper air.

¹⁵ no whit Not the least bit.

Suns of the world may stain,¹ when heaven's sun staineth.

35

No more be grieved at that which thou hast done;
Roses have thorns, and silver fountains mud;
Clouds and eclipses stain both moon and sun,
And loathsome canker^o lives in sweetest bud. caterpillar
5 All men make faults, and even I, in this,
Authorizing thy trespass with compare,^o comparisons
Myself corrupting, salving thy amiss,²
Excusing these sins more than these sins are:³
For to thy sensual fault I bring in sense;⁴
10 Thy adverse party is thy advocate,⁵
And 'gainst myself a lawful plea commence:
Such civil war is in my love and hate
That I an accessory needs must be
To that sweet thief which sourly robs from me.

36

Let me confess that we two must be twain,^o separate
Although our undivided loves are one;
So shall those blots^o that do with me remain, disgraces
Without thy help, by me be borne alone.
5 In our two loves there is but one respect,⁶
Though in our lives a separable spite;⁷
Which, though it alter not love's sole effect,⁸
Yet doth it steal sweet hours from love's delight.
I may not evermore acknowledge⁹ thee,
10 Lest my bewailed guilt should do thee shame,
Nor thou with public kindness honour me,
Unless thou take¹⁰ that honour from thy name:

¹ stain Lose luster or brightness.

² salving thy amiss Excusing or explaining away your wrong.

³ Excusing ... are My making excuses for your sins is worse than the actual sins themselves.

⁴ bring in sense Add spurious reasoning.

⁵ adverse party Legal opponent; advocate Legal defender.

⁶ one respect A single, and hence mutual, regard.

⁷ a separable spite An injury or misfortune capable of separating us.

⁸ love's sole effect Our unity in love.

⁹ acknowledge Greet or recognize in public.

¹⁰ Unless thou take Without taking.

But do not so;¹¹ I love thee in such sort,
As thou being mine, mine is thy good report.

55

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rhyme;
But you shall shine more bright in these contents¹²
Than unswept stone, besmeared with sluttish time.¹³
5 When wasteful war shall statues overturn
And broils^o root out the work of masonry, violent quarrels
Nor Mars¹⁴ his sword, nor war's quick^o fire, vigorous shall burn
The living record of your memory:
'Gainst death, and all oblivious¹⁵ enmity,
10 Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room
Even in the eyes of all posterity
That wear this world out to the ending doom.¹⁶
So till the judgement that yourself arise,¹⁷
You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.

60

Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore,
So do our minutes hasten to their end,
Each changing place with that which goes before,
In sequent toil all forwards do contend.
5 Nativity, once in the main^o of light, broad expanse
Crawls to maturity; wherewith being crowned
Crooked eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
And time, that gave, doth now his gift confound.^o ruin
Time doth transfix^o the flourish set on youth, pierce
10 And delves the parallels¹⁸ in beauty's brow;
Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
And nothing stands¹⁹ but for his scythe to mow.

¹¹ do not so Do not display such public kindness toward me.

¹² these contents The contents of these poems.

¹³ Than ... time Than in dust-covered stone dirtied by the passage of time, which is dirty and grimy ("sluttish") in its effects.

¹⁴ Mars Roman god of war.

¹⁵ oblivious Bringing about oblivion.

¹⁶ ending doom Last Judgment at the end of the world.

¹⁷ That ... arise When you yourself are resurrected.

¹⁸ delves the parallels Digs the trenches, i.e., forms the wrinkled lines; cf. Sonnet 2.2: "... dig deep trenches in thy beauty's field."

¹⁹ stands Grows to full height, as a plant ready for harvest.

And yet to times in hope my verse shall stand,
Praising thy worth, despite his cruel hand.

64

When I have seen by time's fell hand defaced
The rich proud cost¹ of outworn buried age;²
When sometime lofty towers I see down razed,
And brass eternal slave to mortal rage;³
5 When I have seen the hungry ocean gain
Advantage on the kingdom of the shore,
And the firm soil win of the wat'ry main,^{ocean}
Increasing store^o with loss, and loss with store;^{gain}
When I have seen such interchange of state,
10 Or state itself confounded,^o to decay,^{ruined}
Ruin hath taught me thus to ruminate:
That time will come and take my love away.
This thought is as a death, which cannot choose
But weep⁴ to have that which it fears to lose.

65

Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea,
But sad mortality o'er-sways^o their power,^{overcomes}
How with this rage⁵ shall beauty hold a plea,⁶
Whose action is no stronger than a flower?
5 O how shall summer's honey breath hold out
Against the wrackful^o siege of batt'ring days^{destructive}
When rocks impregnable are not so stout,
Nor gates of steel so strong, but time decays?
O fearful meditation! Where, alack,
10 Shall time's best jewel from time's chest lie hid?
Or what strong hand can hold his swift foot back,
Or who his spoil^o o'er beauty can forbid?^{plunder}
O none, unless this miracle have might:
That in black ink my love may still shine bright.

71

No longer mourn for me when I am dead
Than you shall hear⁷ the surly sullen bell⁸
Give warning to the world that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell:
5 Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it, for I love you so
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.⁹
O if (I say) you look upon this verse,
10 When I, perhaps, compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,^{utter}
But let your love even^o with my life decay;^{along}
Lest the wise world should look into your moan,¹⁰
And mock you with me¹¹ after I am gone.

73

That time of year thou mayst in me behold,
When yellow leaves, or none, or few do hang
Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs¹² where late the sweet birds sang;
5 In me thou seest the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west,
Which by and by black night doth take away,
Death's second self¹³ that seals up all in rest;
In me thou seest the glowing of such fire
10 That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed, whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by;
This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well, which thou must leave^o^{lose}
ere long.

⁷ you shall hear The span of time during which you hear.

⁸ surly ... bell Passing-bell, rung solemnly from the church to announce a death, customarily one chime for each year of the deceased's lifespan.

⁹ make you woe Cause you grief.

¹⁰ look ... moan Question the cause of your grief.

¹¹ with me Along with me, and perhaps in the same manner.

¹² choirs Parts of churches designated for singers.

¹³ Death's second self Sleep.

¹ rich ... cost Prideful and extravagant splendor.

² outworn ... age Antiquity worn out and obscured by time.

³ brass ... rage Brass, known for its durability, but also subject ultimately to the fatally destructive effects of time.

⁴ cannot ... weep Can only weep.

⁵ with this rage Against this destructive action.

⁶ hold a plea Present a legal case.

74

But be contented when that fell^o arrest cruel
 Without all bail shall carry me away.¹
 My life hath in this line² some interest,
 Which for memorial still³ with thee shall stay.
 5 When thou reviewest this, thou dost review
 The very part was consecrate to thee.
 The earth can have but earth, which is his due;
 My spirit is thine, the better part of me.
 So then thou hast but^o lost the dregs of life, only 10 The prey of worms, my body being dead,
 The coward conquest of a wretch's knife,
 Too base of thee to be remembered.
 The worth of that is that which it contains,⁴
 And that is this, and this with thee remains.

80

How I faint^o when I of you do write, lose heart
 Knowing a better spirit⁵ doth use your name,
 And in the praise thereof spends all his might,
 To make me tongue-tied speaking of your fame.
 5 But since your worth, wide as the ocean is,
 The humble as the proudest sail doth bear,^o carry along
 My saucy bark,⁶ inferior far to his,
 On your broad main^o doth wilfully appear. ocean
 Your shallowest help will hold me up afloat,
 10 Whilst he upon your soundless^o deep doth immeasurable ride;
 Or, being wracked, I am a worthless boat,
 He of tall building, and of goodly pride.
 Then if he thrive, and I be cast away,
 The worst was this: my love was my decay.

87

Farewell—thou art too dear⁷ for my possessing,
 And like enough thou know'st thy estimate.^o value
 The charter of thy worth gives thee releasing;⁸
 My bonds in thee are all determinate.^o expired
 5 For how do I hold thee but by thy granting,
 And for that riches where is my deserving?⁹
 The cause of this fair gift in me is wanting,
 And so my patent^o back again is swerving. title to property
 Thyself thou gav'st, thy own worth then not knowing,
 10 Or me to whom thou gav'st it else mistaking;
 So thy great gift, upon misprision^o growing, error
 Comes home again, on better judgement making.
 Thus have I had thee as a dream doth flatter:
 In sleep a king, but waking no such matter.

93

So shall I live supposing thou art true
 Like a deceived husband; so love's face
 May still seem love to me, though altered new—
 Thy looks with me, thy heart in other place.
 5 For there can live no hatred in thine eye,
 Therefore in that I cannot know thy change.¹⁰
 In many's looks the false heart's history
 Is writ in moods and frowns and wrinkles strange;
 But heav'n in thy creation did decree
 10 That in thy face sweet love should ever dwell;
 Whate'er thy thoughts or thy heart's workings be,
 Thy looks should nothing thence but sweetness tell.
 How like Eve's apple doth thy beauty grow
 If thy sweet virtue answer not thy show!¹¹

¹ But be ... away Some modern editors punctuate these lines with a semi-colon after "contented" and a comma after "away."

² in this line I.e., in this verse.

³ for memorial still As a remembrance always.

⁴ The worth of that ... contains The value of the body is that it contains the spirit.

⁵ a better spirit A rival poet of superior gifts, referred to in Sonnet 79.

⁶ bark Small boat.

⁷ too dear Both "too expensive" and "too much loved."

⁸ The charter ... releasing The document stating your value releases you (from any associated debts).

⁹ for that riches ... deserving? How do I deserve the rich reward (of being granted your affection)?

¹⁰ in that ... change From your eye I cannot know that your heart has changed.

¹¹ How like ... thy show How much your beauty grows to resemble the attractiveness of the apple to Eve (i.e., that it will lead to the downfall of the one attracted to it) if your virtue does not match your appearance.

94

They that have power to hurt and will do none,
 That do not do the thing they most do show,¹
 Who, moving others, are themselves as stone,
 Unmovèd, cold, and to temptation slow²—
 5 They rightly do inherit heaven's graces,
 And husband^o nature's riches from conserve expense;^o spending
 They are the lords and owners of their faces,
 Others but stewards^o of their excellence. managers
 The summer's flower is to the summer sweet
 10 Though to itself it only live and die,
 But if that flower with base infection meet
 The basest weed outbraves his dignity;³
 For sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds:
 Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds.

97

How like a winter hath my absence been
 From thee, the pleasure of the fleeting year!
 What freezings have I felt, what dark days seen,
 What old December's bareness everywhere!
 5 And yet this time removed⁴ was summer's time,
 The teeming autumn big with⁵ rich increase
 Bearing the wanton burden of the prime,⁶
 Like widowed wombs after their lords' decease:
 Yet this abundant issue^o seemed to me offspring
 10 But hope of orphans, and unfathered fruit;
 For summer and his pleasures wait on thee,⁷
 And thou away, the very birds are mute;
 Or if they sing, 'tis with so dull a cheer
 That leaves look pale, dreading the winter's near.

98

From you have I been absent in the spring,
 When proud pied^o April, dressed particolored
 in all his trim,^o adornment
 Hath put a spirit of youth in everything,
 That^o heavy Saturn⁸ laughed, and leaped such that
 with him.
 5 Yet nor the lays^o of birds, nor the sweet smell songs
 Of different flowers in odour and in hue,
 Could make me any summer's story tell,
 Or from their proud lap⁹ pluck them where they grew;
 Nor did I wonder at the lily's white,
 10 Nor praise the deep vermilion in the rose;
 They were but^o sweet, but figures of delight, merely Drawn after you, you pattern of all those.
 Yet seemed it winter still, and, you away,
 As with your shadow I with these did play.

105

Let not my love be called idolatry,
 L Nor my beloved as an idol show,¹⁰
 Since all alike my songs and praises be
 To one, of one, still such, and ever so.
 5 Kind is my love today, tomorrow kind,¹¹
 Still constant in a wondrous excellence.
 Therefore my verse, to constancy confined,
 One thing expressing, leaves out difference.
 "Fair, kind, and true" is all my argument,
 10 "Fair, kind, and true" varying to other words,
 And in this change is my invention spent,¹²
 Three themes in one, which wondrous scope affords.
 Fair, kind, and true have often lived alone,
 Which three till now never kept seat in one.

¹ the thing they most do show It is not entirely clear what this thing is, but it probably relates to romantic or sexual activity; "though they inspire love, they do not reciprocate," is one possible paraphrase.

² to temptation slow Slow to respond to temptation.

³ But if that flower ... dignity The most common weed will outshine a lovely flower that has been infected by disease.

⁴ time removed Time of my absence.

⁵ big with Great with, about to give birth to.

⁶ burden Contents of a womb; prime Spring.

⁷ wait on thee Hold themselves in abeyance until you are present.

⁸ Saturn Planetary God associated astrologically with the melancholy humor.

⁹ their proud lap The rich earth that nurtures them.

¹⁰ as an idol show Seem to be (perhaps also with a pun on "idle"—"be called an insignificant creature of appearances").

¹¹ Kind ... kind Both "of one sort today, and the same tomorrow," and "kind" in the sense of "having a gentle and sympathetic nature."

¹² varying ... spent My inventiveness is used up in finding other words (to express the same thought).

106

When in the chronicle of wasted time¹
 I see descriptions of the fairest wights,²
 And beauty making beautiful old rhyme,
 In praise of ladies dead, and lovely knights;
 5 Then in the blazon³ of sweet beauties best,
 Of hand, of foot, of lip, of eye, of brow,
 I see their antique pen would have expressed
 Even such a beauty as you master^o now: possess
 So all their praises are but prophecies
 10 Of this our time, all you prefiguring;
 And for^o they looked but with divining eyes since
 They had not skill enough your worth to sing;
 For we which now behold these present days
 Have eyes to wonder, but lack tongues to praise.

109

O never say that I was false of heart,
 Though absence seemed my flame to qualify;
 As easy might I from myself depart
 As from my soul which in thy breast doth lie:
 5 That is my home of love; if I have ranged,
 Like him that travels I return again,
 Just to the time,⁴ not with the time exchanged,⁵
 So that myself bring water for my stain;⁶
 Never believe, though in my nature reigned
 10 All frailties that besiege all kinds of blood,
 That it could so preposterously be stained,^o corrupted
 To leave for nothing all thy sum of good:
 For nothing this wide universe I call,
 Save thou, my rose; in it thou art my all.

² fairest wights Most beautiful people, again with an archaic flavor by Shakespeare’s time.

³ blazon Description catalogue of a beloved’s body.

⁴ Just ... time Exactly on time.

⁵ not ... exchanged Not changed during the time spent away.

⁶ So ... stain So that my return, unchanged, might erase the fault of my absence; water Possibly, tears of repentance.

110

Alas, ’tis true, I have gone here and there,
 And made myself a motley to the view,⁷ Gored⁸ mine own thoughts, sold cheap what is most dear,
 Made old offences of affections new.⁹
 5 Most true it is that I have looked on truth^o constancy
 Askance and strangely;^o but by all above, coldly
 These blenches¹⁰ gave my heart another youth,¹¹
 And worse essays¹² proved thee my best of love.
 Now all is done, save what shall have no end;
 10 Mine appetite I never more will grind^o whet
 On newer proof,^o to try^o an older friend, experience / test
 A god in love, to whom I am confined:^o devoted
 Then give me welcome, next my heaven the best,
 Even to thy pure and most most loving breast.

116

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
 Admit impediments;¹³ love is not love
 Which alters when it alteration finds,
 Or bends with the remover¹⁴ to remove.
 5 O no, it is an ever-fixed mark,
 That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
 It is the star to every wand’ring bark,^o boat
 Whose worth’s unknown, although his height be taken.¹⁵
 Love’s not Time’s fool, though rosy lips and cheeks

⁷ motley Fool (from the motley, or particolored clothing traditionally worn by jesters); to the view In appearance, in the eyes of society.

⁸ Gored Altered, as a garment is altered by inserting a gore, or wedge-shaped piece of cloth, and perhaps even mutilated, like a person gored by a horned animal.

⁹ Made ... new Committed infidelity by pursuing new relationships.

¹⁰ blenches Flinchings or deviations (from constancy).

¹¹ gave ... youth Rejuvenated my affections for you.

¹² worse essays Experiments with inferior loves.

¹³ impediments Cf. the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer (c. 1552): “If any of you know cause, or just impediment, why these two persons should not be joined together in holy Matrimony, ye are to declare it.”

¹⁴ remover One who changes, e.g., ceases to love.

¹⁵ Whose ... taken Referring to the “star” of the previous line, most likely the North Star, whose altitude can be reckoned for navigation purposes using a sextant, but whose essence remains unknown.

10 Within his bending sickle's compass^o come; sweep
 Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
 But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
 If this be error and upon me proved,
 I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

117
Accuse me thus: that I have scanted¹ all
 Wherein I should your great deserts repay,
 Forgot upon your dearest love to call,
 Whereto all bonds do tie me day by day;
 5 That I have frequent been with unknown minds,
 And given to time your own dear-purchased right;²
 That I have hoisted sail to all the winds
 Which should transport me farthest from your sight.
 Book^o both my wilfulness and errors down, record
 10 And on just proof surmise accumulate;³
 Bring me within the level^o of your frown, aim
 But shoot not at me in your wakened hate:
 Since my appeal says⁴ I did strive to prove^o test
 The constancy and virtue of your love.

127
In the old age⁵ black was not counted fair,^o beautiful
 Or if it were, it bore not beauty's name;
 But now is black beauty's successive^o heir, legitimate
 And beauty slandered with a bastard shame;⁶
 5 For since each hand hath put on nature's power,⁷
 Fairing the foul with art's false borrowed face,
 Sweet beauty hath no name, no holy bower,⁸
 But is profaned, if not lives in disgrace.
 Therefore my mistress' eyes are raven black,
 10 Her eyes so suited,^o and they mourners seem attired

¹ scanted Provided grudgingly or insufficiently for.

² given ... right Spent elsewhere the time you had a right to expect I should spend with you.

³ on ... accumulate On the basis of my proven misdeeds, add others on suspicion.

⁴ my appeal says My defense is that.

⁵ the old age Earlier times.

⁶ beauty ... shame The former (fair) conception of beauty has been discredited as illegitimate and false.

⁷ each ... power Everyone has assumed the power to mimic natural beauty (through cosmetics).

⁸ name Legitimate title; holy bower Sacred dwelling-place.

At such who, not born fair, no beauty lack,⁹
 Sland'ring creation with a false esteem;¹⁰
 Yet so they mourn, becoming of¹¹ their woe,
 That every tongue says beauty should look so.

128

How oft when thou, my music, music play'st
 Upon that blessed wood¹² whose motion sounds
 With thy sweet fingers, when thou gently sway'st^o direct
 The wiry concord¹³ that mine ear confounds,^o dazzles
 5 Do I envy those jacks^o that nimble leap, keys
 To kiss the tender inward^o of thy hand, palm
 Whilst my poor lips, which should that harvest reap,
 At the wood's boldness by thee blushing stand?
 To be so tickled they would change their state
 10 And situation with those dancing chips,¹⁴
 O'er whom thy fingers walk with gentle gait,
 Making dead wood more blessed than living lips.
 Since saucy jacks¹⁵ so happy are in this,
 Give them thy fingers, me thy lips to kiss.

129

Th'expense of spirit in a waste^o of shame desolation
 Is lust in action; and till action, lust
 Is perjured, murd'rous, bloody, full of blame,
 Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust;^o be trusted
 5 Enjoyed no sooner but despised straight;
 Past reason hunted, and no sooner had,
 Past reason hated as a swallowed bait,
 On purpose laid to make the taker mad;
 Mad in pursuit, and in possession so,
 10 Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme;
 A bliss in proof,^o and proved, a very woe; experience

⁹ who ... lack (1) Who, lacking natural beauty, have acquired it artificially; (2) Who, not being of fair coloration, are in accord with current ideals of beauty.

¹⁰ Sland'ring ... esteem Devaluing natural beauty with false praise accorded to the artificial.

¹¹ becoming of Suiting well.

¹² blessed wood Probably a virginal, a small, legless harpsichord on which the strings were plucked rather than struck.

¹³ wiry concord Harmony produced by the plucking of the strings.

¹⁴ dancing chips The keys.

¹⁵ saucy jacks Common slang for impertinent fellows, but here referring also to the aforementioned keys.

Before, a joy proposed; behind, a dream.

All this the world well knows, yet none knows well
To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

130

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;
Coral is far more red than her lips' red;
If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun;
If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head;
5 I have seen roses damasked,^o red and white, parti-colored
But no such roses see I in her cheeks;
And in some perfumes is there more delight
Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.
I love to hear her speak, yet well I know
10 That music hath a far more pleasing sound;
I grant I never saw a goddess go;^o walk
My mistress when she walks treads on the ground.
And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
As any she¹ belied with false compare.

135

Whoever hath her wish,² thou hast thy Will,³
And Will to boot, and Will in overplus;^o superabundance
More than enough am I, that vex thee still,
To thy sweet will making addition thus.
5 Wilt thou, whose will is large and spacious,
Not once vouchsafe to hide my will in thine?
Shall will in others seem right gracious,
And in my will no fair acceptance shine?
The sea, all water, yet receives rain still,
10 And in abundance addeth to his store;
So thou, being rich in Will, add to thy Will
One will of mine, to make thy large Will more:
Let no unkind,^o no fair beseechers kill; unkindness
Think all but one,⁴ and me in that one Will.

136

If thy soul check⁵ thee that I come so near,
I swear to thy blind soul⁶ that I was thy Will,
And will, thy soul knows, is admitted there;
Thus far for love my love-suit sweet fulfil.
5 Will will fulfil the treasure of thy love,
Ay, fill it full with wills, and my will one;
In things of great receipt^o with ease we prove capacity
Among a number one is reckoned none.
Then in the number let me pass untold,
10 Though in thy store's account I one must be.
For nothing hold^o me, so it please thee hold regard
That nothing, me, a something sweet to thee.
Make but my name thy love, and love that still;^o always
And then thou lov'st me, for my name is Will.

138

When my love swears that she is made of truth,
I do believe her, though I know she lies,
That she might think me some untutored youth
Unlearnèd in the world's false subtleties.
5 Thus vainly thinking that she thinks me young,
Although she knows my days are past the best,
Simply I credit her false-speaking tongue;
On both sides thus is simple truth suppressed.
But wherefore says she not she is unjust?^o unfaithful
10 And wherefore say not I that I am old?
O love's best habit is in seeming trust,
And age in love⁷ loves not t^o have years told; to
Therefore I lie with her, and she with me,
And in our faults by lies we flattered be.

143

Lo, as a careful housewife⁸ runs to catch
One of her feathered creatures broke away,
Sets down her babe, and makes all swift dispatch^o haste

¹ any she Any woman.

² Whoever ... wish No matter what other women may wish for or attain.

³ Will In Shakespeare's time, the word could also refer to sexual desire and even to the genitals.

⁴ Think ... one Think of all your suitors as one.

⁵ check Restrain or rebuke.

⁶ blind soul Blind by nature, being enclosed within the body, or blinded by passion.

⁷ age in love An older person in love, or in matters of love.

⁸ careful Attentive, but also perhaps "full of cares," or anxious;
housewife Pronounced "hussif" in Shakespeare's time.

In pursuit of the thing she would have stay;
 5 Whilst her neglected child holds her in chase,¹
 Cries to catch her whose busy care is bent° determined
 To follow that which flies before her face,
 Not prizing° her poor infant's discontent: considering
 So run'st thou after that which flies from thee,
 10 Whilst I, thy babe, chase thee afar behind.
 But if thou catch thy hope,² turn back to me,
 And play the mother's part, kiss me, be kind:
 So will I pray that thou mayst have thy Will,
 If thou turn back and my loud crying still.° soothe

144

Two loves I have, of comfort and despair,
 Which, like two spirits, do suggest° me tempt still:° always
 The better angel is a man right fair,
 The worser spirit a woman coloured ill.³
 5 To win me soon to hell⁴ my female evil
 Tempteth my better angel from my side,
 And would corrupt my saint to be a devil,
 Wooing his purity with her foul pride;
 And whether that⁵ my angel be turned fiend
 10 Suspect I may, yet not directly° tell; exactly
 But being both from me both to each friend,⁶
 I guess one angel in another's hell.
 Yet this shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt,
 Till my bad angel fire my good one out.⁷

² thy hope The object of your hope.

³ coloured ill Of a dark or ugly complexion or temperament.

⁴ hell For the equation of hell with sexual intercourse, cf. Sonnet 129.14: "... the heaven that leads men to this hell."

⁵ whether that Whether or not.

⁶ being ... friend Both spirits being apart from me and together (and friendly) with each other.

⁷ fire ... out Expel or reject my good angel; to "fire out" meant to drive someone or something away from a place by setting a fire, as, e.g., in fox hunting; fire Possibly "fever," with perhaps a glancing reference to venereal disease.

146

Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth,
 ...⁸ these rebel powers that thee array;⁹
 Why dost thou pine¹⁰ within and suffer dearth,
 Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
 5 Why so large cost, having so short a lease,
 Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?
 Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
 Eat up thy charge?¹¹ Is this thy body's end?
 Then soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
 10 And let that¹² pine to aggravate thy store;¹³
 Buy terms¹⁴ divine in selling hours of dross;° scum
 Within be fed, without° be rich no more: externally
 So shalt thou feed on death, that feeds on men,
 And death once dead, there's no more dying then.

147

My love is as a fever, longing still° continually
 For that which longer nurseth the disease,
 Feeding on that which doth preserve the ill,
 Th'uncertain° sickly appetite to please: fitful
 5 My reason, the physician to my love,
 Angry that his prescriptions are not kept,
 Hath left me, and I, desperate, now approve° accept that
 Desire is death, which physic did except.¹⁵
 Past cure I am, now reason is past care,
 10 And frantic mad with ever more unrest;
 My thoughts and my discourse as madmen's are,

⁸ ... The earliest printed version repeats the words "my sinful earth," an apparent misprint; Shakespeare's words are not known. Possible substitutions include "Rebuke," "Foiled by," or "Fooled by."

⁹ these rebel ... thee array I.e., the body that clothes you (which rebels against your soul).

¹⁰ pine Dwindle from longing.

¹¹ thy charge Your expense; also, a possession for which you are responsible.

¹² that I.e., the body.

¹³ aggravate thy store Increase your riches.

¹⁴ terms Periods of time; also agreements.

¹⁵ Desire ... except The sexual desire objected to by my physician is deadly.

At random¹ from the truth vainly expressed:²
 For I have sworn thee fair, and thought thee bright,
 Who art as black as hell, as dark as night.

153

Cupid laid by his brand,³ and fell asleep;
 A maid of Dian's⁴ this advantage^o found, opportunity
 And his love-kindling fire did quickly steep^o plunge
 In a cold valley-fountain⁵ of that ground,
 5 Which borrowed from this holy fire of love
 A dateless^o lively heat still^o to endure, endless / always
 And grew^o a seething bath, which yet men prove grew into
 Against strange maladies a sovereign^o cure: potent
 But at my mistress' eye love's brand new fired,⁶
 10 The boy for trial needs would⁷ touch my breast;
 I, sick withal, the help of bath desired,

And thither hied,⁸ a sad distempered guest,
 But found no cure; the bath for my help lies
 Where Cupid got new fire: my mistress' eye.

154

The little love-god^o lying once asleep, Cupid
 Laid by his side his heart-inflaming brand,⁹
 Whilst many nymphs, that vowed chaste life to keep,¹⁰
 Came tripping by; but in her maiden hand
 5 The fairest votary¹¹ took up that fire
 Which many legions of true hearts had warmed;
 And so the general of hot desire¹²
 Was, sleeping, by a virgin hand disarmed.
 This brand she quenched in a cool well by,^o nearby
 10 Which from love's fire took heat perpetual,
 Growing^o a bath and healthful remedy growing into
 For men diseased; but I, my mistress' thrall,
 Came there for cure, and this by that I prove:
 Love's fire heats water, water cools not love.

² vainly expressed Expressing myself foolishly or fecklessly.

³ Cupid ... brand Cupid, Roman god of love, often pictured as a small boy carrying a torch (brand) used to kindle erotic love in the hearts of mortals; laid by Set aside.

⁴ maid of Dian's Diana, Roman goddess of the moon and the hunt, known for her chastity, was attended by young virgin nymphs (maids).

⁵ cold valley-fountain One of the cool springs associated with the dwelling-place of Diana.

⁶ new fired Reignited.

⁷ for trial To test the flame; needs would Wanted to.

⁸ thither hied Hastened there.

⁹ heart-inflaming brand Torch used by Cupid to kindle erotic love in the hearts of mortals.

¹⁰ nymphs ... keep Attendants of the chaste goddess Diana, who themselves took a vow of chastity.

¹¹ fairest votary Most beautiful of those vowed to chastity.

¹² general ... desire Cupid, pictured as the commander of erotic passion.

THat thou are blam'd shall not be thy defect,
 For slanders marke was euer yet the faire,
 The ornament of beauty is suspect,
 A Crow that flies in heavens sweetest ayre.
 So thou be good, slander doth but approue,
 Their worth the greater beeing woo d of time,
 For Canker vice the sweetest buds doth loue,
 And thou present'it a pure vnstained prime.
 Thou hast past by the ambush of young daies,
 Either not assayld, or victor beeing charg'd,
 Yet this thy praise cannot be foe thy praise,
 To tye vp enuy, euer more enlarged,
 If some suspect of ill maskt not thy show,
 Then thou alone kingdomes of hearts shouldst owe.'

71

NOe Longer mourne for me when I am dead,
 Then you shall heare the surly sullen bell
 Giue warning to the world that I am fled
 From this vile world with vildest wormes to dwell:
 Nay if you read this line, remember not,
 The hand that writ it, for I loue you so,
 That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
 If thinking on me then should make you woe.
 O if I say you looke vpon this verse,
 When I (perhaps) compounded am with clay,
 Do not so much as my poore name reherse;
 But let your loue euen with my life decay.
 Least the wise world should looke into your mone,
 And mocke you with me after I am gon.

72

O Least the world should taske you to recite,
 What merit liu'd in me that you should loue
 After my death (deare loue) for get me quite,
 For you in me can nothing worthy proue,
 Vnlesse you would deuise some vertuous lye,

To

SONNETS.

To doe more for me then mine owne desert,
 And hang more praise vpon deceased I,
 Then nigard truth would willingly impart:
 O least your true loue may seeme false in this,
 That you for loue speake well of me vntrue,
 My name be buried where my body is,
 And liue no more to shame nor me, nor you.
 For I am shamd by that which I bring forth,
 And so should you, to loue things nothing worth.

73

THat time of yeere thou maist in me behold,
 When yellow leaues, or none, or few doe hange
 Vpon those boughes which shake against the cold,
 Bare rn'wd quiers, where late the sweet birds sang.
 In me thou seest the twi-light of such day,
 As after Sun-set fadeth in the West,
 Which by and by blacke night doth take away,
 Deaths second selfe that seals vp all in rest.
 In me thou seest the glowing of such fire,
 That on the ashes of his youth doth lye,
 As the death bed, whereon it must expire,
 Consum'd with that which it was nurrish't by.
 This thou perceu'st, which makes thy loue more strong,
 To loue that well, which thou must leaue ere long.

74

BVe be contented when that fell arrest,
 With out all bayle shall carry me away,
 My life hath in this line some interest,
 Which for memoriall still with thee shall stay.
 When thou reuwest this, thou doest reuew,
 The very part was consecrate to thee,
 The earth can haue but earth, which is his due,
 My spirit is thine the better part of me,
 So then thou hast but lost the dregs of life,
 The pray of wormes, my body being dead,
 The coward conquest of a wretches knife,

To

BEN JONSON

1572 – 1637

Ben Jonson was an innovator in poetry, drama, and criticism. In 1616 he became the first Englishman to edit and publish not just his own poetry but his own drama. King James I awarded him a pension and he was, in effect, England's Poet Laureate although there was as yet no such official position. He presided over a literary following that in one poem he calls the "tribe of Ben," members of which included some of the best Cavalier poets. Like Shakespeare a pioneer in the transition from verse to prose in comic dialogue, with a particular talent for shaping social and moral satire into comedy, Jonson also preferred to create his own plots rather than to borrow stories from earlier sources, as was a common practice. With inventive and lyrical virtuosity, he also accumulated a supple and diverse body of poetry. His reputation came to be partially eclipsed by that of Shakespeare, for his humanist erudition and the frequent comic realism of his drama made him seem flat and pedantic beside what was read as Shakespeare's genial inspiration (what Milton called his "native woodnotes wild")—a writer for scholars, to be respected and admired sooner than loved and enjoyed. The twentieth century, though, felt an affinity for what appeared to be the anticipatory modern elements in Jonson—his "plain style," his acute social observation, and his audacity in manipulating dramatic and classical conventions. T.S. Eliot, one of the first to sense this affinity, called Jonson's works "a part of our literary inheritance that craves further expression."

Jonson's grounding in the classics began in adolescence at Westminster School under the noted scholar and antiquarian William Camden, a lifelong friend whom Jonson later praised as the teacher "to whom I owe all that I am in arts." After brief stints as an apprentice bricklayer and a soldier, Jonson (like Shakespeare) joined the developing theater world as an actor. Every Man in his Humour (1598), in which Shakespeare acted, established Jonson as master of the new "comedy of humors," which lampoons eccentricities of character, called "humors" because diagnosable as an imbalance of the four humors that make up the body and affect the mind. Jonson also announced himself as an innovator with a mission. His prologue to the play—one of many such overt statements and justifications of his art that he eventually learned to dramatize more indirectly—sets out what remained the core of his dramatic philosophy; in it he advocates direct and realistic language ("deeds and language such as men do use") and a return to classical unities of time and space, eschewing the elaborate fantasies and distortions common in Elizabethan comedy and even more common in Jacobean romance and tragicomedy. A more satirical sequel, Every Man out of his Humour (1599), proved so popular that Jonson took the unorthodox step of personally supervising its publication, thereby establishing a double precedent—the play as property of its author rather than of the acting company, and the popular stage play as literary document.

Jonson's high opinion of his art proved justified; his plays Volpone (1606) and The Alchemist (1610) remain two of the best-loved comedies in British literature. Volpone chronicles a scheming miser's deception of a series of legacy hunters; in The Alchemist, various vain and gullible types are exploited by three servants posing as musicians in their master's absence. Both are comedies of intrigue, and in both Jonson set new standards in incisive, naturalistic dialogue and intricate plot construction. (Coleridge judged the plot of The Alchemist "absolute perfection.") These comedies show Jonson able to turn his ferocious satirical gifts to a coherent purpose, what he called “high moral” comedy, and, in the case of The Alchemist, to attain perfect classical unities of time and space: its action takes place in real time in a set built to actual size.

Jonson also scored hits with Epicoene (1612), a sportive exploration of sexual politics, and Bartholomew Fair (1614), a broad, slice-of-life portrait of London holiday street life. His attempts at tragedy, Sejanus (1603) and Catiline (1612), were judged too ponderous and pedantic, though Jonson, who well understood the power of print, was convinced his reading public would overleap what he saw as the deficiencies of his playgoing audiences. In the case of Catiline, he was right: though never a performance success, it was the most-quoted English play of the seventeenth century.

Posterity has since consigned Jonson’s tragedies to relative obscurity but has shown increased regard for the limpid and clever verse he contributed to the Jacobean court masques. These were entertainments, commissioned to celebrate special events, that were danced and acted by members of the court. They featured increasingly elaborate costumes, scenery, and special effects, all designed by Jonson’s collaborator, the court architect Inigo Jones. Such spectacles as the Masque of Blackness (1605) and the Masque of Beauty (1608) played off antique myths, providing a venue for Jonson to display his classical learning and sharpen his lyrical gifts. Jonson also introduced, in such flattering yet admonitory court masques as Pleasure Reconciled to Virtue and Love Restored (1612), the intriguing device of the “antimasque,” a more rough-and-tumble moment with comic images of irrationality or grotesquerie that the surrounding masque both absorbs and exorcizes. Between them, Jonson and Jones took the masque from transitory amusement into a high art that in its multimedia form in some ways anticipates the opera and even film.

Jonson considered himself above all a poet. His poetry follows his dramas and masques in the 1616 folio of his collected works, which was the culmination of his career to that point, “the ripest of my studies.” When, in his “Epistle to the Countess of Rutland” (1600), he introduced his “strange poems, which as yet / Had not their form touched by an English wit,” Jonson was referring to such classical forms as the ode, epistle, epitaph, and epigram that he intended to revive or invigorate with a more crystalline yet colloquial style. His two best-loved lyrics, “To Celia” and “Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes,” written for Volpone, are not mere translations of Catullus and Philostrates; they are quintessentially Jonsonian, bringing to mind Oscar Wilde’s assertion that Jonson “made the poets of Greece and Rome terribly modern.”

These classical poetic genres were well suited to the intensely personal and yet social nature of Jonson’s poetry, and it is here that his turbulent life and personality are reflected most vividly. We see in his many commissioned occasional pieces the cultivation of the aristocratic patronage on which he depended—as in “To Penshurst,” his eloquent tribute to the estate of the Sidney family. We witness his capacity for generous friendship in his epigrams to John Donne and his preface to Shakespeare’s First Folio, and his capacity for grief in the restrained eloquence of his epitaphs on his young son and infant daughter. We even glean hints of his legendary appetite for food and drink in “Inviting a Friend to Supper,” which celebrates the sort of literary camaraderie Jonson found (and read about in his beloved Horace) in his early years, at the Mermaid Tavern, where he held court with a coterie of wits and fellow writers. Other early literary friends included Raleigh, Bacon, Chapman, Beaumont, and Fletcher, while later in his career, he mentored younger poets such as Herrick, Suckling, and Carew, presiding over a literary cult of sorts, the “sons [or sometimes “tribe”] of Ben,” at the Devil Tavern in the 1620s. Jonson had enemies, too; he could be vain, arrogant and quarrelsome, especially in defense of his literary principles and reputation, as in his legendary feud with his rival playwrights Dekker and Marston early in his career. Indeed, in 1598 he got into a fight with an actor and killed him (a crime for which he was branded and sent for a while to prison, where he became a Catholic, reconverting some years later).

The royal pension bestowed on him in 1616 enabled Jonson to leave the stage and concentrate largely on his poetry for a decade. In 1618, he traveled to Scotland, where he visited the poet William Drummond, who left a record of their conversations and Jonson's often imperious opinions. The following year he was awarded an honorary M.A. from Oxford. Such triumphs and his "tribe" or "sons" notwithstanding, the 1620s brought a gradual decline in Jonson's health and fortunes. A fire destroyed his library, along with several manuscripts, in 1623. The death of King James in 1625 left him without a place at court, necessitating a return to the stage in 1626 with The Staple of News, a satire on the emerging newspaper business; it was not well-received. In fact, he was never again to attain success as a playwright; Dryden was later to refer to these late plays as "Jonson's dotages." His masque-writing career ended with the culmination in 1631 of a long-running feud with Inigo Jones. Even though disabled and confined to his house after a stroke in 1628, however, and though no longer the influential lion of his youth, Jonson did not lack for admirers or companionship. When he died in August 1637, most of London's literary and social elite attended his funeral.

Ben Jonson did not leave the world of letters as he found it. His assertion of ownership and careful editing of his own works affected the development of modern authorship and certainly influenced the publication of Shakespeare's First Folio. His satirical comedies provided a significant model for Restoration and eighteenth-century drama, and even for later comic writers in other genres such as Fielding and Dickens. In numerous justificatory prologues to his plays, and in his commonplace book, Timber, or Discoveries, he left behind a striking record of a writer's mind at work. And, just as important, the muscular yet supple "plain style" of his poetry was pivotal in deflecting a late Elizabethan taste for the highly wrought and decorative towards a more direct and colloquial manner that became one major strand of late seventeenth-century (and modern) aesthetics.

To the Reader

Pray thee take care, that tak'st my book in hand,
To read it well: that is, to understand.
—1616

Much less with lewd, profane and beastly phrase,
To catch the world's loose laughter or vain gaze.
He that departs with his own honesty
For vulgar praise, doth it too dearly buy.
—1616

To My Book

It will be looked for, book, when some but see
Thy title, Epigrams, and named of me,
Thou should'st be bold, licentious, full of gall,
Wormwood and sulphur, sharp and toothed withal;¹
5 Become a petulant thing, hurl ink and wit
As madmen stones, not caring whom they hit.
Deceive their malice who could wish it so,
And by thy wiser temper let men know
Thou are not covetous of least self-fame
10 Made from the hazard of another's shame;

On Something that Walks Somewhere

At court I met it, in clothes brave enough
To be a courtier, and looks grave enough
To seem a statesman: as I near it came,
It made me a great face; I asked the name.
5 "A lord," it cried, "buried in flesh and blood,
And such from whom let no man hope least good,
For I will do none; and as little ill,
For I will dare none." Good lord, walk dead still.
—1616

¹ Thou should'st ... toothed withal Characteristics of late Elizabethan verse satire, a mode of poetry with which epigrams were associated.

*To William Camden*¹

Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe
 All that I am in arts, all that I know
 (How nothing's that?), to whom my country owes
 The great renown and name² wherewith she goes;
 5 Than thee the age sees not that thing more grave,
 More high, more holy, that she more would crave.
 What name, what skill, what faith hast thou in things!
 What sight in searching the most antique springs!
 What weight, and what authority in thy speech!
 10 Man scarce can make that doubt, but thou canst teach.
 Pardon free truth, and let thy modesty,
 Which conquers all, be once overcome by thee.
 Many of thine this better could than I;
 But for their powers, accept my piety.
 —1616

On My First Daughter

Here lies, to each her parents' ruth,
 Mary, the daughter of their youth;
 Yet, all heaven's gifts being heaven's due,
 It makes the father less to rue.
 5 At six months' end she parted hence
 With safety of her innocence;
 Whose soul heaven's queen (whose name she bears)
 In comfort of her mother's tears,
 Hath placed amongst her virgin train:
 10 Where, while that severed doth remain,³
 This grave partakes the fleshly birth;
 Which cover lightly, gentle earth.

² name Punning reference to Camden's great historical work Britannia (1586).

³ that severed doth remain Her soul, severed from the body, remains in heaven.

*To John Donne*⁴

Donne, the delight of Phoebus⁵ and each muse,
 Who, to thy one, all other brains refuse;⁶
 Whose every work of thy most early wit
 Came forth example, and remains so yet;
 5 Longer a-knowing than most wits do live,
 And which no affection praise enough can give!
 To it, thy language, letters, arts, best life,
 Which might with half mankind maintain a strife;
 All which I meant to praise, and yet I would,
 10 But leave, because I cannot as I should.
 —1616

On My First Son

Farewell, thou child of my right hand,⁷ and joy;
 My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy.
 Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
 Exacted by thy fate, on the just day.⁸
 5 Oh, could I lose all father, now! For why
 Will man lament the state he should envy?
 To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
 And, if no other misery, yet age?
 Rest in soft peace, and, asked, say here doth lie
 10 Ben Jonson his best piece of poetry;
 For whose sake, henceforth, all his vows be such,
 As what he loves may never like too much.
 —1616 (WRITTEN 1603)

⁴ To John Donne For biographical information on Donne, see the introduction to the selection of his works; for some of Jonson's informal opinions on Donne, see the selection from his "Conversations with William Drummond."

⁵ Phoebus Apollo, god of poetry.

⁶ refuse Jonson's syntax here is compact: Apollo and the Muses refuse to bestow on other brains the gifts they've given Donne, or they reject all brains in favor of his.

⁷ right hand The name "Benjamin," which was also the name of Jonson's dead son, means "son of the right hand" in Hebrew (see Genesis 35), implying right-handedness, and good luck, also being placed in a position of privilege and paternal favor.

⁸ Seven years ... just day Jonson's first son (b. 1596) died at the age of seven, and seven years was the traditional length of time for which loans were extended.

*On Lucy, Countess of Bedford*¹

This morning, timely rapt with holy fire,
 I thought to form unto my zealous muse
 What kind of creature I could most desire
 To honour, serve and love, as poets use.
 5 I meant to make her fair, and free,^o and wise, generous
 Of greatest blood, and yet more good than great;
 I meant the day-star² should not brighter rise,
 Nor lend like influence from his lucent^o seat. shining
 I meant she should be courteous, facile,^o sweet, affable
 10 Hating that solemn vice of greatness, pride;
 I meant each softest virtue there should meet,
 Fit in that softer bosom to reside.
 Only a learnèd and a manly soul
 I purposed her; that should, with even powers,
 15 The rock, the spindle and the shears control
 Of destiny,³ and spin her own free hours.
 Such when I meant to feign, and wished to see,
 My muse bade, Bedford write, and that was she.

Inviting a Friend to Supper

Tonight, grave sir, both my poor house and I
 Do equally desire your company:
 Not that we think us worthy such a guest,
 But that your worth will dignify our feast
 5 With those that come; whose grace may make that seem Something, which else could hope for no esteem.
 It is the fair acceptance, sir, creates
 The entertainment perfect, not the cates.^o food
 Yet shall you have, to rectify your palate,
 10 An olive, capers, or some better salad

¹ Lucy, Countess of Bedford (1581–1627), friend and patron of Ben Jonson and other writers, including John Donne, Samuel Daniel, and Michael Drayton.

² day-star Often the morning star or planet Venus, but sometimes, as here, the sun (the next line indicates that this day-star is figured as masculine).

³ The rock ... Of destiny Referring to the three Fates of classical myth: Clotho spun the thread of life (a “rock” is a distaff), Lachesis measured its length on her spindle, and Atropos cut the thread. Jonson’s ideal patron controls her own destiny, and so spins for herself her “free” (unmeasured) hours.

Ushering the mutton; with a short-legged hen,
 If we can get her, full of eggs, and then
 Lemons, and wine for sauce; to these, a coney^o rabbit
 Is not to be despaired of, for our money;
 15 And though fowl now be scarce, yet there are clerks,⁴
 The sky not falling, think we may have larks.⁵
 I’ll tell you of more, and lie, so you will come:
 Of partridge, pheasant, woodcock, of which some
 May yet be there; and godwit, if we can;
 20 Knat, rail and ruff, too.⁶ Howsoe’er, my man
 Shall read a piece of Virgil, Tacitus,
 Livy, or of some better book to us,
 Of which we’ll speak our minds, amidst our meat;
 And I’ll profess no verses to repeat;
 25 To this, if aught appear which I not know of,
 That will the pastry, not my paper, show of.⁷
 Digestive cheese and fruit there sure will be;
 But that which most doth take my muse and me
 Is a pure cup of rich Canary wine,⁸
 30 Which is the Mermaid’s⁹ now, but shall be mine;
 Of which had Horace or Anacreon¹⁰ tasted,
 Their lives, as do their lines, till now had lasted.
 Tobacco,¹¹ nectar, or the Thespian Spring¹²

⁴ clerks Pronounced “clarks.”

⁵ larks Playing on a proverb: “if the sky falls, we shall have larks.” Here, some “clerks” (knowledgeable people) think Jonson’s supper will feature larks even if the sky does not fall. Not figurative: to “have larks” in the sense of to “have fun” first appears in the nineteenth century.

⁶ Knat ... too All edible birds. Jonson is not offering his guest an expensive feast: by the standards of the gentry of the time, the food on offer is simple and inexpensive, though well chosen.

⁷ if aught appear ... show of That is, if Jonson’s own poems do make a surprise appearance, it will only be because they are on paper used to wrap the pastries.

⁸ Canary wine Light, sweet wine from the Canary Islands, off the west coast of Africa.

⁹ Mermaid’s The Mermaid Tavern in Cheapside, Jonson’s favorite place to meet friends and drink.

¹⁰ Horace or Anacreon Respectively, a Roman and an ancient Greek lyric poet; both wrote in praise of wine.

¹¹ Tobacco Tobacco was described as being “drunk” rather than “smoked” in the period.

¹² Thespian Spring Stream at the foot of Mount Helicon sacred to the classical Muses.

Are all but Luther's beer¹ to this I sing.
 35 Of this we will sup free, but moderately;
 And we will have no Poley or Parrot² by;
 Nor shall our cups make any guilty men,
 But at our parting we will be as when
 We innocently met. No simple word
 40 That shall be uttered at our mirthful board
 Shall make us sad next morning, or affright
 The liberty that we'll enjoy tonight.
 —1616

*To Penshurst*³

Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show
 Of touch^o or marble, nor canst boast a row black stone
 Of polished pillars, or a roof of gold;
 Thou hast no lantern⁴ whereof tales are told,
 5 Or stair, or courts; but standst an ancient pile,
 And these grudged at, art revered the while.
 Thou joy'st in better marks, of soil, of air,
 Of wood, of water; therein thou art fair.
 Thou hast thy walks for health as well as sport:
 10 Thy Mount, to which the dryads^o do resort, wood nymphs
 Where Pan and Bacchus⁵ their high feasts have made,

¹ Luther's beer Beer brewed in Germany and thought to be weaker than and inferior to English beer.

² Poley or Parrot Two well known government spies or informers; Robert Poley (or Pooley) and Henry Parrot. Pooley was present when Christopher Marlowe was fatally stabbed in a Deptford tavern. Jonson also plays on these men's names: a "Polly" or Parrot is a talkative bird.

⁴ lantern Windowed turret or similar structure; the new, lavish manors with which Jonson compares Penshurst featured such "talked about" architectural features.

⁵ Pan and Bacchus Greek gods: Pan was the half man, half goat deity of the pastoral world; Bacchus was the god of wine. Both were also associated with song and poetic inspiration, and their presence is an implicit tribute to the Sidneys as a family of poets (Philip in particular; see line 14) and patrons of poetry.

Beneath the broad beech and the chestnut shade;
 That taller tree, which of a nut was set
 At his great birth,⁶ where all the Muses met.
 15 There, in the writhèd^o bark, are cut the names twisted
 Of many a sylvan,⁷ taken with his flames;
 And thence the ruddy satyrs oft provoke
 The lighter fauns to reach thy lady's oak.⁸
 Thy copse, too, named of Gamage,⁹ thou hast there, 20 That never fails to serve thee seasoned^o deer of suitable age
 When thou wouldst feast or exercise thy friends.
 The lower land, that to the river bends,
 Thy sheep, thy bullocks, kine and calves do feed;
 The middle grounds thy mares and horses breed.
 25 Each bank doth yield thee conies,^o and the tops, rabbits
 Fertile of wood, Ashour and Sidney's copse,¹⁰
 To crown thy open table, doth provide
 The purpled pheasant with the speckled side;
 The painted partridge lies in every field,
 30 And for thy mess^o is willing to be killed. meal
 And if the high-swoll'n Medway¹¹ fail thy dish,
 Thou hast thy ponds that pay thee tribute fish:
 Fat, agèd carps, that run into thy net;
 And pikes, now weary their own kind to eat,¹²
 35 As loath the second draught or cast to stay,
 Officiously,^o at first, themselves betray; obligingly
 Bright eels, that emulate them, and leap on land
 Before the fisher, or into his hand.
 Then hath thy orchard fruit, thy garden flowers,
 40 Fresh as the air and new as are the hours:
 The early cherry, with the later plum,
 Fig, grape and quince, each in his time doth come;
 The blushing apricot and woolly peach
 Hang on thy walls, that every child may reach.
 45 And though thy walls be of the country^o stone, local

⁶ his great birth Sir Philip Sidney (b. 1554).

⁷ sylvan Rural lover, inspired by the flames of love (or by the passions in Sidney's love poetry).

⁸ satyrs ... lady's oak Satyrs and fauns are ancient woodland deities: the satyrs challenge the (smaller) fauns in races to an oak tree named for a Lady Leicester who went into labor while sitting under it.

⁹ Gamage Named for Barbara Gamage, Lady Leicester.

¹⁰ tops ... copse Like other parts of the estate, nature in the "tops" (high grounds) bears the names of people.

¹¹ Medway River near the estate.

¹² And pikes ... to eat Pikes were reputed to be particularly voracious fish.

They're reared with no man's ruin, no man's groan;
 There's none that dwell about them wish them down,
 But all come in, the farmer and the clown,^o rustic
 And no one empty-handed, to salute
 50 Thy lord and lady, though they have no suit.^o request
 Some bring a capon, some a rural cake,
 Some nuts, some apples; some that think they make
 The better cheeses, bring 'em; or else send
 By their ripe daughters, whom they would commend
 55 This way to husbands; and whose baskets bear
 An emblem of themselves, in plum or pear.
 But what can this (more than express their love)
 Add to thy free provisions, far above
 The need of such? whose liberal board doth flow
 60 With all that hospitality doth know!
 Where comes no guest but is allowed to eat
 Without his fear, and of thy lord's own meat;
 Where the same beer and bread and self-same wine
 That is his lordship's shall be also mine;
 65 And I not fain to sit, as some this day
 At great men's tables, and yet dine away.
 Here no man tells^o my cups, nor, standing by, counts
 A waiter, doth my gluttony envy,
 But gives me what I call, and lets me eat;
 70 He knows below he shall find plenty of meat,
 Thy tables hoard not up for the next day.
 Nor, when I take my lodging, need I pray
 For fire or lights or livery:^o all is there, provisions
 As if thou then wert mine, or I reigned here;
 75 There's nothing I can wish, for which I stay.^o wait
 That found King James, when, hunting late this way
 With his brave son, the Prince,¹ they saw thy fires
 Shine bright on every hearth as the desires
 Of thy Penates² had been set on flame
 80 To entertain them; or the country came
 With all their zeal to warm their welcome here.
 What (great, I will not say, but) sudden cheer
 Didst thou then make 'em! and what praise was heaped
 On thy good lady then! who therein reaped

85 The just reward of her high housewifery:
 To have her linen, plate, and all things nigh
 When she was far; and not a room but dressed
 As if it had expected such a guest!
 These, Penshurst, are thy praise, and yet not all.
 90 Thy lady's noble, fruitful, chaste withal;
 His children thy great lord may call his own,
 A fortune in this age but rarely known.
 They are and have been taught religion; thence
 Their gentler spirits have sucked innocence.
 95 Each morn and even they are taught to pray
 With the whole household, and may every day
 Read in their virtuous parents' noble parts
 The mysteries of manners, arms, and arts.
 Now, Penshurst, they that will proportion^o thee compare
 100 With other edifices, when they see
 Those proud, ambitious heaps, and nothing else,
 May say, their lords have built, but thy lord dwells.
 —1616 (WRITTEN 1611/12)

*Song: To Celia*³

Drink to me only, with thine eyes,
 And I will pledge with mine;
 Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
 And I'll not look for wine.
 5 The thirst that from the soul doth rise
 Doth ask a drink divine;
 But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
 I would not change for thine.
 I sent thee late a rosy wreath,
 10 Not so much honouring thee
 As giving it a hope that there
 It could not withered be.
 But thou thereon didst only breathe,
 And sent'st it back to me;
 15 Since when it grows, and smells, I swear,
 Not of itself, but thee.
 —1616

¹ the Prince Prince Henry; he died in November 1612.

² Penates Roman household divinities.

³ Song: To Celia Much of this poem consists of Jonson's translations of prose fragments by the ancient Greek writer Philostratus.

*To the Memory of My Beloved,
The Author, Mr. William Shakespeare,
And What He Hath Left Us*¹

To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name,
Am I thus ample to thy book and fame;
While I confess thy writings to be such
As neither man nor Muse can praise too much:
'Tis true, and all men's suffrage. But these ways
Were not the paths I meant unto thy praise:
For silliest ignorance on these may light,
Which, when it sounds at best, but echoes right;
Or blind affection, which doth ne'er advance
The truth, but gropes, and urgeth all by chance;
Or crafty malice might pretend this praise,
And think to ruin where it seemed to raise.
These are as some infamous bawd or whore
Should praise a matron: what could hurt her more?
But thou art proof against them, and indeed
Above the ill fortune of them, or the need.
I therefore will begin. Soul of the age!
The applause, delight, the wonder of our stage!
My Shakespeare, rise: I will not lodge thee by Chaucer or Spenser, or bid Beaumont² lie
A little further, to make thee a room;
Thou art a monument without a tomb,
And art alive still while thy book doth live,
And we have wits to read, and praise to give.
That I not mix thee so, my brain excuses:
I mean with great, but disproportioned, Muses;
For if I thought my judgement were of years
I should commit thee surely with thy peers:
And tell how far thou didst our Lyly outshine,
Or sporting Kyd, or Marlowe's mighty line.³
And though thou hadst small Latin, and less Greek,⁴
From thence to honour thee I would not seek
For names, but call forth thundering Aeschylus,

Euripides, and Sophocles⁵ to us,
Pacuvius, Accius, him of Cordova dead,⁶
To life again, to hear thy buskin⁷ tread
And shake a stage; or, when thy socks⁸ were on,
Leave thee alone for the comparison
Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome
Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come.
Triumph, my Britain, thou hast one to show
To whom all scenes of Europe homage owe.
He was not of an age, but for all time!
And all the Muses still were in their prime
When like Apollo he came forth to warm
Our ears, or like a Mercury⁹ to charm!
Nature herself was proud of his designs,
And joyed to wear the dressing of his lines,
Which were so richly spun and woven so fit
As, since, she will vouchsafe no other wit.
The merry Greek, tart Aristophanes,
Neat Terence, witty Plautus,¹⁰ now not please,
But antiquated and deserted lie
As they were not of nature's family.
Yet must I not give nature all: thy art,
My gentle Shakespeare, must enjoy a part.
For though the poet's matter nature be,
His art doth give the fashion. And that he
Who casts to write a living line must sweat
(Such as thine are) and strike the second heat
Upon the Muses' anvil: turn the same
(And himself with it) that he thinks to frame;
Or for the laurel he may gain a scorn:
For a good poet's made, as well as born;
And such wert thou. Look how the father's face
Lives in his issue: even so, the race
Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shines
In his well-turned and true-filed lines:

² Beaumont Playwright Francis Beaumont (1584–1616), buried, like Chaucer and Spenser, in Westminster Abbey.

³ our Lyly ... mighty line Playwrights John Lyly (c. 1554–1606), Thomas Kyd (1558–94), and Christopher Marlowe (1564–93).

⁴ small Latin, and less Greek By Jonson's standards, this means something less than erudite and expert fluency.

⁵ Aeschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles Ancient Greek dramatists.

⁶ Pacuvius ... Cordova dead Ancient Roman playwrights. No works are extant by Pacuvius or Accius; "him of Cordova" is Seneca.

⁷ buskin Boot worn by actors in Greek tragedies, and so a metonym for tragic drama.

⁸ socks Shoes worn by actors in Greek and Roman comedies, and so a metonym for comic drama.

⁹ Apollo ... Mercury Gods of poetry and eloquence.

¹⁰ tart Aristophanes ... Plautus Aristophanes was a Greek dramatist known for satirical comedies; Plautus and Terence were both Roman playwrights known for comedies.

In each of which he seems to shake a lance,
 70 As brandished at the eyes of ignorance.
 Sweet swan of Avon! What a sight it were
 To see thee in our waters yet appear,
 And make those flights upon the banks of Thames
 That so did take Eliza, and our James!¹
 75 But stay, I see thee in the hemisphere
 Advanced, and made a constellation there!
 Shine forth, thou star of poets, and with rage
 Or influence chide or cheer the drooping stage;
 Which, since thy flight from hence, hath mourned like night
 80 And despairs day, but for thy volume's light.
 —1623

*Ode to Himself*²

Come leave the loathèd stage,
 And the more loathsome age,
 Where pride and impudence, in faction knit,
 Usurp the chair of wit:
 5 Indicting and arraigning every day
 Something they call a play.
 Let their fastidious, vain
 Commission of the brain
 Run on, and rage, sweat, censure, and condemn:
 10 They were not made for thee, less thou for them.

Say that thou pour'st them wheat,
 And they will acorns eat:
 'Twere simple fury, still, thyself to waste
 On such as have no taste:
 15 To offer them a surfeit of pure bread,
 Whose appetites are dead.
 No, give them grains their fill,
 Husks, draff³ to drink and swill.

dregs

If they love lees, and leave the lusty wine,
 20 Envy them not, their palate's with the swine.

No doubt some mouldy tale,
 Like Pericles,³ and stale
 As the shrieve's crusts,⁴ and nasty as his fish-
 Scraps out of every dish
 25 Thrown forth, and raked into the common tub,
 May keep up the play-club:
 There, sweepings do as well
 As the best ordered meal.
 For, who the relish of these guests will fit,
 30 Needs set them but the alms-basket of wit.

And much good do't you then:
 Brave plush and velvet-men;
 Can feed on orts:⁵ and safe in your stage-clothes, scraps
 Dare quit, upon your oaths,
 35 The stagers and the stage-wrights too (your peers)
 Of larding your large ears
 With their foul comic socks,
 Wrought upon twenty blocks:
 Which if they are torn, and turned, and patched enough,
 40 The gamesters share your guilt, and you their stuff.

Leave things so prostitute,
 And take the Alcaic lute;
 Or thine own Horace or Anacreon's lyre;
 Warm thee by Pindar's⁵ fire:
 45 And though thy nerves be shrunk, and blood be cold,
 Ere years have made thee old,
 Strike that disdainful heat
 Throughout, to their defeat:

¹ Eliza ... James I.e., Queen Elizabeth I and King James I of England.

² Ode to Himself Written in response to the poor reception of his play The New Inn, which was hissed off stage in 1629. Jonson first published this ode with the printed version of the play in 1631; the version here, slightly revised, appeared in his 1640 Works.

⁴ shrieve's crusts Sheriff's crusts; referring to the leftover food collected to feed poor prisoners.

⁵ Alcaic ... Pindar's Jonson tells himself to return to classical literary genres, as represented by such renowned ancient poets as the Greeks Alcaeus, Pindar, and Anacreon, and the Roman Horace.

As curious fools, and envious of thy strain,
 50 May, blushing, swear no palsy's in thy brain.

But when they hear thee sing
 The glories of thy King,
 His zeal to God, and his just awe o'er men:
 They may, blood-shaken, then,
 55 Feel such a flesh-quake to possess their powers
 As they shall cry, "Like ours
 In sound of peace or wars,
 No harp e'er hit the stars,
 In tuning forth the acts of his sweet reign:
 60 And raising Charles's chariot 'bove his Wain."¹
 —1631, 1640

My Picture Left in Scotland

I now think Love is rather deaf than blind,
 For else it could not be,
 That she
 Whom I adore so much, should so slight me,
 5 And cast my suit behind:
 I'm sure my language to her was as sweet,
 And every close² did meet
 In sentence of as subtle feet,
 As hath the youngest he
 10 That sits in shadow of Apollo's tree.

Oh, but my conscious fears,
 That fly my thoughts between,
 Tell me that she hath seen
 My hundreds of gray hairs
 15 Told seven and forty years,
 Read so much waist, as she cannot embrace
 My mountain belly, and my rocky face,
 And all these, through her eyes, have stopped her ears.
 —1640 (WRITTEN 1619)

² close Conclusion of a musical theme or phrase.

To the Immortal Memory and Friendship of That Noble Pair, Sir Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison³

The Turn⁴

Brave infant of Saguntum,⁵ clear^o explain
 Thy coming forth in that great year
 When the prodigious Hannibal did crown
 His rage with razing your immortal town.
 5 Thou, looking then about,
 Ere thou wert half got out,
 Wise child, didst hastily return,
 And mad'st thy mother's womb thine urn.
 How summed^o a circle didst thou leave complete mankind
 10 Of deepest lore, could we the centre find!

The Counter-Turn

Did wiser nature draw thee back
 From out the horror of that sack?
 Where shame, faith, honour, and regard of right
 Lay trampled on; the deeds of death and night
 15 Urged, hurried forth, and hurled
 Upon the affrighted world:
 Sword, fire, and famine with fell fury met,
 And all on utmost ruin set;

⁴ The Turn This poem is one of the earliest attempts in English to imitate the Greek Pindaric ode, and the most successful. Pindar (518–438 BCE) composed choral odes that commemorate winners at the Olympic games. His language is allusive and his form and meter complex. His structure is tripartite: the chorus sings a "strophe" (Jonson's "turn") while moving in one direction, then reverses direction and sings a structurally identical "antistrophe" (Jonson's "counter-turn"), then stops and sings the "epode" (Jonson's "stand"), which differs structurally from the other parts.

⁵ infant of Saguntum According to the Roman writer Pliny, an infant born in Sagunto (in Spain) while it was being sacked by the Carthaginian general Hannibal in 219 BCE returned immediately to its mother's womb.

As, could they but life's miseries foresee,
 20 No doubt all infants would return like thee?

The Stand

For what is life, if measured by the space,
 Not by the act?
 Or maskèd man, if valued by his face
 Above his fact?
 25 Here's one outlived his peers
 And told forth fourscore years;
 He vexèd time, and busied the whole state;
 Troubled both foes and friends,
 But ever to no ends;
 30 What did this stirrer,^o but die late?
 How well at twenty had he fallen or stood!
 For three of his fourscore he did no good.

agitator

The Turn

He entered well by virtuous parts,
 Got up and thrived with honest arts;
 35 He purchased friends and fame and honours then,
 And had his noble name advanced with men;
 But weary of that flight,
 He stooped in all men's sight
 To sordid flatteries, acts of strife,
 40 And sunk in that dead sea of life
 So deep, as he did then death's waters sup,
 But that the cork of title buoyed him up.

The Counter-Turn

Alas, but Morison fell young!
 He never fell: thou fall'st, my tongue.
 45 He stood, a soldier to the last right end,
 A perfect patriot, and a noble friend;
 But most, a virtuous son.
 All offices were done
 By him so ample, full, and round,
 50 In weight, in measure, number, sound,
 As, though his age imperfect might appear,
 His life was of humanity the sphere.

The Stand

Go now, and tell out days summed up with fears,
 And make them years;
 55 Produce thy mass of miseries on the stage,
 To swell thine age;
 Repeat of things a throng,
 To show thou hast been long,
 Not lived; for life doth her great actions spell
 60 By what was done and wrought
 In season, and so brought
 To light: her measures are, how well
 Each syllabe answered, and was formed, how fair;
 These make the lines of life, and that's her air.

The Turn

65 It is not growing like a tree
 In bulk, doth make man better be;
 Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
 To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sere:
 A lily of a day
 70 Is fairer far, in May,
 Although it fall and die that night;
 It was the plant and flower of light.
 In small proportions we just beauty see,
 And in short measures life may perfect be.

The Counter-Turn

75 Call, noble Lucius, then for wine,
 And let thy looks with gladness shine;
 Accept this garland, plant it on thy head;
 And think, nay know, thy Morison's not dead.
 He leaped the present age,
 80 Possessed with holy rage
 To see that bright eternal day,
 Of which we priests and poets say
 Such truths as we expect for happy men;
 And there he lives with memory, and Ben

The Stand

85 Jonson, who sung this of him, ere he went Himself to rest,
 Or taste a part of that full joy he meant

To have expressed
 In this bright asterism;^o constellation
 90 Where it were friendship's schism
 (Were not his Lucius long with us to tarry)
 To separate these twi-
 Lights, the Dioscuri;¹
 And keep the one half from his Harry.
 95 But fate doth so alternate the design,
 Whilst that in heaven, this light on earth must shine.

The Turn

And shine as you exalted are;
 Two names of friendship, but one star:
 Of hearts the union. And those not by chance
 100 Made, or indentured, or leased out to advance
 The profits for a time.
 No pleasures vain did chime,
 Of rhymes, or riots, at your feasts,
 Orgies of drink, or feigned protests:
 105 But simple love of greatness, and of good;
 That knits brave minds and manners, more than blood.

The Counter-Turn

This made you first to know the why
 You liked; then after to apply
 That liking; and approach so one the t'other,
 110 Till either grew a portion of the other:
 Each styled, by his end,
 The copy of his friend.
 You lived to be the great surnames
 And titles by which all made claims
 115 Unto the virtue. Nothing perfect done
 But as a Cary, or a Morison.

The Stand

And such a force the fair example had,
 As they that saw
 The good and durst not practise it, were glad 120 That such a law
 Was left yet to mankind;
 Where they might read and find

¹ Dioscuri Castor and Pollux, twins set among the stars as the constellation Gemini.

Friendship in deed was written, not in words;
 And with the heart, not pen,
 125 Of two so early men
 Whose lines her rolls were, and records.
 Who, ere the first down bloomèd on the chin,
 Had sowed these fruits, and got the harvest in.

*Karolin's Song*²

Though I am young, and cannot tell
 Either what Death or Love is well,
 Yet I have heard they both bear darts,
 And both do aim at human hearts;
 5 And then again, I have been told,
 Love wounds with heat, as Death with cold;
 So that I fear they do but bring
 Extremes to touch, and mean one thing.

As in a ruin we it call
 10 One thing to be blown up, or fall;
 Or to our end, like way may have,
 By flash of lightning, or a wave:
 So Love's inflamèd shaft or brand,
 May kill as soon as Death's cold hand;
 15 Except Love's fires the virtue have
 To fright the frost out of the grave.
 —1640

*Hymn to Cynthia*³

Queen and huntress, chaste and fair,
 Now the sun is laid to sleep,
 Seated in thy silver chair,
 State in wonted manner keep:

² Karolin's Song From Jonson's final, unfinished play The Sad Shepherd (1640), 1.5; the speaker, Karolin, is a kind but naive shepherd.

³ Hymn to Cynthia From Jonson's play Cynthia's Revels (1601), 5.6. Cynthia is Diana, goddess of the moon, of chastity, and of hunting; in the literature of the English Renaissance generally, and in this poem, Diana is also a figure for Queen Elizabeth.

5 Hesperus¹ entreats thy light,
 Goddess excellently bright.

Earth, let not thy envious shade
 Dare itself to interpose;
 Cynthia's shining orb was made
 10 Heaven to clear, when day did close:
 Bless us then with wishèd sight,
 Goddess excellently bright.

Lay thy bow of pearl apart,
 And thy crystal-shining quiver;
 15 Give unto the flying hart^o
 Space to breathe, how short soever:
 Thou that mak'st a day of night,
 Goddess excellently bright.
 —1601

*Clerimont's Song*²

Still^o to be neat, still to be dressed, always
 As you^o were going to a feast; as if you
 Still to be powdered, still perfumed:
 Lady, it is to be presumed,
 5 Though Art's hid causes are not found,
 All is not sweet, all is not sound.

Give me a look, give me a face,
 That makes simplicity a grace;
 Robes loosely flowing, hair as free:
deer 10 Such sweet neglect more taketh me,
 Than all the adulteries of Art;
 They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.
 —1609

¹ Hesperus The planet Venus (when it appears after sunset); in the play, the song is sung by Hesperus.

² Clerimont's Song From Jonson's play Epicoene: or, The Silent Woman (1609), 1.1; in the play, the song is written by Clerimont, a young male gallant, about a woman named Lady Haughty.

JOHN DONNE

1572 – 1631

John Donne was an innovator: his work represented something new in poetry, and his contemporaries knew it. Donne set out to startle his readers with his disdain for convention, writing poems that challenged expectations about what was appropriate in poetic subject, form, tone, language, and imagery. He was not afraid of being difficult, or ambiguous, or contradictory from one poem to another: like the speaker of his “Holy Sonnet 19,” in Donne “contraries meet in one.” Some critics and readers try to smooth out these “contraries” by separating Donne’s works into the secular verse written by “Jack Donne” (Donne’s own phrase), the witty young man-about-London whose love poems combine erotic energy with high-minded argument; and the religious verse written later in life by Dr. John Donne, Dean of St. Paul’s Cathedral, the learned Anglican minister famous for his electrifying sermons. But this neat division is complicated by the fact that many of his poems are impossible to date. Donne wrote primarily for manuscript circulation: only a handful of his poems were printed before he died. Some religious poetry may therefore have been written earlier than once thought, and some love lyrics later. In any case, Donne frequently blurs any differences between the sacred and the secular, erotic love and divine love: he can present erotic love as a form of religious experience, and religious devotion as an erotic experience. Donne’s voice, moreover, ranges across a multitude of roles and postures, from misogynist cynicism and self-mocking sophistry to tender idealism and devout if still painfully self-conscious religious passion.

With his colloquial language, rough meter, sometimes swaggeringly masculine persona, and elaborately worked out philosophical (or wittily pseudo-philosophical) conceits, Donne’s poetry breaks with the late Elizabethan poets: even when expressing difficult or ambiguous thoughts, they tended to prefer lines of smooth and highly decorated elegance. Donne’s new manner caught the imagination of many poets, and his work was immensely influential for much of the seventeenth century. Times and tastes change, however, and what had been thought wit in 1600 by 1700 had come to seem mere fancy, unrestrained by judgment. In 1693, for example, John Dryden argued that Donne “affects the metaphysics ... where nature only should reign,” claiming that his love poetry “perplexes [women’s minds] ... with nice speculations of philosophy, when he should engage their hearts.” In the eighteenth century, Samuel Johnson labeled Donne and his followers “Metaphysical Poets” who “ransacked” nature to create startling and strained conceits. (Because of the objections of scholars who point out that the term is misleading, the long-popular term “metaphysical” is currently losing ground.) Thanks to further shifts in sensibility, and thanks also to the praise of T.S. Eliot, who found in Donne’s difficulty and intellectual dazzle a model for modernist poetic practice, Donne’s work moved again in the twentieth century to the center of the English poetic canon.

Born in London in 1572, Donne was the son of a prosperous ironmonger. The family was Catholic at a time when the government viewed all Catholics with suspicion and prosecuted those it thought seditious. Donne’s mother, Elizabeth, was related to Thomas More and was beheaded as a traitor for refusing to support Henry VIII’s rejection of the Pope’s authority. Two of her uncles lived in exile; another, a Jesuit, was incarcerated; and in 1593 Donne’s brother Henry died of a fever while imprisoned for harboring a priest. Thus, Donne well understood religious persecution, which is why some have speculated that his conversion to the Church of England, however sincere, must have felt at times like a betrayal. First educated by Jesuits, at age eleven Donne entered Oxford, and then studied at Cambridge. He took no degree, perhaps because graduation required accepting the Church of England's thirty-nine "articles of religion." In 1592 he began legal studies at Lincoln's Inn, and over the next few years wrote many of the love lyrics that were known at first to a few friends and then, especially in the next century, found a large readership. A set of five satires mocking English life, laws, and mores (including those of courtiers) also dates from these years; they helped intensify a fashion in the late 1590s for biting verse satire. The most powerful, "Satire III," explores with surprising candor, if no conclusion, the risks and dilemmas of choosing a version of Christianity to follow.

After taking part in the 1596 and 1597 anti-Spanish expeditions to Cadiz and the Azores, in 1598 Donne was appointed secretary to Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. By now his future seemed assured—he had distanced himself from the Roman Catholic Church and had served in Parliament. In 1601, however, he nearly wrecked his prospects by a secret marriage to Egerton's 17-year-old-niece, Ann More. When the marriage was discovered, Donne wrote to her father, Sir George More, begging that Ann not "feel the terror of your sudden anger," but Sir George disinherited his daughter and had Donne dismissed from his position and briefly imprisoned. Years of poverty and unemployment lay before the couple and their family (Ann eventually had twelve children, seven of whom survived). Donne found some support, however, from various friends and patrons, among them Sir Robert Drury, for whom he wrote two long "Anniversary" poems (1611–12) lamenting the death of Sir Robert's daughter, Elizabeth.

During this difficult period Donne finally renounced his Roman Catholicism and within a few years published two anti-Catholic tracts: Pseudo-Martyr (1610), which argues that Catholics should take the Oath of Allegiance to the crown, and the satirical Ignatius His Conclave (1611), which describes a meeting of Jesuits in Hell. King James was pleased but insisted that Donne be ordained before receiving an appointment. Donne complied and was shortly thereafter made a royal chaplain and a Reader in Divinity at Lincoln's Inn. He soon suffered a personal loss, however, when his wife died during childbirth at age 33, a sorrow to which Donne probably alludes in his seventeenth "Holy Sonnet," when he mentions that "she whom I loved hath paid her last debt." Most of his "Holy Sonnets," however (including "Death Be not Proud"), seem to have been written before his ordination and reflect earlier hopes and anguish. In 1621 Donne was appointed Dean of St. Paul's, and attracted large audiences for his intellectually challenging and emotionally stirring sermons, many of which were published, both during and after his life.

During a grave illness in the mid-1620s, Donne wrote his popular Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624), a series of prose meditations that include his famous assertion of human interconnectedness ("No man is an island"). Donne survived, but he never lost his fascination with death. He delivered his last sermon, "Death's Duel," early in 1631 before Charles I. His audience, it was later said, sensed that he was in effect preaching his own funeral sermon; he died that March. Donne is buried at St. Paul's Cathedral; his monument is modeled on a portrait of himself taken while he was still alive and dressed for the occasion in his shroud. His collected Poems were printed in 1633 and was reprinted several times before his reputation faded with the coming of the Restoration and a new generation's taste for neoclassical poetry.

from *Songs and Sonnets*¹

The Good-Morrow

I wonder by my troth, what thou, and I
 Did, till we loved? were we not weaned till then?
 But sucked on country pleasures, childishy?
 Or snorted we in the seven sleepers' den?²
 5 'Twas so; but^o this, all pleasures fancies be except for
 If ever any beauty I did see,
 Which I desired, and got, 'twas but a dream of thee.

And now good-morrow to our waking souls,
 Which watch not one another out of fear;
 10 For love, all love of other sights controls,
 And makes one little room, an every where.
 Let sea-discoverers to new worlds have gone,
 Let maps³ to others, worlds on worlds have shown,
 Let us possess one world,⁴ each hath one, and is one.

15 My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,
 And true plain hearts do in the faces rest,
 Where can we find two better hemispheres,
 Without sharp North, without declining West?
 What ever dies, was not mixed equally;⁵
 20 If our two loves be one, or, thou and I
 Love so alike that none do slacken, none can die.
 —1633⁶

² seven sleepers' den In early Christian legend, seven youths walled up in a cave during a persecution who slept for nearly 200 years.

³ maps Probably astronomical maps.

⁴ one world Many manuscript versions have "our world."

⁵ What ever ... equally Classical medical theory held that disease was the result of improper balance among the body's elements.

⁶ 1633 Much uncertainty and inconsistency surrounds the dates of composition and publication for Donne's work. We do not follow our usual format here of organizing the author's works chronologically by publication date; the texts are sorted instead by traditional categories.

Song ("Go, and catch a falling star")

Go, and catch a falling star,
 Get with child a mandrake root,⁷
 Tell me, where all past years are,
 Or who cleft the Devil's foot,
 5 Teach me to hear mermaids singing,
 Or to keep off envy's stinging,
 And find
 What wind
 Serves to advance an honest mind.
 10 If thou be'st born to strange sights,
 Things invisible to see,
 Ride ten thousand days and nights,
 Till age snow white hairs on thee,
 Thou, when thou return'st, wilt tell me
 15 All strange wonders that befell thee,
 And swear,
 No where
 Lives a woman true, and fair.
 If thou find'st one, let me know,
 20 Such a pilgrimage were sweet;
 Yet do not, I would not go,
 Though at next door we might meet;
 Though she were true, when you met her,
 And last, till you write your letter,
 25 Yet she
 Will be False, ere I come, to two, or three.
 —1633

Woman's Constancy

Now thou hast loved me one whole day,
 To-morrow when thou leavest, what wilt thou say?
 Wilt thou then antedate some new-made vow?
 Or, say that now
 5 We are not just those persons, which we were?
 Or, that oaths made in reverential fear
 Of Love, and his wrath, any may forswear?
 Or, as true deaths, true marriages untie,

⁷ mandrake root Plant whose forked root resembles a human body.

10 So lovers' contracts, images of those,
 Bind but till sleep, death's image, them unloose?
 Or, your own end to justify,
 For having purposed change, and falsehood, you
 Can have no way but falsehood to be true?
 Vain lunatic,¹ against these 'scapes I could 15 Dispute, and conquer, if I would;
 Which I abstain to do,
 For by to-morrow, I may think so too.
 —1633

The Sun Rising

Busy old fool, unruly Sun,
 Why dost thou thus,
 Through windows, and through curtains call on us?
 Must to thy motions lovers' seasons run?
 5 Saucy pedantic wretch, go chide
 Late schoolboys and sour prentices,
 Go tell court-huntsmen that the King will ride,
 Call country ants to harvest offices;
 Love, all alike, no season knows, nor clime,
 10 Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags of time.

 Thy beams, so reverend, and strong
 Why shouldst thou think?
 I could eclipse and cloud them with a wink,
 But that I would not lose her sight so long:
 15 If her eyes have not blinded thine,
 Look, and tomorrow late, tell me,
 Whether both the Indias of spice and mine²
 Be where thou leftst them, or lie here with me.
 Ask for those kings whom thou saw'st yesterday,
 20 And thou shalt hear, All here in one bed lay.

 She's all states, and all princes, I,
 Nothing else is.
 Princes do but play us; compared to this,
 All honor's mimic, all wealth alchemy.³

¹ lunatic Under the control of the moon, thus inconstant, subject to change.

² Indias of spice and mine The East Indies (source of spice and perfume) and West Indies (source of gold and precious metals).

³ alchemy Here, flashy rubbish.

25 Thou sun art half as happy as we,
 In that the world's contracted thus:
 Thine age asks ease, and since thy duties be
 To warm the world, that's done in warming us.
 Shine here to us, and thou art everywhere;
 30 This bed thy center is, these walls, thy sphere.
 —1633

The Canonization

For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love,
 Or chide my palsy, or my gout,
 My five gray hairs, or ruined fortune flout,
 With wealth your state, your mind with arts improve,
 5 Take you a course, get you a place,⁴
 Observe his honour, or his grace,⁵
 And the King's real, or his stamped face
 Contemplate;⁶ what you will, approve,⁷
 So you will let me love.

10 Alas, alas, who's injured by my love?
 What merchant's ships have my sighs drowned?
 Who says my tears have overflowed his ground?
 When did my colds a forward spring remove?
 When did the heats which my veins fill
 15 Add one more to the plaguy bill?⁸
 Soldiers find wars, and lawyers find out still Litigious men, which quarrels move,
 Though she and I do love.

Call us what you will, we are made such by love;
 20 Call her one, me another fly,⁹

⁴ course ... place Take a course of action; get yourself a position.

⁵ his honour ... his grace Cultivate contacts with political or religious dignitaries.

⁶ stamped face / Contemplate Look at the king's face stamped on coins: in effect, "go think about money."

⁷ what you will, approve Do whatever you want.

⁸ plaguy bill Weekly list of those who had died of the plague.

⁹ me another fly Call her a fly (butterfly or moth), and call me one too.

We're tapers too, and at our own cost die,¹
And we in us find the eagle and the dove.²

The phoenix riddle³ hath more wit
By us; we two being one, are it.

25 So, to one neutral thing both sexes fit,
We die and rise the same, and prove
Mysterious by this love.

We can die by it, if not live by love,
And if unfit for tombs and hearse

30 Our legend be, it will be fit for verse;
And if no piece of chronicle^o we prove, history
We'll build in sonnets^o pretty rooms;⁴ love poems
As well a well wrought urn becomes
The greatest ashes, as half-acre tombs,
35 And by these hymns, all shall approve
Us canonized for love.

And thus invoke us: You whom reverend love
Made one another's hermitage;

You, to whom love was peace, that now is rage;
40 Who did the whole world's soul contract,⁵ and drove

Into the glasses of your eyes
(So made such mirrors, and such spies,
That they did all to you epitomize)

Countries, towns, courts: beg from above
45 A pattern of your love.

—1633

¹ We're tapers ... die "To die" was slang for reaching orgasm, and each sexual act was popularly believed to shorten one's life by one day. The two lovers are compared to moths attracted to a candle, and to the self-consuming candle (taper) itself: moths, candle, and lovers all pay for doing what they do by their very nature.

² eagle and the dove Symbols of (masculine) strength and (feminine) gentleness, now united in the lovers.

³ phoenix riddle Only one mythical phoenix ever lived at a time; the bird mysteriously renewed itself by rising from the ashes of its own funeral pyre. The "riddle" of its unisex existence makes better sense (has "more wit") when compared with the two lovers: like the phoenix, they combine "both sexes" to make "one neutral thing" which dies, then rises the same (with the traditional play on the sexual resonances of dying and rising).

⁴ rooms In Italian, "stanza" means "room."

⁵ contract Manuscript versions have "extract."

Song ("Sweetest love, I do not go")

Sweetest love, I do not go
For weariness of thee,
Nor in hope the world can show
A fitter love for me;

5 But since that I
Must die at last, 'tis best
To use my self in jest
Thus by feigned deaths⁶ to die.

Yesternight the sun went hence,

10 And yet is here today,
He hath no desire nor sense,
Nor half so short a way:

Then fear not me,
But believe that I shall make 15 Speedier journeys, since I take
More wings and spurs than he.

O how feeble is man's power,
That if good fortune fall,
Cannot add another hour,

20 Nor a lost hour recall!
But come bad chance,
And we join to it our strength,
And we teach it art and length,
Itself o'er us to advance.

25 When thou sigh'st, thou sigh'st not wind,
But sigh'st my soul away,
When thou weep'st, unkindly kind,
My life's blood doth decay.

It cannot be
30 That thou lov'st me, as thou say'st,
If in thine my life thou waste,
Thou art the best of me.

Let not thy divining heart
Forethink me any ill,

35 Destiny may take thy part,
And may thy fears fulfil;
But think that we

⁶ feigned deaths Separations from the beloved.

Are but turned aside to sleep;
 They who one another keep 40 Alive, ne'er parted be.
 —1633

Air and Angels

Twice or thrice had I loved thee,
 Before I knew thy face or name;
 So in a voice, so in a shapeless flame,¹
 Angels affect us oft, and worshipped be;
 5 Still when, to where thou wert, I came,
 Some lovely glorious nothing I did see.
 But since my soul, whose child love is,
 Takes limbs of flesh, and else could nothing do,
 More subtle than the parent is 10 Love must not be, but take a body too;
 And therefore what thou wert, and who,
 I bid Love ask, and now
 That it assume thy body, I allow,
 And fix itself in thy lip, eye, and brow.
 15 Whilst thus to ballast love, I thought,
 And so more steadily to have gone,
 With wares which would sink admiration,
 I saw I had love's pinnace² overfraught;
 Ev'ry thy hair for love to work upon
 20 Is much too much, some fitter must be sought;
 For, nor in nothing, nor in things
 Extreme, and scatt'ring bright, can love inhere;
 Then as an angel, face and wings
 Of air, not pure as it, yet pure doth wear,
 25 So thy love may be my love's sphere;
 Just such disparity
 As is 'twixt air and angels' purity,
 'Twixt women's love, and men's will ever be.
 —1633

¹ shapeless flame Unsteady, or suddenly flaring, flame.

² pinnace Small, light ship, unsuited for carrying the figurative cargo of the beloved's many beauties.

*Break of Day*³

'Tis true, 'tis day; what though it be?
 O wilt thou therefore rise from me?
 Why should we rise because 'tis light?
 Did we lie down because 'twas night?
 5 Love, which in spite of darkness brought us hither,
 Should in despite of light keep us together.

Light hath no tongue, but is all eye;
 If it could speak as well as spy,
 This were the worst that it could say,
 10 That being well, I fain would stay,
 And that I loved my heart and honor so,
 That I would not from him, that had them, go.

Must business thee from hence remove?
 Oh that's the worst disease of love,
 15 The poor, the foul, the false, love can
 Admit, but not the busied man.
 He which hath business, and makes love, doth do
 Such wrong, as when a married man doth woo.
 —1612, 1633

The Anniversary

All kings, and all their favourites,
 All glory of honours, beauties, wits,
 The sun itself, which makes times, as they pass,
 Is elder by a year, now, than it was 5 When thou and I first one another saw:
 All other things to their destruction draw,
 Only our love hath no decay;
 This, no tomorrow hath, nor yesterday,
 Running it never runs from us away,
 10 But truly keeps his first, last, everlasting day.

Two graves must hide thine and my corse,^o corpse
 If one might, death were no divorce:
 Alas, as well as other princes, we (Who prince enough in one another be)

³ Break of Day First printed, with a musical setting, in William Corkine's Second Book of Aires (1612). The speaker is a woman.

15 Must leave at last in death, these eyes, and ears,
 Oft fed with true oaths, and with sweet salt tears;
 But souls where nothing dwells but love
 (All other thoughts being inmates) then shall prove
 This, or a love increased there above, 20 When bodies to their graves, souls from their graves remove.

And then we shall be thoroughly^o blest, thoroughly
 But we no more than all the rest,
 Here upon earth, we're kings, and none but we
 Can be such kings, nor of such subjects be;
 25 Who is so safe as we? where none can do
 Treason to us, except one of us two.

True and false fears let us refrain,
 Let us love nobly, and live, and add again
 Years and years unto years, till we attain 30 To write threescore: this is the second of our reign.
 —1633

*Twickenham Garden*¹

Blasted with sighs, and surrounded with tears,
 Hither I come to seek the spring,
 And at mine eyes, and at mine ears,
 Receive such balms, as else cure everything;
 5 But O, self traitor, I do bring
 The spider² love, which transubstantiates all,
 And can convert manna to gall,
 And that this place may thoroughly be thought
 True Paradise, I have the serpent³ brought.

10 'Twere wholesomer for me, that winter did
 Benight the glory of this place,
 And that a grave frost did forbid
 These trees to laugh and mock me to my face;

¹ Twickenham Garden Twickenham Park (pronounced, and often in the period spelled, Twicknam) was the home of Lucy, Countess of Bedford (1581–1627), a friend and patron of Donne and other writers, including Ben Jonson, Samuel Daniel, and Michael Drayton.

² spider Spiders were believed to transform everything they ate into poison.

³ serpent Emblem of envy, and of temptation.

But that I may not this disgrace
 15 Endure, nor leave this garden, Love, let me
 Some senseless piece of this place be;
 Make me a mandrake, so I may groan here,⁴
 Or a stone fountain weeping out my year.

Hither with crystal vials, lovers come,
 20 And take my tears, which are love's wine,
 And try^o your mistress' tears at home, test
 For all are false, that taste not just like mine;
 Alas, hearts do not in eyes shine,
 Nor can you more judge woman's thoughts by tears,
 25 Than by her shadow, what she wears.
 O perverse sex, where none is true but she,
 Who's therefore true, because her truth kills me.
 —1633

A Valediction: of Weeping

Let me pour forth
 My tears before thy face, whilst I stay here,
 For thy face coins them, and thy stamp they bear,
 And by this mintage they are something worth,
 5 For thus they be
 Pregnant of thee;
 Fruits of much grief they are, emblems of more,
 When a tear falls, that thou falls which it bore,
 So thou and I are nothing then, when on a diverse shore.

10 On a round ball⁵
 A workman that hath copies by, can lay
 An Europe, Afric, and an Asia,⁶
 And quickly make that, which was nothing, All,
 So doth each tear,
 15 Which thee doth wear,
 A globe, yea world by that impression grow,
 Till thy tears mixed with mine do overflow

⁴ mandrake ... groan here Plant whose forked root was thought to resemble the human body, and reputed to shriek or groan; the printed edition has "grow," but many manuscripts have "groan," which better parallels the weeping fountain in the next line.

⁵ round ball Blank globe, on which printed maps could be placed to make a world.

⁶ Asia Pronounced in the period as a three-syllable word.

This world, by waters sent from thee, my heaven dissolved so.

O more than Moon,
20 Draw not up seas to drown me in thy sphere,
Weep me not dead, in thine arms, but forbear
To teach the sea what it may do too soon;
Let not the wind
Example find,
25 To do me more harm than it purposeth;
Since thou and I sigh one another's breath,
Who e'r sighs most is cruellest, and hastes the other's death.¹

The Flea

Mark but this flea, and mark in this,
How little that which thou deny'st me is;
It sucked me first,² and now sucks thee,
And in this flea our two bloods mingled be;³
5 Thou know'st that⁴ this cannot be said
A sin, nor shame, nor loss of maidenhead,
Yet this enjoys before it woo,
And pampered swells with one blood made of two,
And this, alas, is more than we would do.
10 Oh stay, three lives in one flea spare,
Where we almost, nay more than married are:
This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed, and marriage temple is;
Though parents grudge, and you, we're met
15 And cloistered in these living walls of jet.^o black stone
Though use^o make you apt to kill me, habit
Let not to that, self murder added be,
And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.

Cruel and sudden, hast thou since
20 Purpled thy nail in blood of innocence?

¹ Who e'r sighs ... death According to folklore, sighing shortened life (each sigh was said to cost one drop of blood).

² It sucked me first "Me it sucked first" in many manuscripts.

³ mingled be The speaker's subsequent argument hinges on the traditional belief that blood mixed during sexual intercourse.

⁴ Thou know'st that "Confess it" in many manuscripts.

Wherein could this flea guilty be,
Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
Yet thou triumph'st, and say'st that thou
Find'st not thy self, nor me the weaker now;
25 'Tis true, then learn how false, fears be;
Just so much honor, when thou yield'st to me,
Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

*A Nocturnal upon St. Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day*⁵

'T is the year's midnight, and it is the day's,
Lucy's, who scarce seven hours herself unmask;
The sun is spent, and now his flasks^o the stars
Send forth light squibs, no constant rays;
5 The world's whole sap is sunk:
The general balm⁶ the hydropic^o earth hath drunk, thirsty
Whither, as to the bed's-feet, life is shrunk,
Dead and interred; yet all these seem to laugh,
Compared with me, who am their epitaph.
10 Study me then, you who shall lovers be
At the next world, that is, at the next spring:
For I am every dead thing,
In whom Love wrought new alchemy.
For his art did express^o extract
15 A quintessence even from nothingness,
From dull privations, and lean emptiness;
He ruined me, and I am re-begot
Of absence, darkness, death; things which are not.
All others, from all things, draw all that's good,
20 Life, soul, form, spirit, whence they being have;
I, by love's limbeck,⁷ am the grave
Of all that's nothing. Oft a flood
Have we two wept, and so
Drowned the whole world, us two; oft did we grow
25 To be two chaoses, when we did show

⁵ St Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day 13 December, the shortest day of the year in the old Julian calendar.

⁶ general balm The innate, vital sap believed to preserve all things.

⁷ limbeck Retort, or still (apparatus for distillation).

Care to aught else; and often absences
Withdrew our souls, and made us carcasses.

But I am by her death (which word wrongs her)
Of the first nothing the elixir grown;

30 Were I a man, that I were one
 I needs must know; I should prefer,
 If I were any beast,

Some ends, some means; yea plants, yea stones detest,
And love; all, all some properties invest;
35 If I an ordinary nothing were,
As shadow, a light and body must be here.

But I am none; nor will my sun renew.
You lovers, for whose sake the lesser sun

At this time to the Goat¹ is run
40 To fetch new lust, and give it you,
 Enjoy your summer all;
Since she enjoys her long night's festival,
Let me prepare towards her, and let me call
This hour her vigil, and her eve, since this 45 Both the year's, and the day's deep midnight is.

The Bait

Come live with me, and be my love,
And we will some new pleasures prove
Of golden sands, and crystal brooks,
With silken lines, and silver hooks.

5 There will the river whispering run
Warmed by thy eyes, more than the sun.
And there the enamoured fish will stay,
Begging themselves they may betray.

When thou wilt swim in that live bath,
10 Each fish, which every channel hath,
Will amorously to thee swim,
Gladder to catch thee, than thou him.

If thou, to be so seen, be'st loth,
By sun or moon, thou dark'nest both,

¹ Goat The constellation Capricorn, into whose sign the sun enters at the winter solstice; goats were associated with lust.

15 And if myself have leave to see,
I need not their light, having thee.

Let others freeze with angling reeds,
And cut their legs with shells and weeds,
Or treacherously poor fish beset,
20 With strangling snare, or windowy net.

Let coarse bold hands, from slimy nest
The bedded fish in banks out-wrest,
Or curious traitors, sleeve-silk² flies,
Bewitch poor fishes' wand'ring eyes.

25 For thee, thou need'st no such deceit,
For thou thyself art thine own bait;
That fish, that is not caught thereby,
Alas, is wiser far than I.
—1633

The Apparition

When by thy scorn, O murd'ress, I am dead,
And that thou thinkst thee free
From all solicitation from me,
Then shall my ghost come to thy bed,
5 And thee, feigned vestal,³ in worse arms shall see;
Then thy sick taper will begin to wink,
And he, whose thou art then, being tired before,
Will, if thou stir, or pinch to wake him, think
 Thou call'st for more,
10 And in false sleep will from thee shrink,
And then, poor aspen^o wretch, neglected thou trembling
Bathed in a cold quicksilver sweat⁴ wilt lie,
 A verier ghost than I;
What I will say, I will not tell thee now,
15 Lest that preserve thee; and since my love is spent,

² sleeve-silk Silk in the form of fine filaments.

³ feigned vestal Pretended virgin. The original has "fained," the common variant spelling in the period; many editions retain "fained" (eager, glad).

⁴ quicksilver sweat Shiny coating of sweat; from quicksilvering, the application of a thin coat of an alloy using mercury (quicksilver). That mercury was also used to relieve the symptoms of syphilis adds to Donne's insult.

I'd rather thou shouldst painfully repent,
 Than by my threatnings rest still innocent.
 —1633

A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning

As virtuous men pass mildly away,
 And whisper to their souls to go,
 Whilst some of their sad friends do say,
 The breath goes now, and some say, no:

5 So let us melt, and make no noise,
 No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move,
 'Twere profanation of our joys,
 To tell the laity our love.

Moving of the earth^o brings harms and fears, earthquakes
 10 Men reckon what it did and meant,
 But trepidation of the spheres,¹
 Though greater far, is innocent.

Dull sublunary² lovers' love
 (Whose soul is sense) cannot admit
 15 Absence, because it doth remove
 Those things which elemented it.

But we by a love, so much refined
 That our selves know not what it is,
 Inter-assured of the mind,
 20 Care less, eyes, lips, and hands to miss.

Our two souls therefore, which are one,
 Though I must go, endure not yet
 A breach, but an expansion,
 Like gold to airy thinness beat.

25 If they be two, they are two so
 As stiff twin compasses³ are two:

¹ trepidation of the spheres The precession of the equinox, thought to be caused by movements in the celestial spheres.

² sublunary Beneath the moon, hence corruptible and subject to change (because subject to the consequences of the Fall from Paradise).

³ twin compasses Single drawing compass (with twin "feet").

Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
 To move, but doth, if the other do.

And though it in the center sit,
 30 Yet when the other far doth roam,
 It leans, and hearkens after it,
 And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must
 Like the other foot, obliquely run;
 35 Thy firmness makes my circle just,
 And makes me end, where I begun.
 —1633

The Ecstasy

Where, like a pillow on a bed,
 A pregnant bank swelled up, to rest
 The violet's reclining head,
 Sat we two, one another's best.
 5 Our hands were firmly cemented
 With a fast balm, which thence did spring;
 Our eye-beams twisted, and did thread
 Our eyes upon one double string.
 So to engraft our hands, as yet
 10 Was all our means to make us one,
 And pictures in our eyes to get^o beget
 Was all our propagation.
 As 'twixt two equal armies, Fate
 Suspends uncertain victory,
 15 Our souls (which to advance their state,
 Were gone out) hung 'twixt her and me.
 And whilst our souls negotiate there,
 We like sepulchral statues lay;
 All day, the same our postures were,
 20 And we said nothing, all the day.
 If any, so by love refined,
 That he soul's language understood,
 And by good love were grown all mind,
 Within convenient distance stood,
 25 He (though he knew not which soul spake,
 Because both meant, both spake the same)
 Might thence a new concoction take,⁴

⁴ new concoction take Be even further refined.

And part far purer than he came.
 This ecstasy doth unperplex
 30 (We said) and tell us what we love;
 We see by this, it was not sex;
 We see, we saw not what did move:
 But as all several souls contain
 Mixture of things, they know not what,
 35 Love, these mixed souls doth mix again,
 And makes both one, each this, and that.
 A single violet transplant,
 The strength, the colour, and the size
 (All which before was poor and scant)
 40 Redoubles still, and multiplies.
 When love with one another so
 Interinanimates two souls,
 That abler soul, which thence doth flow,
 Defects of loneliness controls.
 45 We then, who are this new soul, know
 Of what we are composed, and made,
 For the atomies of which we grow
 Are souls, whom no change can invade.
 But O alas, so long, so far
 50 Our bodies why do we forbear?
 They're ours, though they're not we, we are
 The intelligences, they the sphere.
 We owe them thanks, because they thus
 Did us, to us, at first convey,
 55 Yielded their forces, sense, to us,
 Nor are dross to us, but alloy.^o
 On man heaven's influence works not so,
 But that it first imprints the air;
 So soul into the soul may flow,
 60 Though it to body first repair.
 As our blood labours to beget
 Spirits, as like souls as it can,
 Because such fingers need to knit
 That subtle knot, which makes us man:
 65 So must pure lovers' souls descend
 To affections, and to faculties,
 Which sense may reach and apprehend,
 Else a great prince in prison lies.
 To our bodies turn we then, that so
 70 Weak men on love revealed may look;
 Love's mysteries in souls do grow,
 But yet the body is his book.
 And if some lover, such as we,

Have heard this dialogue of one,
 75 Let him still mark us, he shall see
 Small change when we're to bodies gone.
 —1633

The Relic

When my grave is broke up again
 Some second guest to entertain
 (For graves have learned that woman-head¹
 To be to more than one a bed)
 5 And he that digs it, spies
 A bracelet of bright^o hair about the bone, fair
 Will he not let us alone,
 And think that there a loving couple lies,
 Who thought that this device might be some way
 10 To make their souls, at the last busy day,
 Meet at this grave, and make a little stay?

 If this fall in a time, or land,
 Where mis-devotion doth command,²
 Then he that digs us up will bring 15 Us to the Bishop, and the King,
 To make us relics; then
 Thou shalt be a Mary Magdalen, and I
 A something else thereby;
 All women shall adore us, and some men;
 20 And since at such times miracles are sought,
 I would have that age by this paper taught
 What miracles we harmless lovers wrought.

alloy

First, we loved well and faithfully,
 Yet knew not what we loved, nor why,
 25 Difference of sex no more we knew,
 Than our guardian angels do;
 Coming and going, we
 Perchance might kiss, but not between those meals;
 Our hands ne'er touched the seals,
 30 Which nature, injured by late law,³ sets free:
 These miracles we did; but now, alas,

¹ woman-head Womanishness (a play on "maidenhead").

² If this fall ... command That is, in a time or place where people prayed to saints and venerated relics: in effect, were Roman Catholic.

³ late law Human law, which came after the original "law" of nature.

All measure, and all language, I should pass,
Should I tell what a miracle she was.

from Elegies

*Elegy 1. Jealousy*¹

Fond^o woman, which wouldst have thy foolish
husband die,
And yet complain'st of his great jealousy.
If swollen with poison, he lay in his last bed,
His body with a sere-bark^o covered, dry crust
5 Drawing his breath as thick and short as can
The nimblest crocheting² musician,
Ready with loathsome vomiting to spew
His soul out of one hell into a new,
Made deaf with his poor kindred's howling cries,
10 Begging with few feigned tears great legacies,
Thou wouldst not weep, but jolly and frolic be,
As a slave which to-morrow should be free.
Yet weep'st thou when thou seest him hungerly
Swallow his own death, heart's-bane jealousy.
15 Oh give him many thanks, he's courteous,
That in suspecting kindly warneth us.
We must not, as we used, flout openly
In scoffing riddles his deformity;
Nor at his board, together being sat,
20 With words, nor touch, scarce looks, adulterate.
Nor when he, swol'n and pampered with great fare,
Sits down and snorts, caged in his basket chair,
Must we usurp his own bed any more,
Nor kiss and play in his house, as before.
25 Now I see many dangers; for that is
His realm, his castle, and his diocese.
But if, as envious men which would revile
Their prince, or coin his gold, themselves exile
Into another country, and do it there,
30 We play in another house, what should we fear?
There we will scorn his household policies,
His silly plots and pensionary spies,^o servants

As the inhabitants of Thames' right side³
Do London's mayor, or Germans, the Pope's pride.⁴
—1633

*Elegy 8. The Comparison*⁵

As the sweet sweat of roses in a still,
As that which from chafed musk cat's pores
doth trill,^o flow
As the almighty balm^o of the early East, morning dew
Such are the sweat drops of my mistress' breast,
5 And on her neck her skin such lustre sets,
They seem no sweat drops, but pearl carcanets.^o necklaces
Rank sweaty froth thy mistress' brow defiles,
Like spermatic issue of ripe menstruous boils,
Or like that scum, which, by need's lawless law
10 Enforced, Sanserra's starved men did draw
From parboiled shoes, and boots, and all the rest
Which were with any sovereign fatness blest,⁶
And like vile lying stones in saffroned tin,⁷
Or warts, or weals, they hang upon her skin.
15 Round as the world's her head, on every side,
Like to that fatal ball which fell on Ide,⁸
Or that whereof God had such jealousy,
As, for the ravishing thereof we die.⁹

³ Thames' right side Southwark, where the theaters were, was outside the jurisdiction of London authorities.

⁴ Pope's pride Germany was the birthplace of the Reformation, which challenged the authority of the Pope.

⁵ Elegy 8. The Comparison Numbered "Elegy 2" in some modern editions.

⁶ From parboiled shoes ... fatness blest The King's Catholic army laid siege to the Protestants of Sancerre, France, for nine months in 1573; the town's inhabitants were reduced to eating anything made out of leather.

⁷ lying stones in saffroned tin Artificial jewels set in false gold (gilded tin).

⁹ ravishing ... we die The forbidden fruit of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil in Eden.

¹ Elegy 1. Jealousy Numbered "Elegy 4" in some modern editions.

² crocheting Crotchets are grace notes; in effect, "quick-fingered."

Thy head¹ is like a rough-hewn statue of jet,^o black stone
 20 Where marks for eyes, nose, mouth, are yet scarce set;
 Like the first Chaos, or flat seeming face
 Of Cynthia,^o where the earth's shadows her the moon embrace.

Like Proserpine's white beauty-keeping chest,²
 Or Jove's best fortune's urn,³ is her fair breast.
 25 Thine's like worm eaten trunks, clothed in seal's skin,
 Or grave, that's dirt without, and stink within.
 And like that slender stalk, at whose end stands
 The woodbine quivering, are her arms and hands,
 Like rough-barked elmboughs, or the russet skin
 30 Of men late scourged for madness, or for sin,
 Like sun-parched quarters on the city gate,⁴
 Such is thy tanned skin's lamentable state.
 And like a bunch of ragged carrots stand
 The short swoll'n fingers of thy gouty hand.
 35 Then like the chemic's masculine equal^o fire, evenly heating
 Which in the limbeck's⁵ warm womb doth inspire
 Into the earth's worthless dirt a soul of gold,
 Such cherishing heat her best loved part doth hold.
 Thine's like the dread mouth of a fired gun,
 40 Or like hot liquid metals newly run
 Into clay moulds, or like to that Aetna⁶
 Where round about the grass is burnt away.
 Are not your kisses then as filthy, and more,
 As a worm sucking an envenomed sore?
 45 Doth not thy fearful hand in feeling quake,
 As one which gath'ring flowers, still fears a snake?
 Is not your last act harsh, and violent,
 As when a plough a stony ground doth rent?
 So kiss good turtles,^o so devoutly nice turtledoves

¹ Thy head That is, the head of thy mistress, as opposed to "her head" (the speaker's mistress) of line 15. The poem proceeds to contrast the qualities of the speaker's "her" with those of "thy" or "thine" mistress.

² beauty-keeping chest In classical story, Psyche was required to travel to the underworld and ask Prosperina (Persephone) to place in a box a gift of beauty for Venus.

³ Jove's best fortune's urn From Homer, Iliad: Zeus (Jove) kept two urns in his palace, one filled with good gifts, the other with evil ones.

⁴ Like sun-parched ... city gate The dessicated body parts of "quartered" criminals, impaled as warning to would-be offenders on city gates.

⁵ limbeck Alchemical still or retort.

⁶ Aetna Volcano in Sicily.

50 Are priests in handling reverent sacrifice,
 And such in searching wounds the surgeon is
 As we, when we embrace, or touch, or kiss.
 Leave her, and I will leave comparing thus,
 She, and comparisons are odious.
 —1633

Elegy 19. To His Mistress Going to Bed⁷

Come Madam, come, all rest my powers defy,
 Until I labour, I in labour lie.
 The foe oft-times, having the foe in sight,
 Is tired with standing though they never fight.
 5 Off with that girdle, like heaven's zone glistening,
 But a far fairer world encompassing.
 Unpin that spangled breastplate,⁸ which you wear
 That the eyes of busy fools may be stopped there.
 Unlace your self: for that harmonious chime⁹
 10 Tells me from you that now 'tis your bed time.
 Off with that happy busk,^o which I envy, corset
 That still can be, and still can stand so nigh.
 Your gown's going off, such beauteous state reveals,
 As when from flow'r'y meads the hill's shadow steals.
 15 Off with that wiry coronet and show
 The hairy diadem which on you doth grow.
 Now off with those shoes, and then softly tread
 In this love's hallowed temple, this soft bed.
 In such white robes, Heaven's angels used to be 20 Received by men: thou, angel, bringst with thee
 A heaven like Mahomet's Paradise,¹⁰ and though
 Ill spirits walk in white, we easily know
 By this these angels from an evil sprite:
 Those set our hairs, but these our flesh upright.
 25 Licence my roving hands, and let them go,

⁷ Elegy 19. To His Mistress Going to Bed Censoring authorities refused to let the publisher include this elegy in early collections of Donne's poems; it was first printed in an anthology, The Harmony of the Muses (1654), and did not appear in an edition of Donne's poems until 1669. It is numbered "Elegy 8" in some modern editions.

⁸ spangled breastplate The stomacher; it covered the chest and was often richly ornamented.

⁹ chime The lady wears a chiming watch.

¹⁰ Mahomet's Paradise Heaven of erotic bliss. The sensual aspects of the Islamic version of Paradise are described in the Koran sura 55, 54–56, sura 56, 12–40, and sura 76, 12–22.

Behind, before, above, between, below.¹

Oh my America, my newfound land,

My kingdom, safest when with one man manned,

My mine of precious stones: my empery,^o empire

30 How blest am I in this discovering thee!

To enter in these bonds, is to be free;

Then where my hand is set, my seal shall be.

Full nakedness, all joys are due to thee;

As souls unbodied, bodies unclothed must be

35 To taste whole joys. Gems which you women use

Are like Atlanta's balls,² cast in men's views,

That when a fool's eye lighteth on a gem,

His earthly soul may covet theirs, not them.

Like pictures, or like books' gay coverings, made

40 For lay-men,³ are all women thus arrayed;

Themselves are mystic books, which only we

(Whom their imputed grace⁴ will dignify)

Must see revealed. Then since I may know,

As liberally as to a midwife show

45 Thyself: cast all, yea, this white linen hence,

There is no penance, much less innocence.⁵

To teach thee, I am naked first; why then

What needst thou have more covering than a man.

¹ Behind, before ... below The order of the words in this line varies in the manuscripts and printed editions.

² Atlanta's balls In classical legend, Atalanta said she would only marry a man who could defeat her in footrace. Her suitor Hippomenes won the challenge by dropping three golden balls as he ran; Atalanta stopped to pick them up. The speaker here reverses the story's gender dynamic.

³ lay-men Referring to the traditional use of images to instruct non-clerics ("lay-men") who could not read the Bible itself; and to the ornate bindings commissioned by wealthy owners to cover books they probably would never read. The speaker proceeds to argue that women are like these kinds of pictures or books: externally beautiful, but only a favored few may "read" what lies inside.

⁴ imputed grace Theological term associated with Protestantism: the justifying grace ascribed to a person through Christ's righteousness.

⁵ this white ... innocence The color white is associated with both penitence and innocence. In some manuscripts and in the 1654 and 1669 printed editions, this line reads "There is no penance due to innocence," a more theologically conventional reading. Some manuscripts read "Here is no penance, much less innocence."

from Satires

Satire 3

Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids
Those tears to issue which swell my eye-lids;
I must not laugh, nor weep sins, and be wise,
Can railing then cure these worn maladies?
5 Is not our mistress, fair Religion,
As worthy of all our soul's devotion,
As virtue was to the first blinded age?
Are not heaven's joys as valiant to assuage
Lusts, as earth's honour was to them?⁶ Alas,
10 As we do them in means, shall they surpass
Us in the end, and shall thy father's spirit
Meet blind philosophers in heaven, whose merit
Of strict life may be imputed faith,⁷ and hear
Thee, whom he taught so easy ways and near 15 To follow, damned? Oh if thou dar'st, fear this;
This fear great courage, and high valour is.
Dar'st thou aid mutinous Dutch,⁸ and dar'st thou lay
Thee in ships, wooden sepulchers, a prey
To leaders' rage, to storms, to shot, to dearth?
20 Dar'st thou dive seas, and dungeons of the earth?
Hast thou courageous fire to thaw the ice
Of frozen North discoveries? and thrice
Colder than salamanders,⁹ like divine
Children in the oven,¹⁰ fires of Spain, and the line,¹¹
25 Whose countries' limbecks to our bodies be,¹²

⁶ them The virtuous ancients who lived in the "blinded age" before the Christian revelation; their motive for virtue was earthly fame.

⁷ imputed faith The speaker daringly uses a key term from Protestant theology to suggest that ancient philosophers might be "saved" as a result of their own merits, which might constitute an "imputed faith."

⁸ mutinous Dutch The (Protestant) Dutch had been in revolt against their (Catholic) Spanish occupiers since 1568.

⁹ salamanders Reputed to be so naturally cold that they could extinguish fires by contact.

¹⁰ Children in the oven Children who survived in the fiery furnace into which Nebuchadnezzar cast them. See Daniel 3.11–30.

¹¹ fires of Spain, and the line The tropical heat of the Spanish Main and the equatorial line; possibly also a reference to the "fires" of the Spanish inquisition.

¹² limbecks to our bodies be Because they make our bodies sweat: a limbeck is an alchemical still.

Canst thou for gain bear? and must every he
Which cries not "Goddess" to thy Mistress, draw,
Or eat thy poisonous words? courage of straw!
Oh desperate coward, wilt thou seem bold, and 30 To thy foes and his (who made thee to stand Sentinel in his world's garrison) thus yield,
And for forbidden wars, leave the appointed field?
Know thy foes: the foul devil, whom thou
Striv'st to please, for hate, not love, would allow 35 Thee fain his whole realm to be quit; and as
The world's all parts wither away and pass,
So the world's self, thy other loved foe, is
In her decrepit wane, and thou loving this,
Dost love a withered and worn strumpet; last,
40 Flesh (itself's death) and joys which flesh can taste,
Thou lovest; and thy fair goodly soul, which doth
Give this flesh power to taste joy, thou dost loathe.
Seek true religion. Oh where? Mirreus¹
Thinking her unhoused here, and fled from us,
45 Seeks her at Rome;² there, because he doth know
That she was there a thousand years ago;
He loves her rags so, as we here obey
The statecloth³ where the Prince sat yesterday.
Crants to such brave loves will not be enthralled,
50 But loves her only, who at Geneva is called Religion,⁴ plain, simple, sullen, young,
Contemptuous, yet unhandsome: as among
Lecherous humors, there is one that judges
No wenches wholesome, but coarse country drudges.
55 Graius stays still at home here,⁵ and because
Some preachers, vile ambitious bauds, and laws
Still new like fashions, bid him think that she
Which dwells with us, is only perfect, he Embraceth her whom his godfathers will 60 Tender to him, being tender, as wards still

¹ Mirreus Some of the proper names the poem assigns to characters who hold various opinions (Mirreus, Graius, Graccus, Phrygius) have classical resonances; "Crants" (l. 49) sounds vaguely Dutch or German; but none appears to hold any particular significance.

² Seeks her at Rome Mirreus finds "true religion" in Catholicism.

³ statecloth The canopy over the throne, or chair of state, respected as an emblem of the monarch's power.

⁴ But loves ... called / Religion "Crants" seeks "true religion" in the austere Protestantism of Genevan Calvinism.

⁵ Graius stays still at home here "Graius" settles for the Church of England, but does so only because those around him do likewise.

Take such wives as their guardians offer, or Pay values.⁶ Careless Phrygius doth abhor
All, because all cannot be good, as one
Knowing some women whores, dares marry none.
65 Graccus loves all as one, and thinks that so
As women do in diverse countries go
In diverse habits, yet are still one kind,
So doth, so is Religion; and this blindness too much light breeds; but unmoved thou 70 Of force must one, and forced but one allow;
And the right; ask thy father which is she,
Let him ask his; though truth and falsehood be Near twins, yet truth a little elder is;
Be busy to seek her, believe me this,
75 He's not of none, nor worst, that seeks the best.
To adore, or scorn an image, or protest,
May all be bad; doubt wisely; in strange way
To stand inquiring right, is not to stray;
To sleep, or run wrong, is. On a huge hill,
80 Cragged and steep, Truth stands, and he that will Reach her, about must, and about must go;
And what the hill's suddenness resists, win so;
Yet strive so, that before age, death's twilight,
Thy soul rest, for none can work in that night.
85 To will implies delay, therefore now do.
Hard deeds, the body's pains; hard knowledge too
The mind's endeavours reach, and mysteries
Are like the sun, dazzling, yet plain to all eyes.
Keep the truth which thou hast found; men do not stand
90 In so ill case here, that God hath with his hand
Signed kings blank-charters⁷ to kill whom they hate,
Nor are they vicars, but hangmen to fate.
Fool and wretch, wilt thou let thy soul be tied
To man's laws, by which she shall not be tried
95 At the last day? Will it then boot thee
To say a Philip, or a Gregory,
A Harry, or a Martin taught thee this?⁸

⁶ Pay values A ward who refused a marriage arranged by his or her guardian had to pay the guardian a compensatory fine.

⁸ a Philip ... thee this Respectively, King Philip II of Spain, Pope Gregory (either XIII or XIV), King Henry VIII, and Martin Luther: the group balances two Roman Catholic leaders against two Reformation leaders.

Is not this excuse for mere contraries
 Equally strong? Cannot both sides say so?
 100 That thou mayest rightly obey power, her bounds know;
 Those passed, her nature and name is changed; to be
 Then humble to her is idolatry;
 As streams are, Power is; those blest flowers that dwell
 At the rough stream's calm head, thrive and do well,
 105 But having left their roots, and themselves given
 To the stream's tyrannous rage, alas are driven
 Through mills, and rocks, and woods, and at last, almost Consumed in going, in the sea are lost:
 So perish souls, which more choose men's unjust
 110 Power from God claimed, than God himself to trust.

*To Sir Henry Wotton*¹

Sir, more than kisses, letters mingle souls;
 For thus, friends absent speak. This ease controls
 The tediousness of my life: but for these
 I could ideate nothing which could please,
 5 But I should wither in one day, and pass
 To a bottle^o of hay, that am a lock of grass. bundle
 Life is a voyage, and in our life's ways
 Countries, courts, towns are rocks, or remoras;²
 They break or stop all ships, yet our state's such,
 10 That though than pitch they stain worse, we must touch.
 If in the furnace of the even line,^o the equator
 Or under the adverse icy pole thou pine,
 Thou know'st two temperate regions, girded in,
 Dwell there: But Oh, what refuge canst thou win
 15 Parched in the court, and in the country frozen?
 Shall cities, built of both extremes, be chosen?
 Can dung or garlic be a perfume? Or can
 A scorpion and torpedo³ cure a man?

¹ To Sir Henry Wotton Administrator, diplomat, poet, and writer, Sir Henry Wotton (1568–1639) met Donne at Oxford and was a close friend. This poem appears to have been written in the late 1590s, when both men were looking to win positions at court.

² remoras Parasitical fish that could attach themselves to the bottom of ships and were thought to slow them down.

³ torpedo Also known as the numbfish or crampfish; the electric ray.

Cities are worst of all three; of all three 20 (O knotty riddle) each is worst equally.
 Cities are sepulchres; they who dwell there
 Are carcasses, as if no such there were.
 And courts are theatres, where some men play
 Princes, some slaves, all to one end, and of one day.
 25 The country is a desert, where no good,
 Gained (as habits, not born), is understood.
 There men become beasts, and prone to more evils;
 In cities blocks, and in a lewd court, devils.
 As in the first chaos, confusedly,
 30 Each element's qualities were in the other three,
 So pride, lust, covetise,^o being several covetousness
 To these three places, yet all are in all,
 And mingled thus, their issue is incestuous.
 Falsehood is denizened.⁴ Virtue is barbarous.
 35 Let no man say there, "Virtue's flinty wall Shall lock vice in me, I'll do none, but know all."
 Men are sponges, which to pour out, receive,
 Who know false play, rather than lose, deceive.
 For in best understandings sin began,
 40 Angels sinned first, then devils, and then man.
 Only perchance beasts sin not; wretched we
 Are beasts in all, but white integrity.
 I think if men, which in these place live,
 Durst look in themselves, and themselves retrieve,
 45 They would like strangers greet themselves, seeing then
 Utopian youth, grown old Italian.⁵
 Be then thine own home, and in thyself dwell;
 Inn anywhere; continuance maketh hell.
 And seeing the snail, which everywhere doth roam,
 50 Carrying his own house still, still is at home,
 Follow (for he is easy paced) this snail,
 Be thine own palace, or the world's thy jail.
 And in the world's sea, do not like cork sleep
 Upon the water's face; nor in the deep 55 Sink like a lead without a line; but as Fishes glide, leaving no print where they pass,
 Nor making sound, so closely thy course go,
 Let men dispute, whether thou breathe, or no.

⁴ denizined Naturalized (as in a "naturalized citizen").

⁵ Utopian youth ... Italian That is, an ideal youth turned old and depraved (from proverbial expressions concerning Italianate Englishmen, and Machiavelli).

Only in this be no Galenist:¹ to make 60 Courts' hot ambitions wholesome, do not take
 A dram of country's dullness; do not add
 Correctives, but, as chemics, purge the bad.
 But, sir, I advise not you, I rather do
 Say o'er those lessons, which I learned of you:
 65 Whom, free from German schisms, and lightness
 Of France, and fair Italy's faithlessness,
 Having from these sucked all they had of worth,
 And brought home that faith which you carried forth,
 I throughly^o love; but if myself I've won thoroughly
 70 To know my rules, I have, and you have

An Anatomy of the World

Wherein, by occasion of the untimely death of mistress Elizabeth Drury,² the frailty and the decay of this whole world is represented.

THE FIRST ANNIVERSARY

When that rich soul which to her heaven is gone,
 Whom all they celebrate, who know they have one,
 (For who is sure he hath a soul, unless
 It see, and judge, and follow worthiness,
 5 And by deeds praise it? he who doth not this,
 May lodge an inmate soul, but 'tis not his.)
 When that Queen ended here her progress time,³
 And, as t' her standing house, to heaven did climb,
 Where, loth to make the saints attend her long,
 10 She's now a part both of the choir, and song,
 This world, in that great earthquake languished;

¹ Galenist Follower of the ancient Roman doctor Galen, who believed that illness was a result of imbalance among the body's four "humors" and who cured an imbalance of one quality with a dose of its opposite.

² Elizabeth Drury The daughter of Sir Robert Drury; she died in December 1610, aged 14. Donne had never met her, but his sister Anne knew the family and possibly encouraged Donne to write the poem in hopes (ultimately successful) of patronage. A year later, Donne wrote a second poem to commemorate Elizabeth, The Second Anniversary. They are two of the few poems Donne published in his lifetime.

³ progress time Monarch's ceremonial journey through the kingdom.

For in a common bath of tears it bled,
 Which drew the strongest vital spirits out:
 But succoured then with a perplexed doubt,
 15 Whether the world did lose or gain in this,
 (Because since now no other way there is
 But goodness, to see her, whom all would see,
 All must endeavour to be good as she,)
 This great consumption to a fever turned,
 20 And so the world had fits; it joyed, it mourned;
 And, as men think, that agues physic are,
 And th' ague being spent, give over care,
 So thou, sick world, mistak'st thyself to be
 Well, when alas, thou'rt in a lethargy.
 25 Her death did wound and tame thee then, and then
 Thou mightst have better spared the sun, or man.
 That wound was deep, but 'tis more misery,
 That thou hast lost thy sense and memory.
 'Twas heavy then to hear thy voice of moan,
 30 But this is worse, that thou art speechless grown.
 Thou has forgot thy name thou hadst; thou wast
 Nothing but she, and her thou hast o'erpast.
 For as a child kept from the font,⁴ until
 A prince, expected long, come to fulfil
 35 The ceremonies, thou unnamed hadst laid,
 Had not her coming, thee her palace made:
 Her name defined thee, gave thee form, and frame,
 And thou forget'st to celebrate thy name.
 Some months she hath been dead (but being dead,
 40 Measures of times are all determined)
 But long she hath been away, long, long, yet none
 Offers to tell us who it is that's gone.
 But as in states doubtful of future heirs,
 When sickness without remedy impairs
 45 The present prince, they're loth it should be said,
 The prince doth languish, or the prince is dead:
 So mankind feeling now a general thaw,
 A strong example gone, equal to law,
 The cement which did faithfully compact
 50 And glue all virtues, now resolved, and slacked,
 Thought it some blasphemy to say sh' was dead;
 Or that our weakness was discovered
 In that confession; therefore spoke no more
 Than tongues, the soul being gone, the loss deplore.
 55 But though it be too late to succour thee,
 Sick world, yea dead, yea putrefied, since she

⁴ font Baptismal font.

Thy intrinsic balm, and thy preservative,
 Can never be renewed, thou never live,
 I (since no man can make thee live) will try,
 60 What we may gain by thy anatomy.
 Her death hath taught us dearly, that thou art
 Corrupt and mortal in thy purest part.
 Let no man say, the world itself being dead,
 'Tis labour lost to have discovered
 65 The world's infirmities, since there is none
 Alive to study this dissection;
 For there's a kind of world remaining still,
 Though she which did inanimate and fill
 The world, be gone, yet in this last long night,
 70 Her ghost doth walk; that is, a glimmering light,
 A faint weak love of virtue and of good
 Reflects from her, on them which understood
 Her worth; and though she have shut in all day,
 The twilight of her memory doth stay;
 75 Which, from the carcass of the old world, free,
 Creates a new world; and new creatures be Produced: the matter and the stuff of this,
 Her virtue, and the form our practice is.
 And though to be thus elemented, arm
 80 These creatures, from home-born intrinsic harm,
 (For all assumed unto this dignity,
 So many weedless paradises be,
 Which of themselves produce no venomous sin,
 Except some foreign serpent bring it in)
 85 Yet, because outward storms the strongest break,
 And strength itself by confidence grows weak,
 This new world may be safer, being told
 The dangers and diseases of the old:
 For with due temper men do then forgo,
 90 Or covet things, when they their true worth know.
 There is no health; physicians say that we
 At best, enjoy but a neutrality.
 And can there be worse sickness, than to know
 That we are never well, nor can be so?
 95 We are born ruinous: poor mothers cry,
 That children come not right, nor orderly,
 Except they headlong come, and fall upon
 An ominous precipitation.
 How witty's ruin! how importunate
 100 Upon mankind! it laboured to frustrate
 Even God's purpose: and made woman, sent
 For man's relief, cause of his languishment.

They were to good ends, and they are so still,
 But accessory, and principal in ill.
 105 For that first marriage was our funeral:
 One woman at one blow, then killed us all,
 And singly, one by one, they kill us now.
 We do delightfully ourselves allow
 To that consumption; and profusely blind,
 110 We kill ourselves,¹ to propagate our kind.
 And yet we do not that; we are not men:
 There is not now that mankind, which was then,
 When as the sun, and man, did seem to strive,
 (Joint tenants of the world) who should survive.
 115 When stag, and raven, and the long-lived tree,
 Compared with man, died in minority;
 When, if a slow-paced star had stol'n away
 From the observer's marking, he might stay
 Two or three hundred years to see't again,
 120 And then make up his observation plain;
 When, as the age was long, the size was great:
 Man's growth confessed, and recompensed the meat:
 So spacious and large, that every soul
 Did a fair kingdom, and large realm control:
 125 And when the very stature thus erect,
 Did that soul a good way towards heaven direct.
 Where is this mankind now? who lives to age,
 Fit to be made Methusalem² his page?
 Alas, we scarce live long enough to try
 130 Whether a new made clock run right, or lie.
 Old grandsires talk of yesterday with sorrow,
 And for our children we reserve tomorrow.
 So short is life, that every peasant strives,
 In a torn house, or field, to have three lives.³
 135 And as in lasting, so in length is man
 Contracted to an inch, who was a span;
 For had a man at first in forests strayed,
 Or shipwrecked in the sea, one would have laid
 A wager, that an elephant, or whale,
 140 That met him, would not hastily assail
 A thing so equal to him: now alas,
 The fairies and the pygmies well may pass
 As credible; mankind decays so soon,

¹ We kill ourselves Sex was believed to shorten life.

² Methusalem I.e., Methuselah, who lived 969 years (Genesis 5.27).

³ three lives Probably referring to certain kinds of leases, which lasted until the death of three named leasees.

We're scarce our fathers' shadows cast at noon.
 145 Only death adds to our length: nor are we grown
 In stature to be men, till we are none.
 But this were light, did our less volume hold
 All the old text; or had we changed to gold
 Their silver; or disposed into less glass
 150 Spirits of virtue, which then scattered was.
 But 'tis not so: we're not retired, but damped;
 And as our bodies, so our minds are cramped:
 'Tis shrinking, not close weaving that hath thus,
 In mind and body both bedwarfed us.
 155 We seem ambitious, God's whole work to undo;
 Of nothing he made us, and we strive too,
 To bring ourselves to nothing back; and we Do what we can, to do 't so soon as he.
 With new diseases on ourselves we war,
 160 And with new physic, a worse engine far.
 Thus man, this world's vice-emperor, in whom
 All faculties, all graces are at home;
 And if in other creatures they appear,
 They're but man's ministers, and legates there,
 165 To work on their rebellions, and reduce
 Them to civility, and to man's use.
 This man, whom God did woo, and loth t'attend
 Till man came up, did down to man descend,
 This man, so great, that all that is, is his,
 170 Oh what a trifle, and poor thing he is!
 If man were anything, he's nothing now:
 Help, or at least some time to waste, allow
 T' his other wants, yet when he did depart
 With her whom we lament, he lost his heart.
 175 She, of whom th' ancients seemed to prophesy,
 When they called virtues by the name of she;
 She in whom virtue was so much refined,
 That for allay unto so pure a mind
 She took the weaker sex, she that could drive
 180 The poisonous tincture,¹ and the stain of Eve,
 Out of her thoughts, and deeds; and purify
 All, by a true religious alchemy;
 She, she is dead; she's dead: when thou know'st this,
 Thou know'st how poor a trifling thing man is.
 185 And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
 The heart being perished, no part can be free.

And that except thou feed (not banquet)² on
 The supernatural food, religion,
 Thy better growth grows withered, and scant;
 190 Be more than man, or thou'rt less than an ant.
 Then, as mankind, so is the world's whole frame
 Quite out of joint, almost created lame:
 For, before God had made up all the rest,
 Corruption entered, and depraved the best:
 195 It seized the angels, and then first of all
 The world did in her cradle take a fall,
 And turned her brains, and took a general maim
 Wronging each joint of th' universal frame.
 The noblest part, man, felt it first; and then
 200 Both beasts and plants, cursed in the curse of man.
 So did the world from the first hour decay,
 That evening was beginning of the day,
 And now the springs and summers which we see,
 Like sons of women after fifty be.
 205 And new philosophy calls all in doubt,
 The element of fire is quite put out;³
 The sun is lost, and th' earth, and no man's wit
 Can well direct him where to look for it.⁴
 And freely men confess that this world's spent,
 210 When in the planets, and the firmament
 They seek so many new; they see that this
 Is crumbled out again to his atomies.
 'Tis all in pieces, all coherence gone;
 All just supply, and all relation:
 215 Prince, subject, father, son, are things forgot,
 For every man alone thinks he hath got
 To be a phoenix, and that there can be None of that kind, of which he is, but he.
 This is the world's condition now, and now
 220 She that should all parts to reunion bow,
 She that had all magnetic force alone,
 To draw, and fasten sundered parts in one;
 She whom wise nature had invented then
 When she observed that every sort of men

² banquet That is, feed rather than snack or nibble: a banquet in the period could refer to an appetizer or dessert course.

³ The element of fire ... put out The astronomer Johannes Kepler (1571–1630) disproved the traditional belief that the earth was surrounded by a sphere of fire.

⁴ The sun is lost ... look for it Referring to the cosmological uncertainty created by the new, heliocentric theories of Copernicus, Brahe, and Kepler.

225 Did in their voyage in this world's sea stray,
 And needed a new compass for their way;
 She that was best, and first original
 Of all fair copies; and the general
 Steward to Fate; she whose rich eyes, and breast,
 230 Gilt the West Indies, and perfumed the East;
 Whose having breathed in this world, did bestow
 Spice on those isles, and bade them still smell so,
 And that rich Indy which doth gold inter,
 Is but as single money, coined from her:
 235 She to whom this world must itself refer,
 As suburbs, or the microcosm of her,
 She, she is dead; she's dead: when thou know'st this,
 Thou know'st how lame a cripple this world is.
 And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
 240 That this world's general sickness doth not lie
 In any humour, or one certain part;
 But as thou sawest it rotten at the heart,
 Thou seest a hectic fever hath got hold
 Of the whole substance, not to be controlled,
 245 And that thou hast but one way, not to admit
 The world's infection, to be none of it.
 For the world's subtlest immaterial parts
 Feel this consuming wound, and age's darts.
 For the world's beauty is decayed, or gone,
 250 Beauty, that's colour, and proportion.
 We think the heavens enjoy their spherical,
 Their round proportion embracing all.¹
 But yet their various and perplexed course,
 Observed in diverse ages, doth enforce
 255 Men to find out so many eccentric parts,
 Such diverse down-right lines, such overthwarts,
 As disproportion that pure form. It tears
 The firmament in eight and forty shares,
 And in these constellations then arise
 260 New stars,² and old do vanish from our eyes:

¹ Their round proportion embracing all Beginning in line 251, Donne points to changes in astronomical models as a sign of universal change. Plato had suggested that planetary orbits were perfect circles (lines 251–52); Ptolemy had constructed a more complex model, still geocentric, that accounted for observed movements (line 253 forward). Ptolemy's model was itself under challenge in Donne's time by the work of astronomers such as Copernicus.

² New stars Brahe and Kepler had observed the appearance of new stars, and Galileo had discovered the moons of Jupiter; these observations all challenged belief in the unchangeableness of the

As though heaven suffered earthquakes, peace or war,
 When new towns rise, and old demolished are.
 They have impaled within a zodiac
 The free-born sun, and keep twelve signs awake
 265 To watch his steps; the goat and crab control,
 And fright him back, who else to either pole
 (Did not these tropics fetter him) might run:
 For his course is not round; nor can the sun
 Perfect a circle, or maintain his way
 270 One inch direct; but where he rose today
 He comes no more, but with a cozening line,
 Steals by that point, and so is serpentine:
 And seeming weary with his reeling thus,
 He means to sleep, being now fall'n nearer us.
 275 So, of the stars which boast that they do run
 In circle still, none ends where he begun.
 All their proportion's lame, it sinks, it swells.
 For of meridians, and parallels,
 Man hath weaved out a net, and this net thrown 280 Upon the heavens, and now they are his own.
 Loth to go up the hill, or labour thus
 To go to heaven, we make heaven come to us.
 We spur, we rein the stars, and in their race
 They're diversely content t' obey our pace.
 285 But keeps the earth her round proportion still?
 Doth not a Tenerife,³ or higher hill
 Rise so high like a rock, that one might think
 The floating moon would shipwreck there, and sink?
 Seas are so deep, that whales being struck today,
 290 Perchance tomorrow, scarce at middle way
 Of their wished journey's end, the bottom, die.
 And men, to sound depths, so much line untie,
 As one might justly think that there would rise
 At end thereof, one of th' Antipodes:
 295 If under all, a vault infernal be,
 (Which sure is spacious, except that we Invent another torment, that there must Millions into a strait hot room be thrust)
 Then solidness, and roundness have no place.
 300 Are these but warts, and pock-holes in the face
 Of th' earth? Think so: but yet confess, in this
 The world's proportion disfigured is, firmament above the moon.

³ Tenerife Mountain on the island of Teneriffe, in the Canary Islands; it rises over 12,000 feet, but was often considered much higher in the period.

That those two legs whereon it doth rely,
 Reward and punishment are bent awry.
 305 And, oh, it can no more be questioned,
 That beauty's best, proportion, is dead,
 Since even grief itself, which now alone
 Is left us, is without proportion.
 She by whose lines proportion should be
 310 Examined, measure of all symmetry,
 Whom had that ancient¹ seen, who thought souls made
 Of harmony, he would at next have said
 That harmony was she, and thence infer,
 That souls were but resultances from her,
 315 And did from her into our bodies go,
 As to our eyes, the forms from objects flow:
 She, who if those great Doctors² truly said
 That the Ark to man's proportions was made,
 Had been a type for that, as that might be 320 A type of her in this, that contrary
 Both elements, and passions lived at peace
 In her, who caused all civil war to cease.
 She, after whom what form so'er we see
 Is discord, and rude incongruity;
 325 She, she is dead, she's dead; when thou know'st this Thou know'st how ugly a monster this world is:
 And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
 That here is nothing to enamour thee:
 And that, not only faults in inward parts,
 330 Corruptions in our brains, or in our hearts,
 Poisoning the fountains, whence our actions spring,
 Endanger us: but that if everything
 Be not done fitly and in proportion,
 To satisfy wise, and good lookers-on,
 335 (Since most men be such as most think they be)
 They're loathsome too, by this deformity.
 For good, and well, must in our actions meet;
 Wicked is not much worse than indiscreet.
 But beauty's other second element,
 340 Colour, and lustre now, is as near spent.
 And had the world his just proportion,
 Were it a ring still, yet the stone is gone.

As a compassionate turquoise³ which doth tell
 By looking pale, the wearer is not well,
 345 As gold falls sick⁴ being stung with mercury,
 All the world's parts of such complexion be.
 When nature was most busy, the first week,
 Swaddling the new born earth, God seemed to like
 That she should sport herself sometimes, and play,
 350 To mingle, and vary colours every day:
 And then, as though she could not make enow,
 Himself his various rainbow did allow.
 Sight is the noblest sense of any one,
 Yet sight hath only colour to feed on,
 355 And colour is decayed: summer's robe grows
 Dusky, and like an oft dyed garment shows.
 Our blushing red, which used in cheeks to spread,
 Is inward sunk, and only our souls are red.
 Perchance the world might have recovered,
 360 If she whom we lament had not been dead:
 But she, in whom all white, and red, and blue
 (Beauty's ingredients) voluntary grew,
 As in an unvexed paradise; from whom
 Did all things verdure, and their lustre come,
 365 Whose composition was miraculous,
 Being all colour, all diaphanous,
 (For air, and fire but thick gross bodies were
 And liveliest stones but drowsy, and pale to her),
 She, she, is dead; she's dead: when thou know'st this,
 370 Thou know'st how wan a ghost this our world is:
 And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
 That it should more affright, than pleasure thee.
 And that, since all fair colour then did sink,
 'Tis now but wicked vanity, to think
 375 To colour vicious deeds with good pretense,
 Or with bought colours to elude men's sense.
 Nor in aught more this world's decay appears,
 Than that her influence the heaven forbears,
 Or that the elements do not feel this,
 380 The father, or the mother barren is.
 The clouds conceive not rain, or do not pour
 In the due birth time, down the balmy shower.
 Th' air doth not motherly sit on the earth,
 To hatch her seasons, and give all things birth.

¹ that ancient Probably the ancient Greek mathematician and philosopher Pythagoras (born c. 560 BCE).

² great Doctors Church doctors or fathers, the patristic writers; Augustine and Ambrose both make this claim.

³ compassionate turquoise Turquoise was reputed to change luster according to the health of the wearer.

⁴ gold falls sick Gold amalgam, a mixture of gold with mercury, is paler than gold.

385 Spring-times were common cradles, but are tombs;
 And false conceptions fill the general wombs.
 Th' air shows such meteors, as none can see,
 Not only what they mean, but what they be.
 Earth such new worms, as would have troubled much 390 Th' Egyptian Mages¹ to have made more such.
 What artist now dares boast that he can bring
 Heaven hither, or constellate anything,
 So as the influence of those stars may be Imprisoned in an herb, or charm, or tree,
 395 And do by touch, all which those stars could do?
 The art is lost, and correspondence too.
 For heaven gives little, and the earth takes less,
 And man least knows their trade, and purposes.
 If this commerce 'twixt heaven and earth were not 400 Embarr'd, and all this traffic quite forgot,
 She, for whose loss we have lamented thus,
 Would work more fully and powerfully on us.
 Since herbs, and roots by dying, lose not all,
 But they, yea ashes too, are medicinal,
 405 Death could not quench her virtue so, but that It would be (if not followed) wondered at:
 And all the world would be one dying swan,
 To sing her funeral praise, and vanish then.
 But as some serpents' poison hurteth not,
 410 Except it be from the live serpent shot,
 So doth her virtue need her here, to fit
 That unto us; she working more than it.
 But she, in whom to such maturity
 Virtue was grown, past growth, that it must die, 415 She, from whose influence all impressions came,
 But, by receivers' impotencies, lame,
 Who, though she could not transubstantiate
 All states to gold, yet gilded every state,
 So that some princes have some temperance;
 420 Some counsellors some purpose to advance
 The common profit; and some people have
 Some stay, no more than kings should give, to crave;
 Some women have some taciturnity,
 Some nunneries, some grains of chastity.
 425 She that did thus much, and much more could do,
 But that our age was iron, and rusty too,
 She, she is dead; she 's dead; when thou know'st this,

Thou know'st how dry a cinder this world is.
 And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
 430 That 'tis in vain to dew, or mollify
 It with thy tears, or sweat, or blood: nothing
 Is worth our travail, grief, or perishing,
 But those rich joys, which did possess her heart,
 Of which she's now partaker, and a part.
 435 But as in cutting up a man that's dead,
 The body will not last out to have read
 On every part, and therefore men direct
 Their speech to parts, that are of most effect;
 So the world's carcass would not last, if I
 440 Were punctual in this anatomy.
 Nor smells it well to hearers, if one tell
 Them their disease, who fain would think they're well.
 Here therefore be the end: and, blessed maid,
 Of whom is meant whatever hath been said,
 445 Or shall be spoken well by any tongue,
 Whose name refines coarse lines, and makes prose song,
 Accept this tribute, and his first year's rent,
 Who till his dark short taper's end be spent,
 As oft as thy feast sees this widowed earth,
 450 Will yearly celebrate thy second birth,
 That is, thy death. For though the soul of man
 Be got when man is made, 'tis born but then
 When man doth die. Our body's as the womb,
 And as a midwife death directs it home.
 455 And you her creatures, whom she works upon
 And have your last, and best concoction
 From her example, and her virtue, if you
 In reverence to her, do think it due,
 That no one should her praises thus rehearse,
 460 As matter fit for chronicle, not verse,
 Vouchsafe to call to mind, that God did make
 A last, and lasting² piece, a song. He spake
 To Moses, to deliver unto all,
 That song: because he knew they would let fall
 465 The Law, the prophets, and the history,
 But keep the song² still in their memory.
 Such an opinion (in due measure) made
 Me this great office boldly to invade.
 Nor could incomprehensibleness deter
 470 Me, from thus trying to imprison her.
 Which when I saw that a strict grave could do,
 I saw not why verse might not do so too.

¹ Egyptian Mages From Exodus 7.10–12; Donne refers to the new snakes ("worms") that explorers in Africa and America were encountering.

² the song See Deuteronomy 31.19, 31–43.

Verse hath a middle nature: heaven keeps souls,
The grave keeps bodies, verse the fame enrolls.

As due by many titles I resign
Myself to thee, O God, first I was made
By thee, and for Thee, and when I was decayed
Thy blood bought that, the which before was Thine;
5 I am Thy son, made with Thyself to shine,
Thy servant, whose pains Thou hast still repaid,
Thy sheep, Thine image, and, till I betrayed
Myself, a temple of Thy Spirit divine;
Why doth the devil then usurp on me?
10 Why doth he steal, nay ravish, that's Thy right?
Except Thou rise and for Thine own work fight,
Oh I shall soon despair, when I do see
That Thou lov'st mankind well, yet wilt not choose me,
And Satan hates me, yet is loth to lose me.

I am a little world made cunningly
Of elements, and an angelic sprite,
But black sin hath betrayed to endless night
My world's both parts, and (oh) both parts must die.
5 You which beyond that heaven which was most high
Have found new spheres, and of new lands can write,
Pour new seas in mine eyes, that so I might Drown my world with my weeping earnestly,
Or wash it, if it must be drowned no more:
10 But oh it must be burnt; alas the fire
Of lust and envy have burnt it heretofore,
And made it fouler; let their flames retire,
And burn me O Lord, with a fiery zeal
Of Thee and Thy house, which doth in eating heal.

This is my play's last scene, here heavens appoint
My pilgrimage's last mile; and my race
Idly, yet quickly run, hath this last pace,
My span's last inch, my minute's last point,
5 And gluttonous death will instantly unjoint
My body and soul, and I shall sleep a space,
But my ever-waking part shall see that face
Whose fear already shakes my every joint:
Then, as my soul, to heaven her first seat, takes flight,
10 And earth-born body in the earth shall dwell,
So, fall my sins, that all may have their right,
To where they're bred, and would press me, to hell.
Impute me righteous,⁴ thus purged of evil,
For thus I leave the world, the flesh, and devil.
—1633

At the round earth's imagined corners, blow
Your trumpets, angels, and arise, arise
From death, you numberless infinities
Of souls, and to your scattered bodies go,
5 All whom the flood did, and fire shall o'erthrow,
All whom war, dearth, age, agues, tyrannies,
Despair, law, chance, hath slain, and you whose eyes
Shall behold God and never taste death's woe.⁶
But let them sleep, Lord, and me mourn a space,
10 For if above all these my sins abound,
'Tis late to ask abundance of Thy grace
When we are there; here on this lowly ground,
Teach me how to repent; for that's as good
As if Thou hadst sealed my pardon with Thy blood.

If poisonous minerals, and if that tree,
 Whose fruit threw death on else immortal us,
 If lecherous goats, if serpents envious
 Cannot be damned, alas, why should I be?
 5 Why should intent or reason, born in me,
 Make sins, else equal, in me more heinous?
 And mercy being easy, and glorious
 To God, in His stern wrath, why threatens He?
 But who am I, that dare dispute with Thee?
 10 O God, oh! of Thine only worthy blood
 And my tears, make a heavenly Lethæan flood,²
 And drown in it my sins' black memory.
 That Thou remember them, some claim as debt,
 I think it mercy, if Thou wilt forget.

Death be not proud, though some have called thee
 Mighty and dreadful, for thou are not so;
 For those whom thou think'st thou dost overthrow
 Die not, poor death, nor yet canst thou kill me.
 5 From rest and sleep, which but thy pictures be,
 Much pleasure; then from thee, much more must flow,
 And soonest our best men with thee do go,
 Rest of their bones, and soul's delivery.

Thou art slave to fate, chance, kings, and desperate men,
 10 And dost with poison, war, and sickness dwell;
 And poppy, or charms, can make us sleep as well
 And better than thy stroke; why swell'st thou then?
 One short sleep past, we wake eternally,
 And death shall be no more; death, thou shalt die.

What if this present were the world's last night?
 Mark in my heart, O soul, where thou dost dwell,
 The picture of Christ crucified, and tell
 Whether that countenance can thee affright,
 5 Tears in His eyes quench the amazing light,
 Blood fills His frowns, which from His pierced head fell,
 And can that tongue adjudge thee unto hell,
 Which prayed forgiveness for His foes' fierce spite?
 No, no; but as in my idolatry

 Beauty, of pity, foulness only is
 A sign of rigour:⁵ so I say to thee,
 To wicked spirits are horrid shapes assigned,
 This beauteous form assures a piteous mind.

Batter my heart, three personed God; for you
As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend;
That I may rise and stand, o'erthrow me, and bend
Your force, to break, blow, burn and make me new.

I, like an usurped town, to another due,
Labour to admit You, but oh, to no end:
Reason Your viceroy in me, me should defend,
But is captived, and proves weak or untrue.
Yet dearly I love You, and would be loved fain,
But am betrothed unto your enemy:
Divorce me, untie, or break that knot again,
Take me to You, imprison me, for I
Except You enthrall me, never shall be free,
Nor ever chaste, except You ravish me.

Show me, dear Christ, Thy spouse, so bright and clear.
What, is it she which on the other shore
Goes richly painted?³ or which, robbed and tore,
Laments and mourns in Germany and here?⁴
Sleeps she a thousand, then peeps up one year?
Is she self-truth and errs? now new, now outwore?
Doth she, and did she, and shall she evermore
On one, on seven, or on no hill appear?⁵

³ Goes richly painted The Roman Catholic Church.

⁴ Laments ... and here The Protestant or perhaps, more specifically, Calvinist Church.

⁵ On one ... hill appear Solomon's Temple stood on one hill, Mount Moriah (see 2 Chronicles 3.1); Rome has seven hills; Geneva, the center of Calvinism, has none.

Dwells she with us, or like adventuring knights
First travail we to seek and then make love?
Betray, kind husband, Thy spouse to our sights,
And let mine amorous soul court Thy mild dove,
Who is most true and pleasing to Thee then
When she's embraced and open to most men.

Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one:
Inconstancy unnaturally hath begot
A constant habit; that when I would not
I change in vows, and in devotion.
As humorous⁷ is my contrition
As my profane love, and as soon forgot:
As riddlingly distempered, cold and hot,
As praying, as mute; as infinite, as none.
I durst not view heaven yesterday; and today
In prayers and flattering speeches I court God:
Tomorrow I quake with true fear of His rod.
So my devout fits come and go away
Like a fantastic ague: save that here
Those are my best days, when I shake with fear.
—1894

⁶ 19 Numbered as Sonnet 3 (of the Westmoreland manuscript sonnets) in some modern editions.

⁷ humorous To be "humorous" in this context is to be affected by an imbalance of the four "humors" that affect body and mind; Donne's speaker oscillates between cold (melancholy and phlegm) hot (choler and sanguine), make him "distempered," unharmonious, in these mood swings.

Good Friday, 1613. Riding Westward

Let man's soul be a sphere, and then, in this,
 The intelligence that moves, devotion is,¹
 And as the other spheres, by being grown
 Subject to foreign motions, lose their own,
 5 And being by others hurried every day,
 Scarce in a year their natural form obey:
 Pleasure or business, so our souls admit
 For their First Mover, and are whirled by it.
 Hence is't, that I am carried towards the West
 10 This day, when my soul's form bends towards the East.
 There I should see a sun, by rising set,
 And by that setting endless day beget;
 But that Christ on this cross did rise and fall,
 Sin had eternally benighted all.
 15 Yet dare I almost be glad, I do not see
 That spectacle of too much weight for me.
 Who sees God's face, that is self life, must die;
 What a death were it then to see God die?
 It made His own lieutenant, Nature, shrink,
 20 It made His footstool crack, and the sun wink.
 Could I behold those hands which span the poles,
 And tune all spheres at once, pierced with those holes?
 Could I behold that endless height which is
 Zenith to us, and to our antipodes,
 25 Humbled below us? or that blood which is
 The seat of all our souls, if not of His,
 Made dirt of dust, or that flesh which was worn
 By God, for His apparel, ragged and torn?
 If on these things I durst not look, durst I
 30 Upon His miserable mother cast mine eye,
 Who was God's partner here, and furnished thus
 Half of that sacrifice, which ransomed us?
 Though these things, as I ride, be from mine eye,
 They are present yet unto my memory,
 35 For that looks towards them; and thou look'st towards me,

¹ The intelligence ... devotion is Donne invokes traditional cosmography, in which each heavenly sphere was controlled by its "intelligence" or spirit.

O Saviour, as Thou hang'st upon the tree;
 I turn my back to Thee, but to receive
 Corrections, till Thy mercies bid Thee leave.
 O think me worth Thine anger, punish me,
 40 Burn off my rusts, and my deformity,
 Restore Thine image, so much, by Thy grace,
 That Thou may'st know me, and I'll turn my face.
 —1633

A Hymn to God the Father

1
 Wilt Thou forgive that sin where I begun,
 Which is my sin, though it were done before?
 Wilt Thou forgive those sins through which I run,
 And do them still, though still I do deplore?
 5 When Thou hast done, Thou hast not done,
 For I have more.

2
 Wilt Thou forgive that sin which I have won
 Others to sin? and made my sin their door?
 Wilt Thou forgive that sin which I did shun
 10 A year, or two, but wallowed in, a score?
 When Thou hast done, Thou hast not done,
 For I have more.

3
 I have a sin of fear, that when I have spun
 My last thread, I shall perish on the shore;
 15 But swear by Thyself, that at my death Thy sun
 Shall shine as he shines now, and heretofore;
 And, having done that, Thou hast done,
 I have no more.²
 —1633

² I have no more "I fear no more" in the printed version; "have" in the manuscripts.

Hymn to God, My God, in My Sickness

Since I am coming to that holy room,¹
 Where, with thy choir of saints for evermore,
 I shall be made thy music; as I come
 I tune the instrument here at the door,
 5 And what I must do then, think here before;

Whilst my physicians by their love are grown
 Cosmographers,² and I their map, who lie
 Flat on this bed, that by them may be shown
 That this is my south-west discovery,
 10 Per fretum febris, by these straits³ to die;

I joy, that in these straits I see my west;
 For, though those currents yield return to none,
 What shall my west hurt me? As west and east
 In all flat maps (and I am one)⁴ are one,⁴
 15 So death doth touch the resurrection.

Is the Pacific Sea my home? Or are
 The eastern riches?⁵ Is Jerusalem?
 Anian, and Magellan, and Gibraltar?⁶
 All straits, and none but straits, are ways to them,
 20 Whether where Japhet dwelt, or Cham, or Shem.⁷

We think that Paradise and Calvary,
 Christ's cross and Adam's tree, stood in one place;⁸

² Cosmographers Scientists who map the universe.

³ Per fretum febris Latin: Through the straits of fever; straits Narrow water channels; also, perilous circumstances.

⁴ As west ... are one As the edges of a flat map of the earth would meet if the map were made round like a globe.

⁵ eastern riches I.e., wealth of East Asia.

⁶ Anian Strait thought to separate North America from China, a part of the imagined Northwest Passage; Magellan Strait at the tip of South America, connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans; Gibraltar Strait at the mouth of the Mediterranean Sea. (One would pass through it if sailing to Jerusalem from England.)

⁷ Japhet ... Shem Japhet, Cham, and Shem, Noah's three sons, survived the Great Flood described in Genesis 10. Each was thought to have fathered the population of a continent: Japhet repopulated Europe; Cham, Africa; and Shem, Asia.

⁸ Paradise and ... one place It was often suggested that Christ's crucifixion took place in the region where the forbidden tree of Eden had once stood.

Look, Lord, and find both Adams⁹ met in me;
 As the first Adam's sweat surrounds my face,
 25 May the last Adam's blood my soul embrace.

So, in his purple wrapped, receive me, Lord,
 By these his thorns give me his other crown;
 And as to others' souls I preached thy word,
 Be this my text, my sermon to mine own:
 30 Therefore⁹ that he may raise, the Lord throws down.

MEDITATION 17

Nunc Lento Sonitu Dicunt, Morieris

Now, this bell tolling softly for another, says to me:
 Thou must die

Perchance he for whom this bell tolls may be so ill, as that he knows not it tolls for him; and perchance I may think myself so much better than I am, as that they who are about me, and see my state, may have caused it to toll for me, and I know not that. The Church is catholic, universal, so are all her actions; all that she does belongs to all. When she baptizes a child, that action concerns me; for that child is thereby connected to that body which is my head too, and ingrafted into that body whereof I am a member. And when she buries a man, that action concerns me: all mankind is of one author, and is one volume; when one man dies, one chapter is not torn out of the book, but translated into a better language; and every chapter must be so translated; God employs several translators; some pieces are translated by age, some by sickness, some by war, some by justice; but God's hand is in every translation, and His hand shall

⁹ both Adams Adam and Jesus Christ, who is referred to as "the last Adam" in Corinthians 15.45. Also see Corinthians 15.22: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."

bind up all our scattered leaves again for that library where every book shall lie open to one another. As therefore the bell that rings to a sermon calls not upon the preacher only, but upon the congregation to come, so this bell calls us all; but how much more me, who am brought so near the door by this sickness. There was a contention as far as a suit (in which both piety and dignity, religion and estimation, were mingled), which of the religious orders should ring to prayers first in the morning; and it was determined, that they should ring first that rose earliest. If we understand aright the dignity of this bell that tolls for our evening prayer, we would be glad to make it ours by rising early, in that application, that it might be ours as well as his, whose indeed it is. The bell doth toll for him that thinks it doth; and though it intermit again, yet from that minute that that occasion wrought upon him, he is united to God. Who casts not up his eye to the sun when it rises? but who takes off his eye from a comet when that breaks out? Who bends not his ear to any bell which upon any occasion rings? but who can remove it from that bell which is passing a piece of himself out of this world? No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main. If a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less, as well as if a promontory were, as well as if a manor of thy friend's or of thine own were: any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind, and therefore never send to know for whom the bells tolls; it tolls for thee. Neither can we call this a begging of misery, or a borrowing of misery, as though we were not miserable enough of ourselves, but must fetch in more from the next house, in taking upon us the misery of our neighbours. Truly it were an excusable covetousness if we did, for affliction is a treasure, and scarce any man hath enough of it. No man hath affliction enough that is not matured and ripened by it, and made fit for God by that affliction. If a man carry treasure in bullion, or in a wedge of gold, and have none coined into current money, his treasure will not defray him as he travels. Tribulation is treasure in the nature of it, but it is not current money in the use of it, except we get nearer and nearer our home, heaven, by it. Another man may be sick too, and sick to death, and this affliction may lie in his bowels, as gold in a mine, and be of no use to him; but this bell, that tells me of his affliction, digs out and applies that gold to me: if by this consideration of another's danger I take mine own into contemplation, and so secure myself, by making my recourse to my God, who is our only security.

LADY MARY WROTH

1587 – 1651

Lady Mary Wroth wrote the first work of prose fiction and the first amatory sonnet sequence published by a woman in English. Her court romance, The Countess of Montgomery's Urania (1621) exploits multiple Renaissance genres—sonnet, ballad, madrigal, pastoral narrative and song, among others—with penetrating observation, worldly skepticism, and emotional subtlety. Wroth's work was admired by a number of poets of her day—Ben Jonson, who dedicated his play The Alchemist (1610) to her, proclaimed that her verse had made him “a better lover, and much better poet”—and although her reputation faded during the ensuing centuries, today Mary Wroth is recognized as a significant Jacobean writer and pioneer.

Born Mary Sidney in 1587, Wroth was a member of an illustrious political and literary family that included her uncle, Sir Philip Sidney, her aunt, Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke (herself a poet and patron of poets), and her father, Sir Robert Sidney, a statesman and minor poet. Educated by tutors, Mary was already an accomplished scholar, musician, and dancer by the time of her arranged marriage in 1604 to a wealthy landowner, Sir Robert Wroth. The union was not a happy one, but it did propel Lady Mary further into the life of the Jacobean court, where she performed in Ben Jonson's Masque of Blackness in 1605 and Masque of Beauty in 1608, and, in her family's tradition, bestowed friendship and patronage on poets such as Jonson and George Chapman.

On her husband's death in 1614, Wroth was left with an infant son (who died in 1616) and crushing debts. She was also free to pursue more openly a long-time illicit affair with her cousin, William Herbert, with whom she eventually had two illegitimate children. This affair, and financial constraints, may have limited Wroth's access to court and spurred her to write more seriously. She polished her sonnets, already circulating in manuscript as early as 1605, and in 1621 appended them to a 558-page prose romance, Urania, dedicated to the Countess of Montgomery. Because of its fictionalized allusions to actual court personages and events, the book offended those who saw themselves depicted too transparently. One such person, Sir William Denny, complained to the King and circulated a scathing poem criticizing Wroth as a “hermaphrodite” and “monster,” an “oyster” gaping open to every tide. Denny's attack sparked a wittily vigorous reply in which Wroth mimicked the exact form of Denny's verse, rewriting his lines one by one. But in the end the attacks on her found their mark; she withdrew the edition of Urania and published no more work during her lifetime. (A second part of Urania, a few other poems, and a pastoral drama, Love's Victory, remained unpublished until our own time.)

Scandalous elements aside, Urania is a groundbreaking work because it uses genres traditionally written by men—episodic pastoral narrative of the sort we find in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, and the digressive adventures of the Alexandrian romance—in untraditional ways to examine the social situation of women in actual court society. Wroth's prose is plainer than Sidney's and her outlook even more skeptical of romantic ideals. (“Credit no thing” is a typical warning.) Centering on the friendship of the shepherdess Urania (modeled on the Countess of Montgomery) with the princess Pamphilia (modeled on Wroth herself) and Pamphilia's frustrated love for the faithless Amphilanthus (whose name means “lover of two”), the story branches into multiple episodes and characters, interspersed with over fifty poems and songs in various genres. While celebrating the power of female desire, Wroth does not shrink from depicting the casual brutality of relations between the sexes: women seduced and abandoned, the indignity of forced marriages, the tortures of jealousy and deception.

In Pamphilia to Amphilanthus, the sequence of 83 sonnets and 20 songs that follows Urania, Wroth, no doubt influenced by her famous uncle's Astrophil and Stella, again applies herself to a genre traditionally (although by now by no means exclusively) reserved for males. She again deftly employs a somewhat outdated convention—the Petrarchan sonnet—in ways that highlight love's tensions and contradictions. Pamphilia addresses not her beloved, as does the authorial voice in many Petrarchan sonnets, but herself (“I with my spirit talk and cry”), as well as Cupid, Time, Fortune, and other personifications of her trials. As Paula Payne observes, “Astrophil is writing to win his love, but Pamphilia is writing to discover her self.” If so, she may in this regard be more genuinely and interestingly Petrarchan than some of Petrarch's later and lesser followers. The climax of Pamphilia to Amphilanthus is a technical tour de force, a “corona” of fourteen sonnets in which the last line of the first becomes the first line of the next. The line that begins and ends it (“In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?”) is emblematic of Wroth's skill in combining the elegant detachment of the Petrarchan form with a heightened emotional urgency: love, it turns out, is not the “thread” that she had expected to lead her from the labyrinth, for the “corona” leaves her there.

Mary Wroth lived her final decades in obscurity, struggling with debt, and died in 1651. In the youthful portrait of her which survives, she is pictured holding, not the gloves or fan customary in female portraits of the time, but an archlute—symbol of the poet.

And at her feet her son,¹ still adding fire
To burning hearts which she did hold above,
But one heart flaming more than all the rest

Behold I yield: let forces be dismissed;
I am thy subject, conquered, bound to stand,
Never thy foe, but did thy claim assist
Seeking thy due of those who did withstand;
But now, it seems, thou would'st I should thee love;
I do confess, 'twas thy will made me choose;
And thy fair shows¹ made me a lover prove
When I my freedom did, for pain, refuse.
Yet this Sir God,² your boyship I despise;

An easy thing it is to shed the blood
Of one, who at your will, yields to the grave;
But more you may true worth⁴ by mercy crave
When you preserve, not spoil, but nourish good;
Your sight is all the food I do desire;
Then sacrifice me not in hidden fire,
Or stop the breath which did your praises move;
Think but how easy 'tis a sight to give;
Nay ev'n desert; since by it I do live,
I but chameleon-like⁵ would live, and love.

I love thy grave, and saddest looks to see,
Which seems^o my soul, and dying heart entire, resembles
Like to the ashes of some happy fire
That flamed in joy, but quenched in misery:
I love thy count'nance, and thy sober pace
Which evenly goes, and as of loving grace
To us, and me among the rest oppressed
Gives quiet, peace to my poor self alone,
And freely grants day leave when thou art gone
To give clear light to see all ill^o redressed. misery

22

Like to the Indians, scorched with the sun,
The sun which they do as their God adore
So am I used by love, for ever more
I worship him, less favors have I won,
Better are they who thus to blackness run,
And so can only whiteness' want deplore
Than I who pale, and white am with grief's store,^o abundance
Nor can have hope, but to see hopes undone;
Besides, their sacrifice received's in sight
Of their chose saint: mine hid as worthless rite;
Grant me to see where I my offerings give,
Then let me wear the mark of Cupid's might

In heart as they in skin of Phoebus' light¹
Not ceasing offerings to love while I Live.

23

When every one to pleasing pastime hies^o hastens
Some hunt, some hawk, some play, while some delight

In sweet discourse, and music shows joy's might Yet I my thoughts do far above these prize.
5 The joy which I take, is that free from eyes²
I sit, and wonder at this daylike night
So to dispose themselves, as void^o of right; bereft
And leave true pleasure for poor vanities;
When others hunt, my thoughts I have in chase;
10 If hawk,³ my mind at wished end doth fly,
Discourse,⁴ I with my spirit talk, and cry
While others, music choose as greatest grace.
O God, say I, can these fond^o pleasures move? foolish
Or music be but in sweet thoughts of love?

35

False hope which feeds but to destroy, and spill
What it first breeds;⁵ unnatural to the birth
Of thine own womb; conceiving but to kill,
And plenty gives to make the greater dearth,
5 So Tyrants do who falsely ruling earth
Outwardly grace them, and with profit's fill
Advance those who appointed are to death
To make their greater fall to please their will.
Thus shadow they their wicked vile intent
10 Colouring evil with a show of good
While in fair shows^o their malice so is spent; spectacles
Hope kills the heart, and tyrants shed the blood.
For hope deluding brings us to the pride^o peak
Of our desires the farther down to slide.

¹ as ... light As Indians, "scorched with the sun," show "in their skins" the mark of Phoebus, the sun-god.

² eyes The eyes, or gaze, of others.

³ If hawk If they (others) hawk.

⁴ Discourse When others discourse.

⁵ spill ... breeds As in a miscarriage.

SONG [LOVE, A CHILD, IS EVER CRYING]

Love, a child, is ever crying,
Please him, and he straight is flying;
Give him, he the more is craving,
Never satisfied with having.

5 His desire have no measure,
Endless folly is his treasure;
What he promiseth he breaketh;
Trust not one word that he speaketh.

He vows nothing but false matter,
10 And to cozen^o you he'll flatter; deceive
Let him gain the hand, he'll leave you,
And still glory to deceive you.

He will triumph in your wailing,
And yet cause be of your failing:
15 These his virtues are, and slighter
Are his gifts, his favours lighter.

Feathers are as firm in staying,
Wolves no fiercer in their preying.
As a child then leave him crying,
20 Nor seek him, so giv'n to flying.

A CROWN OF SONNETS DEDICATED TO LOVE

77

In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?
Ways^o are on all sides while the way I miss: paths
If to the right hand, there in love I burn;
Let me go forward, therein danger is;
5 If to the left, suspicion hinders bliss;
Let me turn back, shame cries I ought return,
Nor faint, though crosses^o with my fortunes kiss; troubles
Stand still is harder, although sure to mourn.⁶
Thus let me take the right, or left-hand way,
10 Go forward, or stand still, or back retire:
I must these doubts endure without allay^o relief
Or help, but travail⁷ find for my best hire.

⁶ although sure to mourn Although sure to make me mourn.

⁷ travail Hard work, but also with a pun on "travel."

Yet that which most my troubled sense doth move,
Is to leave all, and take the thread of Love.¹

78

15 Is to leave all, and take the thread of love,
Which line straight leads unto the soul's content,
Where choice delights with pleasure's wings do move,
And idle fancy never room had lent.
When chaste thoughts guide us, then our minds are bent
20 To take that good which ills from us remove:
Light of true love brings fruit which none repent;
But constant lovers seek and wish to prove.
Love is the shining star of blessing's light,
The fervent fire of zeal, the root of peace,
25 The lasting lamp, fed with the oil of right,
Image of faith, and womb for joy's increase.
Love is true virtue, and his end's delight,
His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might.

79

His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might,
30 No stain is there, but pure, as purest white,
Where no cloud can appear to dim his light,
Nor spot defile, but shame will soon requite.
Here are affections, tried by love's just might
As gold by fire, and black discerned by white;
35 Error by truth, and darkness known by light,
Where faith is valued, for love to requite.
Please him, and serve him, glory in his might
And firm he'll be, as innocence white,
Clear as th'air, warm as sun's beams, as day light
40 Just as truth, constant as fate, joyed to requite.
Then love obey, strive to observe his might
And be in his brave court a glorious light.

80

And be in his brave court a glorious light
Shine in the eyes of faith, and constancy
45 Maintain the fires of love, still burning bright,
Not slightly sparkling, but light flaming be.
Never to slack till earth no stars can see,

Till sun, and moon do leave to us dark night,
And second chaos once again do free
50 Us, and the world from all divisions spite,
Till then affections which his followers are,
Govern our hearts, and prove his power's gain,
To taste this pleasing sting, seek with all care
For happy smarting is it with small pain.
55 Such as although it pierce your tender heart,
And burn, yet burning you will love the smart.

81

And burn, yet burning you will love the smart,
When you shall feel the weight of true desire,
So pleasing, as you would not wish your part
60 Of burden should be missing from that fire.
But faithful and unfeigned heat aspire
Which sin abolisheth, and doth impart
Salves to all fear, with virtues which inspire
Souls with divine love; which shows his chaste art.
65 And guide he is to joyings, open eyes
He hath to happiness, and best can learn
Us means how to deserve, this he describes,^o perceives
Who blind, yet doth our hiddenest thoughts discern.
Thus we may gain since living in blest love,
70 He may our prophet,² and our tutor prove.

82

He may our prophet, and our tutor prove,
In whom alone we do this power find,
To join two hearts as in one frame to move
Two bodies, but one soul to rule the mind
75 Eyes which must care to one dear object bind,
Ears to each other's speech as if above
All else, they sweet, and learned were; this kind
Content of lovers witnesseth true love.
It doth enrich the wits, and make you see
80 That in your self which you knew not before,
Forcing you to admire such gifts should be
Hid from your knowledge, yet in you the store.
Millions of these adorn the throne of Love,
How blest be they then, who his favours prove?^o experience

¹ thread of Love Referring to the myth of Ariadne, who gave her beloved Theseus a spool of thread to unwind behind him as he traveled through the labyrinth of the Minotaur; by following the thread he could find his way back out.

² prophet This appears as "profit" in an earlier version of the poem.

85 How blest be they, then, who his favours prove,
 A life whereof the birth is just desire?
 Breeding sweet flame, which hearts invite to move,
 In these loved eyes which kindle Cupid's fire,
 And nurse his longings with his thoughts entire,
 90 Fixed on the heat of wishes formed by love,
 Yet whereas fire destroys, this doth aspire,¹
 Increase, and foster all delights above.
 Love will a painter make you, such, as you
 Shall able be to draw your only dear,
 95 More lively, perfect, lasting, and more true
 Than rarest workman, and to you more near.
 These be the least, then all must needs confess,
 He that shuns love, doth love himself the less.

He that shuns love, doth love himself the less,
 100 And cursed he whose spirit not admires
 The worth of love, where endless blessedness
 Reigns, and commands, maintained by heavenly fires.
 Made of virtue, joined by truth, blown by desires,
 Strengthened by worth, renewed by carefulness,
 105 Flaming in never changing thoughts: briars
 Of jealousy shall here miss welcomeness.
 Nor coldly pass in the pursuits of love
 Like one long frozen in a sea of ice:
 And yet but chastely let your passions move,
 110 No thought from virtuous love your minds entice.
 Never to other ends your fancies place,
 But where they may return with honour's grace.

85

But where they may return with honour's grace,
 Where Venus' follies can no harbour win,
 115 But chased are, as worthless of the face,
 Or style of love, who hath lascivious been.
 Our hearts are subject to her son, where sin
 Never did dwell, or rest one minute's space;
 What faults he hath in her did still begin,
 120 And from her breast he sucked his fleeting pace.
 If lust be counted love 'tis falsely named
 By wickedness, a fairer gloss to set

¹ aspire Ascend or rise. This appears as "respire" (i.e., "restore hope") in an earlier version of the poem.

Upon that vice, which else makes men ashamed
 In the own phrase to warrant, but beget
 125 This child for love,² who ought like monster born,
 Be from the court of Love, and Reason torn.

86

Be from the court of Love, and Reason torn,
 For Love in Reason now doth put his trust,
 Desert^o and liking are together born worthiness
 130 Children of Love and Reason, parents just.
 Reason adviser is, Love ruler must
 Be of the state, which crown he long hath worn;
 Yet so, as neither will in least mistrust
 The government where no fear is of scorn.
 135 Then reverence both their mights thus made of one,
 But wantonness, and all those errors shun,
 Which wrongers be, impostures, and alone
 Maintainers of all follies ill begun.
 Fruit of a sour,³ and unwholesome ground
 140 Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound.

87

Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound.
 When heaven gave liberty to frail dull earth,
 To bring forth plenty that in ills abound,⁴
 Which ripest, yet do bring a certain dearth.
 145 A timeless, and unseasonable birth,
 Planted in ill, in worse time springing found,
 Which hemlock⁵ like might feed a sick wit's mirth
 Where unruled vapours⁶ swim in endless round.
 Then joy we not in what we ought to shun,
 150 Where shady pleasures show, but true born fires
 Are quite quenched out, or by poor ashes won,
 Awhile to keep those cool, and wan desires.
 O no, let Love his glory have, and might
 Be giv'n to him, who triumphs in his right.

² which else ... love Which otherwise makes men ashamed in the same phrase to affirm that lust is the child of love.

³ sour Acidic and dank.

⁴ When heaven ... abound See Genesis 1.11–12.

⁵ hemlock Herb that was commonly used as a sedative, poisonous in higher doses.

⁶ vapours Exhalations of air from the stomach that, according to medical wisdom of the time, caused mental illnesses such as depression and nervousness.

88

155 Be giv'n to him who triumphs in his right;
 Nor fading be, but like those blossoms fair,
 Which fall for good, and lose their colours bright,
 Yet die not, but with fruit their loss repair:
 So may Love make you pale with loving care,
 160 When sweet enjoying shall restore that light,
 More clear in beauty, then we can compare,
 If not to Venus in her chosen might.¹
 And who so give themselves in this dear kind,
 These happinesses shall attend them still,
 165 To be supplied with joys enriched in mind,
 With treasures of content, and pleasures fill.
 Thus love to be divine, doth here appear,
 Free from all fogs, but shining fair and clear.

89

Free from all fogs, but shining fair, and clear,
 170 Wise in all good, and innocent in ill,
 Where holy friendship is esteemed dear,
 With truth in love, and justice in our will.
 In love these titles only have their fill
 Of happy life-maintainer, and the mere 175 Defence of right, the punisher of skill,
 And fraud, from whence directions doth appear.
 To thee then, lord commander of all hearts,
 Ruler of our affections, kind, and just,
 Great king of love, my soul from feigned smarts,
 180 Or thought of change, I offer to your trust,
 This crown,² my self, and all that I have more,
 Except my heart, which you bestowed before.

90

Except my heart, which you bestowed before,
 And for a sign of conquest gave away
 185 As worthless to be kept in your choice store;
 Yet one more spotless with you doth not stay.
 The tribute which my heart doth truly pay,
 Is faith untouched, pure thoughts discharge the score
 Of debts for me, where constancy bears sway,
 190 And rules as lord, unharmed by envy's sore.
 Yet other mischiefs fail not to attend,

¹ might This appears as "night" in an earlier version of the poem.

² This crown I.e., this crown of sonnets.

As enemies to you, my foes must be,
 Cursed jealousy doth all her forces bend
 To my undoing, thus my harms I see.
 195 So though in love I fervently do burn,
 In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?

*Railing Rhymes Returned upon the Author
 by Mistress Mary Wroth*

Hermaphrodite³ in sense in Art a monster
 As by your railing rhymes the world may conster^o construe
 Your spiteful words against a harmless book
 Shows that an ass much like the sire doth look
 5 Men truly noble fear no touch of blood
 Nor question make of others much more good
 Can such comparisons seem the want^o of wit lack
 When oysters have inflamed your blood with it
 But it appears your guiltiness gaped wide
 10 And filled with Dirty doubt your brain's swollen tide
 Both friend and foe in deed you use alike
 And your mad wit in sherry equal strike
 These slanderous flying flames raised from the pot⁴
 You know are false and raging makes you hot
 15 How easily now do you receive your own
 Turned on your self from whence the squib was thrown
 When these few lines not thousands writ at least
 Mainly thus prove your self the drunken beast
 This is far less to you than you have done
 20 A Thread but of your own all words worse spun
 By which you lively see in your own glass⁵
 How hard it is for you to lie and pass
 Thus you have made yourself a lying wonder
 Fools and their pastimes should not part asunder.
 —1983 (WRITTEN C. 1621)

³ Hermaphrodite Possessing both male and female sexual organs; often used pejoratively to describe a mannish woman or an effeminate man.

⁴ pot Drinking vessel (for liquor).

⁵ glass Mirror, but here perhaps also drinking-glass.

 IN CONTEXT

The Occasion of "Railing Rhymes"

Wroth's "Railing Rhymes" was written in response to the following attack by Lord Denny.

Edward Denny, Baron of Waltham, To Pamphilia from the Father-in-Law of Seralius (c. 1621)¹

Hermaphrodite in show, in deed a monster
 As by thy words and works all men may conster^o construe
 Thy wrathful spite conceived an Idle^o book worthless
 Brought forth a fool which like the dam doth look
 5 Wherein thou strikes at some man's noble blood
 Of kin to thine² if thine be counted good Whose vain comparison for want^o of wit lack
 Takes up the oystershell to play with it
 Yet common oysters such as thine gape wide
 10 And take in pearls or worse at every tide
 Both friend and foe to thee are even alike
 Thy wit runs mad not caring who it strike
 These slanderous flying f[l]ames rise from the pot
 For potted wits inflamed are raging hot
 15 How easy wer't to pay thee with thine own
 Returning that which thou thyself hast thrown
 And write a thousand lies of thee at least
 And by thy lines describe a drunken beast
 This were no more to thee than thou hast done
 20 A Thread but of thine own which thou hast spun
 By which thou plainly seest in thine own glass
 How easy 'tis to bring a lie to pass
 Thus hast thou made thyself a lying wonder
 Fools and their Babbles seldom part asunder
 25 Work o th' Works leave idle books alone
 For wise and worthier women have writ none.
 —1983 (WRITTEN C. 1621)

¹ Seralius A character in Wroth's court pastoral The Countess of Montgomery's Urania (1621), whose satirical resemblance to Denny's son-in-law was transparent enough to suggest embarrassing parallels to a recent Denny family scandal. Denny wrote angry letters to Wroth demanding withdrawal of her book and circulated this poem questioning her honesty and the appropriateness of a woman pursuing the vocation of writing.

² Of kin to thine As good, or noble, as yours.

THOMAS HOBBS

1588 – 1679

Thomas Hobbes was active in the study of geometry, optics, physics, psychology, language, and religion, but he is best known as the author of Leviathan, a seminal work of political and moral philosophy. His writings have remained the subject of controversy—not least of all his contention that the life of one who exists in a state of nature is “solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short.” In his own time Hobbes had to contend with more severe criticism by the Royalists, the Parliamentarians, and the Church, all of which at various times found his writings to be seditious; the reading of his works was at one time banned by both the Church and Oxford University. Many objected to his materialist assertions that a person attains knowledge only by way of sensory impressions and not by divine transference (Hobbes said “the universe is corporeal; all that is real is material, and what is not material is not real”), and that moral behavior is best only because it is rational to live a moral life and not because God wills people to do so.

Hobbes was born in Wiltshire, England, in the year of the Spanish Armada (1588); rumors had it that his premature birth had been brought on by his mother’s fear of an attack. He was raised after the age of seven by his uncle, who took responsibility when Thomas Hobbes Sr., a parson, fled the family after a violent argument with another vicar. Hobbes appears not to have suffered intellectually from this upheaval, however—he translated Euripides’s Medea from Greek to Latin during his formative years and entered Oxford University at the age of 15. After graduation he became tutor to the son of William Cavendish, Baron Hardwick (later the Earl of Devonshire), and indeed he would spend most of his life as a tutor. Hobbes accompanied the younger Cavendish on a European tour in 1610, and on this and subsequent trips overseas he met and befriended such important thinkers as Galileo and René Descartes (Hobbes wrote a famous refutation of Descartes’s Meditations), all of whom influenced his theories of mathematics and natural science.

Hobbes continued translating throughout his life, first publishing Thucydides’s Eight Books of the Peloponnesian War in 1629, long after he had completed the translation. The purpose of the book, he says in the introduction, is to “instruct and enable men, by the knowledge of actions past, to bear themselves prudently in the present and providently towards the future.” In one of the first texts authored and published by Hobbes, Elements of Law, Natural and Politic (1642), which he called a “scientific treatment of politics,” he responded to the political and civil unrest during the reign of Charles I by arguing for the right of the monarchy to absolute power. The contentious nature of the book and its appearance at the time of the King’s dissolution of Parliament and the beginning of the Civil War caused Hobbes to flee to Paris, where he lived in exile for over a decade, there tutoring the future king, Charles II, and beginning his work on an important philosophical trilogy concerning politics (De Cive, 1642), matter (De Corpore, 1655), and human nature (De Homine, 1658).

The crux of the argument in Leviathan (1651) has its basis in the upheaval of the Civil War in England (1642–48). The work outlines Hobbes’s theories about the necessity for a civilized society to live under the rule of government and abide obediently by its laws in order to exist in security. A sovereign power, Hobbes thought, is in the best position to make decisions regarding the welfare of its people and should be given absolute authority to rule over its constituents. He did not, however, specify that the “sovereign power” need be a king or queen, and because of this, when Leviathan appeared, Hobbes found himself in danger on the Continent, as the Royalists, who were also living in exile, interpreted his political stance as supportive of Cromwell’s reign.

Leviathan’s argument was founded on a defense of reason, which Hobbes saw as having as a natural goal self-preservation and the avoidance of war and violent death. Rather than living in a state of nature (i.e., without laws), people are better able in the long term to protect themselves against the threat of anarchy and civil war by banding together and giving themselves up to sovereign rule. They are then obliged to abide unquestioningly by the sovereign’s laws, and, in essence, to let government become the “voice of the people.” While Hobbes’s doctrines were from one angle supportive of the sovereign power of the monarch, they were revolutionary in deriving justifications for that power from the common interests of the people and not from any divine right.

Hobbes lived to 91, an extraordinary age for someone of his day. He did not cease work in his final decade, but wrote his autobiography, translated Homer’s Iliad and Odyssey, and completed work on Behemoth (authorized version published 1682), a history of the Civil War period in the form of a dialogue.

THE INTRODUCTION

Nature (the art whereby God hath made and governs the world) is by the art of man, as in many other things, so in this also imitated, that it can make an artificial animal. For seeing life is but a motion of limbs, the beginning whereof is in some principal part within, why may we not say that all automata (engines that move themselves by springs and wheels as doth a watch) have an artificial life? For what is the heart, but a spring; and the nerves, but so many strings; and the joints, but so many wheels, giving motion to the whole body, such as was intended by the Artificer? Art goes yet further, imitating that rational and most excellent work of nature, man. For by art is created that great Leviathan called a Commonwealth, or State (in Latin, Civitas), which is but an artificial man, though of greater stature and strength than the natural, for whose protection and defense it was intended; and in which the sovereignty is an artificial soul, as giving life and motion to the whole body. The magistrates and other officers of judicature and execution, artificial joints. Reward and punishment (by which fastened to the seat of the sovereignty, every joint and member is moved to perform his duty) are the nerves that do the same in the body natural. The wealth and riches of all the particular members are the strength. Salus populi (the people's safety) its business. Counsellors, by whom all things needful for it to know are suggested unto it, are the memory. Equity and laws, an artificial reason and will. Concord, health. Sedition, sickness. And civil war, death. Lastly, the pacts and covenants by which the parts of this body politic were at first made, set together, and united, resemble that fiat,¹ or the "Let us make man,"² pronounced by God in the Creation.

To describe the nature of this artificial man, I will consider: first, the matter thereof, and the artificer, both which is Man. Secondly, how, and by what covenants it is made; what are the rights and just power or authority of a sovereign; and what it is that preserveth and dissolveth it. Thirdly, what is a Christian Commonwealth. Lastly, what is the Kingdom of Darkness.

Concerning the first, there is a saying much usurped of late that wisdom is acquired, not by reading of books, but of men. Consequently whereunto, those persons, that for the most part can give no other proof of being wise, take great delight to show what they think they have read in men by uncharitable censures of one another behind their backs. But there is another saying, not of late understood, by which they might learn truly to read one another, if they would take the pains, and that is nosce teipsum, read thyself, which was not meant, as it is now used, to countenance either the barbarous state of men in power towards their inferiors or to encourage men of low degree to a saucy behavior towards their betters, but to teach us that for the similitude of the thoughts and passions of one man to the thoughts and passions of another, whosoever looketh into himself and considereth what he doth when he does think, opine, reason, hope, fear, etc., and upon what grounds, he shall thereby read and know what are the thoughts and passions of all other men upon the like occasions. I say the similitude of passions, which are the same in all men, desire, fear, hope, etc., not the similitude of the objects of the passions, which are the things desired, feared, hoped, etc.; for these the constitution individual and particular education do so vary, and they are so easy to be kept from our knowledge that the characters of man's heart, blotted and confounded as they are with dissembling, lying, counterfeiting, and erroneous doctrines are legible only to him that searcheth hearts. And though by men's actions we do discover their design sometimes; yet to do it without comparing them with our own and distinguishing all circumstances by which the case may come to be altered is to decipher without a key and be for the most part deceived by too much trust or by too much diffidence, as he that reads is himself a good or evil man.

But let one man read another by his actions never so perfectly, it serves him only with his acquaintance, which are but few. He that is to govern a whole nation must read in himself, not this or that particular man, but mankind, which though it be hard to do, harder than to learn any language or science; yet when I shall have set down my own reading orderly and perspicuously, the pains left another will be only to consider if he also find not the same in himself. For this kind of doctrine admitteth no other demonstration.

CHAPTER 13: OF THE NATURAL CONDITION OF MANKIND AS CONCERNING THEIR FELICITY AND MISERY

Nature hath made men so equal in the faculties of body and mind, as that, though there be found one man sometimes manifestly stronger in body or of quicker mind than another, yet when all is reckoned together, the difference between man and man is not so considerable as that one man can thereupon claim to himself any benefit to which another may not pretend as well as he. For as to the strength of body, the weakest has strength enough to kill the strongest, either by secret machination or by confederacy with others that are in the same danger with himself.

And as to the faculties of the mind, setting aside the arts grounded upon words, and especially that skill of proceeding upon general and infallible rules, called science, which very few have and but in few things, as being not a native faculty born with us, nor attained, as prudence, while we look after somewhat else, I find yet a greater equality amongst men than that of strength. For prudence is but experience, which equal time equally bestows on all men in those things they equally apply themselves unto. That which may perhaps make such equality incredible is but a vain conceit of one's own wisdom, which almost all men think they have in a greater degree than the vulgar, that is, than all men but themselves and a few others, whom by fame or for concurring with themselves, they approve. For such is the nature of men that howsoever they may acknowledge many others to be more witty or more eloquent or more learned, they will hardly believe there be many so wise as themselves, for they see their own wit at hand and other men's at a distance. But this proveth rather that men are in that point equal, than unequal. For there is not ordinarily a greater sign of the equal distribution of anything than that every man is contented with his share.

² "Let us make man" From Genesis 1.26.

From this equality of ability ariseth equality of hope in the attaining of our ends. And therefore if any two men desire the same thing, which nevertheless they cannot both enjoy, they become enemies, and in the way to their end (which is principally their own conservation, and sometimes their delectation only) endeavour to destroy or subdue one another. And from hence it comes to pass that where an invader hath no more to fear than another man's single power, if one plant, sow, build, or possess a convenient seat, others may probably be expected to come prepared with forces united to dispossess and deprive him, not only of the fruit of his labour, but also of his life or liberty. And the invader again is in the like danger of another.

And from this diffidence of one another, there is no way for any man to secure himself so reasonable as anticipation, that is, by force or wiles, to master the persons of all men he can so long till he see no other power great enough to endanger him; and this is no more than his own conservation requireth, and is generally allowed. Also, because there be some that, taking pleasure in contemplating their own power in the acts of conquest, which they pursue farther than their security requires, if others, that otherwise would be glad to be at ease within modest bounds, should not by invasion increase their power, they would not be able,

long time, by standing only on their defence, to subsist. And by consequence, such augmentation of dominion over men being necessary to a man's conservation, it ought to be allowed him.

Again, men have no pleasure (but on the contrary a great deal of grief) in keeping company where there is no power able to overawe them all. For every man looketh that his companion should value him at the same rate he sets upon himself, and upon all signs of contempt or undervaluing naturally endeavours, as far as he dares (which amongst them that have no common power to keep them in quiet is far enough to make them destroy each other), to extort a greater value from his contempters,¹ by damage; and from others, by the example.

So that in the nature of man, we find three principal causes of quarrel. First, competition; secondly, diffidence; thirdly, glory.

The first maketh men invade for gain; the second, for safety; and the third, for reputation. The first use violence to make themselves masters of other men's persons, wives, children, and cattle; the second, to defend them; the third, for trifles, as a word, a smile, a different opinion, and any other sign of undervalue, either direct in their persons or by reflection in their kindred, their friends, their nation, their profession, or their name.

Hereby it is manifest that during the time men live without a common power to keep them all in awe, they are in that condition which is called war; and such a war as is of every man against every man. For war consisteth not in battle only, or the act of fighting, but in a tract of time, wherein the will to contend by battle is sufficiently known; and therefore the notion of time is to be considered in the nature of war, as it is in the nature of weather. For as the nature of foul weather lieth not in a shower or two of rain, but in an inclination thereto of many days together, so the nature of war consisteth not in actual fighting, but in the known disposition thereto during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary. All other time is peace.

Whatsoever therefore is consequent to a time of war, where every man is enemy to every man, the same consequent to the time wherein men live without other security than what their own strength and their own invention shall furnish them withal. In such condition

there is no place for industry, because the fruit thereof is uncertain; and consequently no culture of the earth; no navigation, nor use of the commodities that may be imported by sea; no commodious building; no instruments of moving and removing such things as require much force; no knowledge of the face of the earth; no account of time; no arts; no letters; no society; and which is worst of all, continual fear, and danger of violent death; and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short.

It may seem strange to some man that has not well weighed these things that nature should thus dissociate and render men apt to invade and destroy one another; and he may therefore, not trusting to this inference, made from the passions, desire perhaps to have the same confirmed by experience. Let him therefore consider with himself; when taking a journey, he arms himself and seeks to go well accompanied; when going to sleep, he locks his doors; when even in his house he locks his chests; and this when he knows there be laws and public officers, armed to revenge all injuries shall be done him; what opinion he has of his fellow subjects, when he rides armed; of his fellow citizens, when he locks his doors; and of his children, and servants, when he locks his chests. Does he not there as much accuse mankind by his actions as I do by my words? But neither of us accuse man's nature in it. The desires and other passions of man are in themselves no sin. No more are the actions that proceed from those passions till they know a law that forbids them; which, till laws be made, they cannot know; nor can any law be made till they have agreed upon the person that shall make it.

It may peradventure be thought there was never such a time nor condition of war as this; and I believe it was never generally so, over all the world; but there are many places where they live so now. For the savage people in many places of America, except the government of small families, the concord whereof dependeth on natural lust, have no government at all, and live at this day in that brutish manner, as I said before. Howsoever, it may be perceived what manner of life there would be, where there were no common power to fear, by the manner of life which men that have formerly lived under a peaceful government use to degenerate into a civil war.

But though there had never been any time wherein particular men were in a condition of war one against another; yet in all times kings and persons of sovereign authority, because of their independency, are in continual jealousies, and in the state and posture of gladiators, having their weapons pointing and their eyes fixed on one another, that is, their forts, garrisons, and guns upon the frontiers of their kingdoms, and continual spies upon their neighbours, which is a posture of war. But because they uphold thereby the industry of their subjects, there does not follow from it that misery which accompanies the liberty of particular men.

To this war of every man against every man, this also is consequent: that nothing can be unjust. The notions of right and wrong, justice and injustice, have there no place. Where there is no common power, there is no law; where no law, no injustice. Force and fraud are in war the two cardinal virtues. Justice and injustice are none of the faculties neither of the body nor mind. If they were, they might be in a man that were alone in the world, as well as his senses and passions. They are qualities that relate to men in society, not in solitude. It is consequent also to the same condition that there be no propriety,¹ no dominion, no mine and thine distinct, but only that to be every man's that he can get, and for so long as he can keep it. And thus much for the ill condition which man by mere nature is actually placed in, though with a possibility to come out of it, consisting partly in the passions, partly in his reason.

The passions that incline men to peace are fear of death, desire of such things as are necessary to commodious living, and a hope by their industry to obtain them. And reason suggesteth convenient articles of peace upon which men may be drawn to agreement. These articles are they which otherwise are called the laws of nature, whereof I shall speak more particularly in the two following chapters.

ROBERT HERRICK

Of the “sons of Ben” who basked in the genius of Ben Jonson in 1620s London, Robert Herrick is the poet most familiar to modern readers—more so, to many readers, than Jonson himself. “Gather ye Rosebuds while ye may,” the opening line of Herrick’s “To the Virgins, to make much of Time,” is the most famous version of a classical refrain, while poems such as “Delight in Disorder” and “The Hock Cart” are fixtures in anthologies. That Herrick’s fame rests on a few crystalline lyrics obscures the fact that he possessed a fairly varied repertoire. Herrick emulated Jonson (whom he called “Saint Ben”) not only in editing and publishing his own complete works but also in cultivating and “Englishing” a number of classical poets. Herrick’s Hesperides (1634) contains epigrams, epistles, odes, eclogues, and other lyric forms—over 1,400 poems in all—on a variety of themes. The pastoral features prominently in Hesperides, as does the amorous (158 poems are addressed to 14 separate mistresses, most of whom seem to be the products of Herrick’s literary imagination) and the political; poems such as “Upon Julia’s Clothes” express an aesthetics of sensuality. The best of these poems had been circulating in manuscript for decades before they were published, and some had become popular songs, set to music by Henry Lawes and others.

Hesperides appeared during a period of political upheaval and civil war, and achieved little notice in Herrick’s lifetime. Its often light bucolic tone did not match the seriousness of the time; its occasional indecency offended some; and His Noble Numbers, the religious verse appended to it, seemed flat and undistinguished. No separate volume of Herrick’s poetry was published again until 1810, but once his poetry had been rediscovered the romantic attraction to pastoral and rural themes made Herrick popular with nineteenth-century anthologists. If subsequent critics have never quite endorsed Algernon Charles Swinburne’s extravagant praise of Herrick as “the greatest song-writer ever born of English race,” recent consensus has raised his status among mid-seventeenth-century poets thanks to a deeper appreciation of his cunning and delicate artistry, the clever scope and organization of Hesperides, and the political implications of his celebration of traditional rites and pastimes.

The son of a London goldsmith, Herrick apprenticed in that craft before attending Cambridge, from which he graduated in 1617. After years spent mostly in London, cultivating patrons and literary friendships with Ben Jonson and others, he moved to Devonshire to become vicar of Dean Prior in 1629. Ousted from his living by the triumphant Parliamentary forces in 1647, Herrick, in “His Returne to London,” shed no tears for “the dull confines of the drooping West,” indeed lamenting the economic necessity that had condemned him to such “a long and irksome banishment.” He returned to Dean Prior at his own request after the Restoration in 1660, however, to live out the remainder of his bachelor’s life ministering to his “rude” flock.

In “Discontents in Devon,” Herrick confesses his ambivalence toward country life: “I ne’er invented such / Ennobled numbers for the Presse / Then where I loath’d so much.” In fact, the Epicurean bent of Herrick’s classical models had prepared him well for versifying the joys of the natural world and infusing them with the echoes of what Puritans (doubtless correctly) thought the residual paganism he found in rural festivals and rituals, as he does impeccably in “Corinna’s Gone A-Maying.” In “The Argument of His Book,” his verse preface to Hesperides, he announces himself as a poet of nature (as it was perceived in his day), ceremony, and “Times trans-shifting,” linking natural cycles and the transience of nature’s creatures to the inevitability of aging and death. Just as the title of his book recalls the island garden of classical myth (a sea-guarded place of golden apples, maidens, and a vigilant dragon), Herrick views nature and the natural cycles of work and play, including festivals and holidays, as providing shelter against the ravages of time, mortality, and civil strife. An ardent Royalist, Herrick would also have approved of the political role such rural festivals played in reinforcing traditional hierarchies and social stability. Not surprisingly, these holidays (including “Sunday sports”) had been espoused and encouraged in the Book of Sports issued by the Stuart kings, but deplored and condemned by the Puritans as profanations of the Sabbath and excuses for drunkenness. Herrick’s conservative politics and his natural Epicureanism leave no doubt as to his stand on the issue. From his classical models, Herrick had learned to express a carefully cultivated simplicity of outlook that sets him apart from the smooth urbanity and self-conscious sophistication of the Cavalier poets and the strenuous spiritual strivings of the metaphysical poets. For Herrick, or at least for the persona he constructs, mortality must either be confronted by seizing and enjoying the pleasures of today (Carpe diem, as the Romans put it) or transcended by achieving poetic immortality. Although he seems to have been a sincere Christian and wrote some fine religious verse, “To live merrily, and to trust to Good Verses,” the memorable title of one of his lyrics, might be cited as Herrick’s ultimate advice to posterity.

The Argument¹ of His Book

I sing of brooks, of blossoms, birds, and bowers,
 Of April, May, of June, and July flowers.
 I sing of Maypoles, hock carts, wassails, wakes,²
 Of bridegrooms, brides, and of their bridal cakes.

 I write of groves, of twilights, and I sing
 The court of Mab,⁴ and of the fairy king.
 I write of hell; I sing (and ever shall)
 Of Heaven, and hope to have it after all.

His Farewell to Sack

Farewell, thou thing, time-past so known, so dear
 To me as blood to life and spirit; near,

⁹ smell of the lamp Labored and turgid, the product of study, not inspiration.

*Corinna's Going A-Maying*¹

Get up! get up for shame! the blooming morn
 Upon her wings presents the god unshorn.²
 See how Aurora³ throws her fair
 Fresh-quilted colors through the air:
 5 Get up, sweet slug-a-bed, and see
 The dew bespangling herb and tree.
 Each flower has wept, and bowed toward the east
 Above an hour since, yet you not dressed;
 Nay, not so much as out of bed?
 10 When all the birds have matins⁴ said,
 And sung their thankful hymns: 'tis sin,
 Nay, profanation to keep in,
 Whenas a thousand virgins on this day
 Spring, sooner than the lark, to fetch in May.⁵
 15 Rise, and put on your foliage, and be seen
 To come forth, like the springtime, fresh and green,
 And sweet as Flora.⁶ Take no care
 For jewels for your gown or hair;
 Fear not; the leaves will strew
 20 Gems in abundance upon you;
 Besides, the childhood of the day has kept,
 Against^o you come, some orientpearls unwept; until
 Come and receive them⁷ while the light
 Hangs on the dew-locks of the night,
 25 And Titan^o on the eastern hill the sun

¹ A-Maying Celebrating May Day, especially by gathering spring flowers and greenery.

² god unshorn Apollo, the sun god of classical mythology, often pictured with long, brilliant, streaming hair suggesting the rays of the sun, and also often identified with the advent of spring.

³ Aurora Roman goddess of the dawn.

⁴ matins Morning prayers.

⁵ fetch in May Bring in the month of May; also a pun on "may" as a common word for the blossoms of the hawthorn, which were gathered ("fetched in") on May Day and whose white or pinkish hue was suggestive of virginity.

⁶ Flora Roman goddess of flowers and spring.

⁷ receive them According to English rural tradition, young girls could ensure their future beauty by washing themselves in the dew of the hawthorn on May Day.

Till you come forth. Wash, dress, be brief in praying:
 Few beads⁸ are best, when once we go a-Maying.

Come, my Corinna, come; and coming, mark
 30 How each field turns^o a street; each street a park becomes Made green and trimmed with trees; see how Devotion gives each house a bough,
 Or branch: each porch, each door, ere this,
 An ark, a tabernacle is,
 35 Made up of whitethorn neatly interwove;⁹
 As if here were those cooler shades of love.
 Can such delights be in the street
 And open fields, and we not see 't?
 Come, we'll abroad;^o and let's obey go out
 40 The proclamation¹⁰ made for May,
 And sin no more, as we have done, by staying;
 But, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

There's not a budding boy, or girl, this day
 But is got up and gone to bring in May;
 45 A deal^o of youth, ere this, is come multitude
 Back, and with whitethorn laden, home.
 Some have dispatched their cakes and cream,
 Before that we have left to dream:¹¹
 And some have wept, and wooed, and plighted troth,
 50 And chose their priest, ere we can cast off sloth.
 Many a green-gown¹² has been given,
 Many a kiss, both odd and even;
 Many a glance, too, has been sent
 From out the eye, love's firmament;
 55 Many a jest told of the keys betraying
 This night, and locks picked; yet we're not a-Maying.

⁸ beads Prayers, or beads of a rosary.

⁹ Devotion ... interwove According to ancient rural custom (eventually tailored to Christian belief), hawthorn boughs were placed above a doorway on May Day to confer blessing on the dwelling.

¹⁰ proclamation Referring to a royal "Declaration concerning lawful sports" (1613, 1633), which encouraged traditional pastimes such as maypoles and May games to counter puritan Sabbatarianism.

¹¹ Before ... dream Before we have ceased to dream, i.e., awoken.

¹² green-gown Gown grass-stained from amorous sport.

Come, let us go while we are in our prime,
 And take the harmless folly of the time.
 We shall grow old apace, and die
 60 Before we know our liberty.
 Our life is short, and our days run
 As fast away as does the sun;
 And as a vapor or a drop of rain,
 Once lost, can ne'er be found again,
 65 So when or you or I are made
 A fable, song, or fleeting shade,
 All love, all liking, all delight
 Lies drowned with us in endless night.
 Then while time serves, and we are but decaying,
 70 Come, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
 Old time is still a-flying;¹
 And this same flower that smiles today,
 Tomorrow will be dying.
 5 The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun,
 The higher he's a-getting;
 The sooner will his race be run,²
 And nearer he's to setting.
 That age is best, which is the first,
 10 When youth and blood are warmer;
 But being spent, the worse, and worst
 Times still succeed the former.
 Then be not coy, but use your time,
 And while ye may, go marry;
 15 For having lost but once your prime,
 You may for ever tarry.

² his race be run The sun's movement was pictured in Greek mythology as the chariot of Phoebus Apollo racing across the sky.

The Hock-Cart,³ or Harvest Home

*To the Right Honorable, Mildmay,
 Earl of Westmoreland⁴*

Come, sons of summer, by whose toil,
 We are the lords of wine and oil;
 By whose tough labors, and rough hands,
 We rip up first, then reap our lands.
 5 Crowned with the ears of corn, now come,
 And, to the pipe, sing harvest home.
 Come forth, my Lord, and see the cart
 Dressed up with all the country art.
 See, here a maukin,⁵ there a sheet,
 10 As spotless pure, as it is sweet,
 The horses, mares, and frisking fillies,
 (Clad, all, in linen, white as lilies).
 The harvest swains,^o and wenches bound peasant lads
 For joy, to see the hock-cart crowned.
 15 About the cart, hear how the rout^o crowd
 Of rural younglings raise the shout,
 Pressing before, some coming after,
 Those with a shout and these with laughter.
 Some bless the cart, some kiss the sheaves;
 20 Some prank^o them up with oaken leaves: dress
 Some cross^o the fill-horse,^o sit astride / shaft-horse
 some with great
 Devotion stroke the home-borne wheat:
 While other rustics, less attent^o attentive
 To prayers, than to merriment,
 25 Run after with their breeches rent.
 Well, on, brave boys, to your Lord's hearth,
 Glittering with fire; where, for your mirth,
 Ye shall see first the large and chief
 Foundation of your feast, fat beef:
 30 With upper stories, mutton, veal,
 And bacon,^o (which makes full the meal) pork
 With several dishes standing by,
 As here a custard, there a pie,

³ Hock-Cart The hock-cart, or "high cart" (because piled high), was the last wagon load of the harvest.

⁴ Mildmay ... Westmoreland Mildmay Fane was Herrick's friend and patron; he published a collection of his own poetry, Otia Sacra (1648).

⁵ maukin Rag doll, made of cloths.

And here all tempting frumenty.¹

35 And for to make the merry cheer,
If smirking wine be wanting here,
There's that, which drowns all care, stout beer:
Which freely drink to your Lord's health,
Then to the plough, (the common-wealth),
40 Next to your flails, your fanes, your vats;²
Then to the maids with wheaten° hats:
To the rough sickle, and crook'd sythe,
Drink, frolic boys, till all be blithe.

Feed, and grow fat; and as ye eat,
45 Be mindful, that the laboring neat,°
As you, may have their fill of meat.
And know, besides, ye must revoke°
The patient ox unto the yoke,
And all go back unto the plow
50 And harrow, though they're hanged up now.
And, you must know, your Lord's word's true,
Feed him ye must, whose food fills you,
And that this pleasure is like rain,
Not sent ye for to drown your pain,
55 But for to make it spring again.

GEORGE HERBERT

1593 – 1633

Although his contribution to English poetry consists of a single volume, The Temple, George Herbert stands in the first rank of the poets of the seventeenth century and, indeed, of all English lyric poets. Born into wealth and privilege, he chose instead a life dedicated to the power of faith and poetry, dying a humble country parson. An early friend and poetic disciple of John Donne, he left behind Donne's learned abstruseness and fashioned instead a modestly artful music that overleaps sectarian boundaries. Immensely influential on the devotional poets of his own century, Herbert in the eighteenth century was celebrated perhaps more for his piety than his poetry. (John Wesley, for instance, turned a number of Herbert's lyrics into hymns, some of which are still sung.) In the nineteenth century his reputation waned, though he was deeply admired by a few major figures, including Coleridge, Emerson, and Hopkins. In the twentieth century Herbert rejoined the poetic mainstream when T.S. Eliot, in his influential 1921 essay "The Metaphysical Poets," lamented the modern "dissociation of sensibility" and praised Herbert as one of the last poets to have consummated a true fusion of feeling and intellect.

George Herbert was born in 1593, the fifth son of a prominent landowning family in the Welsh Border Country. His eldest brother, Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, was a noted philosopher and diplomat. Raised by their widowed mother Magdalen, an intelligent and strong-willed woman, the Herbert children benefited from a sound education and a lively environment that included a close family friendship with John Donne. George Herbert attended Westminster School in London and later Trinity College at Cambridge, where he stayed on as a tutor and lecturer. His appointment as Public Orator there in 1620 made him spokesman for the University. Able, urbane, and ambitious, Herbert aspired to political prominence, and was named as Member of Parliament in 1624. Soon after, however, with the ascension of a new monarch and the fall from favor of influential friends such as Francis Bacon, Herbert's political fortunes dimmed and his health began to fail. A devoted Anglican all his life, he began to turn more seriously toward the Church, and was ordained deacon in 1624. When his mother died in 1627, John Donne delivered her funeral oration, and Herbert commemorated her with a collection of Latin and Greek verse, Memoriae Matris Sacrum.

For the next few years Herbert seems to have lived quietly with friends, nursing his health, pursuing his religious vocation, and writing much of the devotional poetry in English for which he was to become famous. He married in 1629, was ordained a priest in 1630, and devoted his remaining years to his small country parish at Bemerton, near Salisbury. Herbert died in 1633, releasing for publication on his deathbed The Temple: Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations,¹ a meticulously crafted compilation of devotional and meditative verse that was to achieve immediate popularity, running through at least eleven editions in the seventeenth century alone.

Herbert had been writing poetry as early as 1610, when, in two sonnets sent as a gift to his mother, he declared his intention to consecrate his poetic gifts to the glory of God rather than to erotic or romantic love. With the exception of some occasional pieces and a collection of polemical Latin epigrams written during his tenure as Public Orator, he remained true to his word.

As a collection, The Temple is an intricately structured whole, with numerous correspondences and connections among its almost 170 poems. Herbert establishes resonant patterns that link the physical space of the church with the interior space of the human heart, and the cycle of the church year with the spiritual journey of both the individual believer and humanity as a whole. The poems themselves reflect the subtle spiritual struggles of the everyday inner life. Herbert shows the influence of John Donne in his affinity for plain diction and the rhythms of colloquial speech, but he consciously avoids the elaborate conceits, scholarly allusions, and self-dramatizing spiritual anguish found in Donne's devotional verse. Simplicity, or the artfulness of seeming artless, is one of the central themes of Herbert's poetry, and generations of readers and poets have admired Herbert's exquisite craftsmanship, emotional directness, modest wit, elegance and concision of language, and ability to create connections among poetic form, language, and meaning.

The Altar

A broken ALTAR, Lord thy servant rears,
 Made of a heart, and cemented with tears:¹
 Whose parts are as thy hand did frame;
 No workman's tool hath touched the same.²

5 A HEART alone
 Is such a stone,
 As nothing but
 Thy pow'r doth cut.
 Wherefore^o each part accordingly
 10 Of my hard heart
 Meets in this frame,
 To praise thy name.
 That, if I chance to hold my peace,
 These stones to praise thee may not cease.³

15 O let thy blessed SACRIFICE be mine,
 And sanctify this ALTAR to be thine.

Redemption

Having been tenant long to a rich Lord,
 Not thriving, I resolved to be bold,
 And make a suit unto him, to afford^o grant
 A new small-rented lease, and cancel th' old.

5 In heaven at his manor I him sought:
 They told me there, that he was lately gone
 About some land, which he had dearly bought
 Long since on earth, to take possession.
 I straight returned, and knowing his great birth,
 10 Sought him accordingly in great resorts;
 In cities, theatres, gardens, parks, and courts:
 At length I heard a ragged noise and mirth
 Of thieves and murderers: there I him espied,
 Who straight, Your suit is granted, said, and died.

Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store,

Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store,
 Though foolishly he lost the same,
 Decaying more and more,
 Till he became
 Most poor:
 With thee
 O let me rise
 As larks, harmoniously,
 And sing this day thy victories:
 Then shall the fall further the flight in me.

My tender age in sorrow did begin:
 And still with sicknesses and shame
 Thou didst so punish sin,
 That I became
 Most thin.
 With thee
 Let me combine,
 And feel this day thy victory:
 For, if I limp² my wing on thine,
 Affliction shall advance the flight in me.

—1633

The poem "Easter Wings" as it appeared in the 1633 edition of The Temple.

² imp Graft feathers from one falcon onto the wing of another, a technique used in falconry to mend damaged wings and improve flight.

Affliction (1)

When first thou didst entice to thee my heart,
 I thought the service brave:^o splendid
 So many joys I writ down for my part,
 Besides what I might have 5 Out of my stock of natural delights,
 Augmented with thy gracious benefits.

I looked on thy furniture so fine,
 And made it fine to me:
 Thy glorious household-stuff did me entwine,
 And 'tice^o me unto thee. entice
 10 Such stars I counted mine: both heav'n and earth
 Paid me my wages in a world of mirth.

What pleasures could I want, whose King I served?
 Where joys my fellows were.
 15 Thus argued into hopes, my thoughts reserved
 No place for grief or fear.
 Therefore my sudden¹ soul caught at² the place,
 And made her youth and fierceness seek thy face,

At first thou gav'st me milk and sweetnesses;
 I had my wish and way:
 20 My days were strawed³ with flow'rs and happiness;
 There was no month but May.
 But with my years sorrow did twist and grow,
 And made a party^o unawares^o for woe. faction / unwittingly

My flesh began unto my soul in pain,
 Sicknesses cleave my bones;
 Consuming agues^o dwell in ev'ry vein, fevers
 And tune my breath to groans.
 Sorrow was all my soul; I scarce believed,
 30 Till grief did tell me roundly, that I lived.

When I got health, thou took'st away my life,
 And more; for my friends die:
 My mirth and edge was lost; a blunted knife
 Was of more use than I.

35 Thus thin and lean without a fence or friend,
 I was blown through with ev'ry storm and wind.

Whereas my birth and spirit rather took
 The way that takes the town;
 Thou didst betray me to a ling'ring book,
 40 And wrap me in a gown.⁴
 I was entangled in the world of strife,
 Before I had the power to change my life.

Yet, for I threat'ned oft the siege to raise,
 Not simp'ring all mine age,
 45 Thou often didst with academic praise
 Melt and dissolve my rage.
 I took thy sweet'ned pill, till I came where
 I could not go away, nor persevere.

Yet lest perchance I should too happy be
 In my unhappiness,
 50 Turning my purge to food, thou throwest me
 Into more sicknesses.
 Thus doth thy power cross-bias⁵ me, not making
 Thine own gift good, yet me from my ways taking.

55 Now I am here, what thou wilt do with me
 None of my books will show:
 I read, and sigh, and wish I were a tree;
 For sure then I should grow
 To fruit or shade: at least some bird would trust
 60 Her household to me, and I should be just.

Yet, though thou troublest me, I must be meek;
 In weakness must be stout.
 Well, I will change the service,⁶ and go seek
 Some other master out.
 65 Ah my dear God! though I am clean forgot,
 Let me not love thee, if I love thee not.

—1633

² caught at Eagerly sought.

³ strawed Strewn.

⁴ book ... gown Symbolic book and gown of Herbert's academic life at Cambridge.

⁵ cross-bias Deflect from straight or intended course (a metaphor from the game of bowls as well as a play on Christ's cross).

⁶ service As in domestic service; see also line 2 above.

Prayer (1)

Prayer the Church's banquet, Angels' age,
 God's breath in man returning to his birth,
 The soul in paraphrase, heart in pilgrimage,
 The Christian plummet sounding heav'n and earth;
 5 Engine¹ against th' Almighty, sinners' tower,²
 Reversed thunder, Christ-side-piercing spear,³
 The six-days world transposing in an hour,
 A kind of tune, which all things hear and fear;
 Softness, and peace, and joy, and love, and bliss,
 10 Exalted Manna,⁴ gladness of the best,
 Heaven in ordinary,⁵ man well dressed,
 The milky way, the bird of Paradise,⁶
 Church-bells beyond the stars heard, the soul's blood,
 The land of spices; something understood.
 —1633

The Temper⁷ (1)

How should I praise thee, Lord! How should my rhymes
 Gladly engrave thy love in steel,
 If what my soul doth feel sometimes,
 My soul might ever feel!
 5 Although there were some forty⁸ heav'ns, or more,
 Sometimes I peer above them all;

¹ Engine Instrument of war, such as a catapult or battering-ram; also, a device, a stratagem.

² sinners' tower Alluding to the tower of Babel, in Genesis 11.1–9, and also, perhaps, to the siege tower as an engine of war.

³ Christ ... spear From John 19.34.

⁴ Manna Food supplied by God to the Israelites in Exodus 16.15.

⁵ ordinary Everyday clothing.

⁶ bird of Paradise Tropical bird mistakenly believed to reside constantly in the air.

⁷ Temper The title has multiple resonances: temperament, temper as due proportion, tempering as toughening (as in metallurgy), and tempering as tuning (as in making a musical instrument “well-tempered”).

⁸ forty “A hundred” in an early manuscript: not a specific but a generically large number. The idea of multiple heavens appears in the Bible (see e.g., 2 Corinthians 12.2).

Sometimes I hardly reach a score,
 Sometimes to hell I fall.

O rack me not to such a vast extent;
 10 Those distances belong to thee:
 The world's too little for thy tent,
 A grave too big for me.

Wilt thou meet arms with man, that thou dost stretch
 A crumb of dust from heav'n to hell?
 15 Will great God measure with⁹ a wretch?
 Shall he thy stature spell?¹⁰

O let me, when thy roof my soul hath hid,
 O let me roost and nestle there:
 Then of a sinner thou art rid,
 20 And I of hope and fear.

Yet take thy way; for sure thy way is best:
 Stretch or contract me thy poor debtor:
 This is but tuning of my breast,
 To make the music better.

25 Whether I fly with angels, fall with dust,
 Thy hands made both, and I am there:
 Thy power and love, my love and trust,
 Make one place ev'rywhere.
 —1633

Jordan¹¹ (1)

Who says that fictions only and false hair
 Become^o a verse? Is there in truth no beauty? befit
 Is all good structure in a winding stair?

⁹ measure with Be compared with.

¹⁰ spell Both to spell out or express, and to scan or contemplate intently.

¹¹ Jordan The river associated with entry into the Promised Land and Christ's baptism, here meant also to suggest the purity and simplicity of Christian poetry as opposed to the artificiality of secular verse.

May no lines pass, except they do their duty
 5 Not to a true, but painted chair?¹

Is it no verse, except enchanted groves
 And sudden arbours shadow coarse-spun² lines?
 Must purling³ streams refresh a lover's loves?
 Must all be veiled, while he that reads, divines,^o interprets
 10 Catching the sense at two removes?

Shepherds are honest people; let them sing:
 Riddle who list, for me, and pull for Prime:⁴
 I envy no man's nightingale or spring;
 Nor let them punish me with loss of rhyme,
 15 Who plainly say, My God, My King.⁵
 —1633

Church-Monuments

While that my soul repairs to her devotion,
 Here I intomb my flesh, that it betimes^o soon
 May take acquaintance of this heap of dust;
 To which the blast of death's incessant motion,
 5 Fed with the exhalation of our crimes,
 Drives all at last. Therefore I gladly trust

My body to this school, that it may learn
 To spell his elements,⁶ and find his birth
 Written in dusty heraldry and lines:
 10 Which dissolution sure doth best discern,⁷
 Comparing dust with dust, and earth with earth.
 These laugh at jet^o and marble put for signs, black stone

¹ painted chair The meaning here is uncertain. This may be a reference to the ideas of Plato regarding the reality of ideal forms. Some have suggested a reference to the English Royal Throne is intended.

² sudden Unexpected; shadow Camouflage; coarse-spun Shoddy.

³ purling Rippling; babbling.

⁴ Riddle wholist Let those who enjoy riddling do so; pull for Prime Draw for a winning hand at Primero, a fashionable card game.

⁵ My God, My King See Psalms 68.24.

⁶ elements Letters of the alphabet.

⁷ Which ... discern The body best comprehends its own decay.

To sever the good fellowship of dust,
 And spoil the meeting. What shall point out them,
 15 When they shall bow, and kneel, and fall down flat
 To kiss those heaps, which now they have in trust?
 Dear flesh, while I do pray, learn here thy stem⁸
 And true descent; that when thou shalt grow fat,
 And wanton in thy cravings, thou mayst know,
 20 That flesh is but the glass,⁹ which holds the dust
 That measures all our time; which also shall
 Be crumbled into dust. Mark here below
 How tame these ashes are, how free from lust,
 That thou mayst fit thyself against thy fall.¹⁰
 —1633

The Windows

Lord, how can man preach thy eternal word?
 He is a brittle crazy^o glass: cracked
 Yet in thy temple thou dost him afford
 This glorious and transcendent place,
 5 To be a window, through thy grace.

But when thou dost anneal¹¹ in glass thy story,
 Making thy life to shine within
 The holy Preacher's; then the light and glory
 More rev'rend grows, and more doth win:
 10 Which else shows wat'rish, bleak, and thin.

Doctrine and life, colours and light, in one
 When they combine and mingle, bring
 A strong regard and awe: but speech alone
 Doth vanish like a flaring thing,
 15 And in the ear, not conscience ring.
 —1633

⁸ stem Line of ancestry.

⁹ flesh is ... glass A play on "All flesh is grass," Isaiah 40.6, with "glass" here meaning "hourglass."

¹⁰ against thy fall Against the individual body's fall into death, but also the original Fall of humankind into sin and death. See Genesis 3.19: "... for dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."

¹¹ anneal Apply heat to stained glass to fix the colors painted on it.

Denial

Vanity (1)

When my devotions could not pierce
 Thy silent ears;
 Then was my heart broken, as was my verse:
 My breast was full of fears
 And disorder:

My bent thoughts, like a brittle bow,
 Did fly asunder:
 Each took his way; some would to pleasures go,
 Some to the wars and thunder
 Of alarms.

As good go anywhere, they say,
 As to benumb
 Both knees and heart, in crying night and day,
Come, come my God, O come,
 But no hearing.

O that thou shouldst give dust a tongue
 To cry to thee,
 And then not hear it crying! all day long
 My heart was in my knee,
 But no hearing.

Therefore my soul lay out of sight,
 Untuned, unstrung:
 My feeble spirit, unable to look right,
 Like a nipped blossom, hung Discontented.

O cheer and tune my heartless breast,
 Defer no time;¹
 That so thy favours granting my request,
 They and my mind may chime,
 And mend my rhyme.

—1633

The fleet Astronomer can bore,
 And thread the spheres with his quick-piercing mind:
 He views their stations,² walks from door to door,
 Surveys, as if he had designed
 To make a purchase there: he sees their dances,
 And knoweth long before,
 Both their full-eyed aspects,³ and secret glances.

The nimble Diver with his side
 Cuts through the working waves, that he may fetch
 His dearly-earned pearl, which God did hide
 On purpose from the venturous wretch;
 That he might save his life, and also hers,
 Who with excessive pride
 Her own destruction⁴ and his danger wears.

The subtle Chymic⁵ can devest^o unclothe
 And strip the creature naked, till he find
 The callow^o principles within their nest: featherless
 There he imparts to them his mind,
 Admitted to their bed-chamber, before
 They appear trim and dressed
 To ordinary suitors at the door.

What hath not man sought out and found,
 But his dear God? who yet his glorious law
 Embosoms in us, mellowing the ground
 With showers and frosts, with love & awe,
 So that we need not say, Where's this command?
 Poor man, thou searchest round
 To find out death, but missest life at hand.
 —1633

² stations In astronomy, points at the limits of a star's movement, when it appears to stand still; the imagery proceeds to compare the astronomer to a customer surveying the inhabitants of a brothel.

³ aspects In astronomy, the relative positions of stars and planets when seen from earth, but punning on aspect as face or countenance.

⁴ Her own destruction Through the pride that led her to desire the pearl for which the diver risked his life.

⁵ Chymic Scientist (chemist or alchemist).

Virtue

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
 The bridal° of the earth and sky: wedding
 The dew shall weep thy fall tonight;
 For thou must die.

5 Sweet rose, whose hue angry and brave° beautiful; splendid
 Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye:
 Thy root is ever in its grave,
 And thou must die.

10 Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses,
 A box where sweets compacted lie;
 My music shows ye have your closes,¹
 And all must die.

Only a sweet and virtuous soul,
 Like seasoned timber, never gives;° gives way
 15 But though the whole world turn to coal,²
 Then chiefly lives.

—1633

The Pearl. Matth. 13³

I know the ways of learning; both the head
 And pipes that feed the press,⁴ and make it run;
 What reason hath from nature borrowed,
 Or of it self, like a good housewife, spun
 5 In laws and policy; what the stars conspire,
 What willing nature speaks, what forced by fire;⁵
 Both th'old discoveries, and the new-found seas,
 The stock and surplus, cause and history:
 All these stand open, or I have the keys:
 10 Yet I love thee.

¹ closes Conclusions of phrases or themes in music.² turn to coal Be destroyed by fire, as predicted in the Bible.³ Matth. 13 Matthew 13.45–46, the parable of the kingdom of Heaven in which a merchant sells all he owns to purchase the “pearl of great price.”⁴ the head... the press Referring to the printing press, a mechanism that feeds learning, but with a secondary biblical echo of Zechariah 4.12–14, where the olive press is an emblem of divine inspiration.⁵ what forced by fire In scientific (alchemical) experiments.

I know the ways of honour, what maintains
 The quick returns⁶ of courtesy and wit:
 In vies of favours whether party gains,
 When glory swells the heart, and moldeth it
 15 To all expressions both of hand and eye,
 Which on the world a true-love-knot⁷ may tie,
 And bear the bundle,⁸ whereso'er it goes:
 How many drams of spirit there must be
 To sell my life unto my friends or foes:
 20 Yet I love thee.

I know the ways of pleasure, the sweet strains,
 The lullings and the relishes⁹ of it;
 The propositions of hot blood and brains;
 What mirth and music mean; what love and wit
 25 Have done these twenty hundred years, and more:
 I know the projects of unbridled store:
 My stuff is flesh, not brass; my senses live,
 And grumble oft, that they have more in me
 Than he that curbs them,¹⁰ being but one to five:
 30 Yet I love thee.

I know all these, and have them in my hand.
 Therefore not sealed,¹¹ but with open eyes
 I fly to thee, and fully understand
 Both the main sale, and the commodities;
 35 And at what rate and price I have thy love
 With all the circumstances that may move:

⁶ quick returns Witty replies of courtly conversation, with an echo of financial returns or profits.⁷ true-love-knot Ornamental knot used as a symbol of true love, here implying courtship of worldly success.⁸ bear the bundle Referring to burdened servants following their masters.⁹ strains... relishes Pleasure is described in musical terms, respectively melodies, lulling effects of a lullaby, and melodic embellishments.¹⁰ he that curbs them Reason, outnumbered by the five senses.¹¹ sealed “Seeled” in an early manuscript version: to seel was a term in falconry for sewing up the eyelids of a hawk or other bird; “sealed” also suggests a letter or document sealed closed with wax.

Yet through these labyrinths, not my groveling wit,
 But thy silk twist¹ let down from heav'n to me,
 Did both conduct and teach me, how by it
 To climb to thee.

—1633

Man

My God, I heard this day,
 That none doth build a stately habitation,
 But he that means to dwell therein.
 What house more stately hath there been,
 Or can be, than is Man? to^o whose creation
 All things are in decay.

For Man is ev'ry thing,
 And more: He is a tree, yet bears no fruit;
 A beast, yet is, or should be more:
 Reason and speech we only bring.
 Parrots may thank us, if they are not mute,
 They go upon the score.²

Man is all symmetry,
 Full of proportions, one limb to another,
 And all to all the world besides:
 Each part may call the farthest, brother:
 For head with foot hath private amity,
 And both with moons and tides.

Nothing hath got so far,
 But Man hath caught and kept it, as his prey.
 His eyes dismount^o the highest star: bring down
 He is in little^o all the sphere.^o miniature / world
 Herbs gladly cure our flesh; because that they Find their acquaintance there.

¹ labyrinths ... silk twist Evokes the classical story of Theseus: after killing the minotaur, Theseus escapes the labyrinth by following the thread given him by Ariadne. The silk twist "let down from heav'n" also evokes Jacob's ladder (Genesis 28.12), the golden chain let down by Zeus in Homer's Iliad to join heaven and earth, and other biblical references to cords interpreted as references to Christian dependence on divine action.

² They ... score They are in our debt.

For us the winds do blow,
 The earth doth rest, heav'n move, and fountains flow.
 Nothing we see, but means our good,
 As our delight, or as our treasure:
 The whole is, either our cupboard of food,
 Or cabinet of pleasure.

The stars have us to bed;
 Night draws the curtain, which the sun withdraws;
 Music and light attend our head.
 All things unto our flesh are kind^o akin
 In their descent^o and being; to our mind becoming
 In their ascent^o and cause. origin

Each thing is full of duty:
 Waters united are our navigation;
 Distinguished,³ our habitation;
 Below, our drink; above, our meat;
 Both are our cleanliness. Hath one^o such beauty? one thing
 Then how are all things neat?^o excellent

More servants wait on Man,
 Than he'll take notice of: in ev'ry path
 He treads down that which doth befriend him,
 When sickness makes him pale and wan.⁴
 O mighty love! Man is one world, and hath Another to attend him.

Since then, my God, thou hast
 So brave^o a Palace built; O dwell in it, splendid
 That it may dwell with thee at last!
 Till then, afford us so much wit;
 That, as the world serves us, we may serve thee,
 And both thy servants be.

—1633

Jordan (2)

When first my lines of heav'nly joys made mention,
 Such was their lustre, they did so excel,
 That I sought out quaint words, and trim invention;

³ Distinguished Separated.

⁴ He treads ... wan Referring to the herbs mentioned above that "gladly cure our flesh."

My thoughts began to burnish, sprout, and swell,
 5 Curling with metaphors a plain intention,
 Decking° the sense, as if it were to sell. adorning

Thousands of notions in my brain did run,
 Off'ring their service, if I were not sped:° successful
 I often blotted what I had begun;
 10 This was not quick° enough, and that was dead. lively
 Nothing could seem too rich to clothe the sun,
 Much less those joys which trample on his head.

As flames do work and wind, when they ascend,
 So did I weave my self into the sense.
 15 But while I bustled, I might hear a friend
 Whisper, How wide is all this long pretence!
There is in love a sweetness ready penned;
Copy out only that, and save expense.
 —1633

Time

Meeting with Time, slack° thing, said I, remiss
 Thy scythe is dull; whet it for shame.
 No marvel Sir, he did reply,
 If it at length deserve some blame:
 5 But where one man would have me grind it,
 Twenty for one¹ too sharp do find it.

Perhaps some such of old did pass,
 Who above all things loved this life;
 To whom thy scythe a hatchet was,
 10 Which now is but a pruning-knife.
 Christ's coming hath made man thy debtor,
 Since by thy cutting he grows better.

And in his blessing thou art blessed;
 For where thou only wert° before were 15 An executioner at best;
 Thou art a gard'ner now, and more,
 An usher to convey our souls
 Beyond the utmost stars and poles.

And this is that makes life so long,
 20 While it detains us from our God.
 Ev'n pleasures here increase the wrong,
 And length of days lengthen the rod.° punishment
 Who wants° the place, where God doth dwell, lacks
 Partakes already half of hell.

Of what strange length must that needs be,
 Which ev'n eternity excludes!
 Thus far Time heard me patiently:
 Then chafing said, This man deludes:
 What do I here before his door?
 30 He doth not crave less time, but more.
 —1633

The Bunch of Grapes²

Joy, I did lock thee up: but some bad man
 Hath let thee out again:
 And now, methinks, I am where I began
 Sev'n years ago: one vogue and vein,
 5 One air of thoughts usurps my brain.
 I did toward Canaan draw; but now I am
 Brought back to the Red Sea, the sea of shame.³

For as the Jews of old by God's command
 Travelled, and saw no town:
 10 So now each Christian hath his journeys spanned:⁴
 Their story pens and sets us down.
 A single deed is small renown.
 God's works are wide, and let in future times;
 His ancient justice overflows our crimes.

15 Then have we too our guardian fires and clouds;⁵
 Our Scripture-dew drops fast:

² Bunch of Grapes Cluster of grapes brought by scouts to Moses from the Promised Land of Canaan as evidence of its fertility: see Numbers 13.23.

³ I did ... shame On the brink of attaining the Promised Land, the Israelites were condemned by the Lord for their faithlessness to wander the desert for 40 years (thus returning in the direction of the Red Sea): see Numbers 14.22–35.

⁴ spanned Limited.

⁵ guardian ... clouds Cf. Exodus 13.21.

We have our sands and serpents, tents and shrouds;¹
 Alas! our murmurings come not last.
 But where's the cluster? where's the taste
 Of mine inheritance? Lord, if I must borrow,
 Let me as well take up their joy, as sorrow.
 But can he want the grape, who hath the wine?
 I have their fruit and more.
 Blessèd be God, who prospered Noah's vine,²
 And make it bring forth grapes good store.
 But much more him I must adore,
 Who of the law's sour juice sweet wine did make,
 Ev'n God himself, being pressed for my sake.
 —1633

The Collar

I struck the board,^o and cried, No more. table
 I will abroad.^o go abroad; depart
 What? shall I ever^o sigh and pine? always
 My lines and life are free; free as the road,
 Loose as the wind, as large as store.^o abundance
 Shall I be still in suit?³
 Have I no harvest but a thorn
 To let me blood,^o and not restore bleed
 What I have lost with cordial fruit?
 Sure there was wine
 Before my sighs did dry it: there was corn
 Before my tears did drown it.
 Is the year only lost to me?
 Have I no bays^o to crown it? laurel wreaths
 No flowers, no garlands gay? All blasted?
 All wasted?
 Not so, my heart: but there is fruit,
 And thou hast hands.⁴
 Recover all thy sigh-blown age
 On double pleasures: leave thy cold dispute
 Of what is fit, and not. Forsake thy cage,

² Noah's vine Vineyard planted by Noah with the Lord's blessing after the Flood: see Genesis 9.20.

³ in suit In attendance.

⁴ but ... hands An echo of the disobedience that led to the original Fall; see Genesis 3.22: "lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life."

Thy rope of sands,⁵
 Which petty thoughts have made, and made to thee
 Good cable, to enforce and draw,
 And be thy law,
 While thou didst wink⁶ and wouldst not see.
 Away; take heed:
 I will abroad.
 Call in thy death's head^o there: tie up thy fears. skull
 He that forbears^o neglects
 To suit and serve his need,
 Deserves his load.
 But as I raved and grew more fierce and wild
 At every word,
 Me thoughts I heard one calling, Child:
 And I replied, My Lord.
 —1633

The Pulley

When God at first made man,
 Having a glass of blessings standing by,
 Let us (said he) pour on him all we can:
 Let the world's riches, which dispersed lie,
 Contract into a span.⁷
 So strength first made a way;
 Then beauty flowed, then wisdom, honour, pleasure:
 When almost all was out, God made a stay,^o paused
 Perceiving that alone of all his treasure
 Rest in the bottom lay.
 For if I should (said he)
 Bestow this jewel also on my creature,
 He would adore my gifts instead of me,
 And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature:
 So both should losers be.
 Yet let him keep the rest,
 But keep them with repining^o restlessness: fretful

⁵ rope of sands Delusive security. To "twist a rope of sand" is also a proverbial expression of futility.

⁶ wink Shut one's eyes.

⁷ span Distance between the tip of the thumb and little finger of an extended hand.

Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
 If goodness lead him not, yet weariness
 20 May toss him to my breast.
 —1633

The Flower

How fresh, O Lord, how sweet and clean
 Are thy returns! ev'n as the flowers in spring;
 To which, besides their own demean,¹
 The late-past frosts tributes of pleasure bring.
 5 Grief melts away
 Like snow in May,
 As if there were no such cold thing.

Who would have thought my shrivelled heart
 Could have recovered greenness? It was gone
 10 Quite underground; as flowers depart
 To see their mother-root, when they have blown;^o bloomed
 Where they together
 All the hard weather,
 Dead to the world, keep house unknown.

These are thy wonders, Lord of power,
 15 Killing and quick'ning,² bringing down to hell
 And up to heaven in an hour;
 Making a chiming of a passing-bell.³
 We say amiss,
 20 This or that is:
 Thy word is all, if we could spell.^o comprehend

O that I once past changing were,
 Fast in thy Paradise, where no flower can wither!
 Many a spring I shoot up fair,
 25 Off ring at heav'n, growing and groaning thither:
 Nor doth my flower
 Want^o a spring-shower, lack
 My sins and I joining together:

¹ demean Demesne, or estate, where a tenant might pay tributes to the landlord.

² quick'ning Bringing to life.

³ passing-bell Bell tolled to mark a death.

But while I grow in a straight line,
 30 Still upwards bent, as if heav'n were mine own,
 Thy anger comes, and I decline:
 What frost to that? what pole is not the zone,
 Where all things burn,
 When thou dost turn,
 35 And the least frown of thine is shown?

And now in age I bud again,
 After so many deaths I live and write;
 I once more smell the dew and rain,
 And relish versing: O my only light,
 40 It cannot be
 That I am he
 On whom thy tempests fell all night.

These are thy wonders, Lord of love,
 To make us see we are but flowers that glide:⁴
 45 Which when we once can find and prove,⁵
 Thou hast a garden for us, where to bide.
 Who^o would be more, those who
 Swelling through store,^o abundance; wealth
 Forfeit their Paradise by their pride.
 —1633

Discipline

Throw away thy rod,
 Throw away thy wrath:
 O my God,
 Take the gentle path.

5 For my heart's desire
 Unto thine is bent:
 I aspire
 To a full consent.

Not a word or look
 10 I affect to own,
 But by book,
 And thy book alone.

⁴ flowers that glide Flowers that pass away silently, imperceptibly. Cf. Job 14.2: "Man cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; he flieth also like a shadow, and continueth not."

⁵ prove Confirm through experience.

Though I fail, I weep:
 Though I halt in pace,
 15 Yet I creep
 To the throne of grace.

Then let wrath remove;^o
 Love will do the deed:
 For with love
 20 Stony hearts will bleed.

Love is swift of foot;
 Love's a man of war,¹
 And can shoot,
 And can hit from far.

25 Who can scape^o his bow?
 That which wrought^o on thee,
 Brought thee low,
 Needs must work on me.

Throw away thy rod;
 30 Though man frailties hath,
 Thou art God:
 Throw away thy wrath.
 —1633

Death

Death, thou wast once an uncouth hideous thing,
 Nothing but bones,
 The sad effect of sadder groans:
 Thy mouth was open, but thou couldst not sing.

5 For we considered thee as at some six
 Or ten years hence,
 After the loss of life and sense,
 Flesh being turned to dust, and bones to sticks.

We looked on this side of thee, shooting short;
 10 Where we did find
 The shells of fledge² souls left behind,
 Dry dust, which sheds no tears, but may extort.

¹ Love's... war Cf. Exodus 15.3: "The Lord is a man of war." Also, an armed naval vessel.

² fledge Ready to fly.

But since our Saviour's death did put some blood
 Into thy face;
 15 Thou art grown fair and full of grace,
 Much in request, much sought for, as a good.

For we do now behold thee gay and glad,
 As at doomsday;
 When souls shall wear their new array,^o
 20 And all thy bones with beauty shall be clad.

Therefore we can go die as sleep, and trust
 Half that we have
 Unto an honest faithful grave;
 Making our pillows either down, or dust.
 —1633

Love (3)

Love bade me welcome: yet my soul drew back,
 Guilty of dust and sin.
 But quick-eyed Love, observing me grow slack³
 From my first entrance in,
 5 Drew nearer to me, sweetly questioning,
 If I lacked anything.
 A guest, I answered, worthy to be here:
 Love said, You shall be he.
 I the unkind, ungrateful? Ah my dear,
 10 I cannot look on thee.
 Love took my hand, and smiling did reply,
 Who made the eyes but I?
 Truth Lord, but I have marred them: let my shame
 Go where it doth deserve.
 15 And know you not, says Love, who bore the blame?
 My dear, then I will serve.
 You must sit down, says Love, and taste my meat:⁴ So
 I did sit and eat.

—1633

³ grow slack Become hesitant or uncertain.

⁴ My dear... my meat Cf. Luke 12.37: "Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching: verily I say unto you, that he shall gird himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them."

ANDREW MARVELL

1621 – 1678

In his life as well as in his writing, Andrew Marvell is elusive. Famous long after his death as a spokesman for political and religious liberty, the intensely private Marvell kept his personal opinions largely to himself. His verse is complex, full of paradoxes and ironies, and is frequently mediated through naive or ambivalent personae who present debates or balance competing claims. His poem “An Horation Ode upon Cromwell’s Return from Ireland” oscillates between praise for (and veiled criticism of) both Oliver Cromwell, who choreographed the abolition of the monarchy in 1649, and admiration for King Charles I, who was executed in the process. (Later, he would satirize the restored monarchy of Charles II.) A poet who wrote seductive and titillating love poetry, Marvell was also a politician who lampooned the government in satires for which he was renowned in his day. Even after death, mystery surrounded his life; in order to keep creditors of his estate at bay a few years later, his housekeeper, Mary Palmer, claimed to have been the author’s wife and published his Miscellaneous Poems (1681), which included a preface by “Mary Marvell” guaranteeing the poems to be the “exact copies of my late dear husband.”

Marvell, the son of Anne Pease and the Reverend Andrew Marvell, was born in 1621 in Winestead, but was raised primarily in Hull. At age twelve he was admitted to the University of Cambridge, where he studied for the following seven years and where he published his first poems, written in Latin and Greek. Before he had completed his degree, his father drowned and Marvell left England to travel on the Continent, perhaps to wait out the period of the Civil War (1642–47). In a letter of 1653 proposing that Marvell be given the post of Assistant Latin Secretary to the Council of State, Milton mentioned that Marvell had been abroad for four years and that on this journey he had learned to speak Dutch, French, Italian, and Spanish. (He did not win the appointment at that time, but it was awarded to him four years later.) In 1650 Marvell wrote “An Horation Ode Upon Cromwell’s Return from Ireland,” one of his best known and most widely studied poems. Written in a complex style that marks much of his subsequent work, the “Ode” defies definitive interpretation but instead raises many political and ideological questions. Scholars continue to disagree over Marvell’s allegiance to Cromwell, whose armies had just completed a bloody mission in Ireland.

Later in 1650 Marvell began working as a tutor to the twelve-year-old daughter of Thomas, Lord Fairfax, the retired Commander-in-Chief of the Parliamentary Army. In the poem “Upon Appleton House,” Marvell celebrates the architecture and inhabitants of the Fairfax home. It is likely that during his two years on this estate he composed many of his most famous works, including much of his pastoral poetry and the poems “The Definition of Love” and “Dialogue Between the Soul and the Body.” In the sensuous and witty carpe diem poem “To His Coy Mistress,” also likely written in this period, Marvell’s speaker tries to convince his love of the brevity of life and the need to seize the moment of passion.

In 1653, the year in which Cromwell declared himself Lord Protector of England, Marvell was appointed tutor to a ward of Cromwell, William Dutton. Along with Milton and Dryden, Marvell took part in Cromwell's 1659 funeral procession, but despite his ties to the republican regime his political career flourished upon the restoration of a Royalist Parliament. In 1659 he was elected Member of Parliament for Hull, a seat he would maintain until his death. While in office, Marvell was outspoken in his contempt for Charles II, who was restored to the monarchy in 1660; in his 1667 satire The Last Instructions to a Painter, he ridiculed the King and his government for their ineffectuality. Marvell took part in a diplomatic mission to Holland in 1662–63 and another to Russia, Sweden, and Denmark in 1665; these operations served to strengthen his criticism of corruption in the government, which he recorded in numerous pamphlets and newsletters and circulated to his constituents.

When Marvell died of complications from a fever in 1678, there was still an outstanding government reward offered for the name of the man who had written "An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England" a year earlier. More satires and poems were published posthumously as a result of Mary Palmer's efforts, but they fell into relative obscurity in the following century as readers began to perceive his metaphysical conceits as cold and discordant. The nineteenth century saw something of a revival of his poetry; Wordsworth praised his work, and Tennyson recognized him as "the green poet" for his sensuous pastoral poems. In the twentieth century Marvell's reputation was firmly re-established by T.S. Eliot, who championed him as one of the finest of the "metaphysical" poets.

The Coronet

When for the thorns with which I long, too long, 15
 With many a piercing wound,
 My Saviour's head have crowned,
 I seek with garlands to redress that wrong:
 5 Through every garden, every mead,^o meadow
 I gather flowers (my fruits are only flowers),¹ 20
 Dismantling all the fragrant towers²
 That once adorned my shepherdess's head.
 And now, when I have summed up all my store,
 10 Thinking (so I myself deceive)
 So rich a chaplet thence to weave
 As never yet the King of Glory wore:

Alas! I find the serpent old
 That, twining in his speckled breast,
 About the flowers disguised does fold,
 With wreaths of fame and interest.
 Ah, foolish man, that wouldst debase with them,
 And mortal glory, Heaven's diadem!
 But thou³ who only couldst the serpent tame,
 20 Either his slippery knots at once untie,
 And disentangle all his winding snare:
 Or shatter too with him my curious frame,⁴
 And let these wither, so that he may die,
 Though set with skill, and chosen out with care:
 25 That they, while thou on both their spoils dost tread,
 May crown thy feet, that could not crown thy head.
 —1681 (PROBABLY WRITTEN IN THE 1640S)

¹ fruits...flowers With verbal play on "fruits" as accomplishments, the "fruits" of his efforts (spiritual and literary); and on "flowers" as poems or poetic tropes (anthologies in the period could gather "flowers of poetry" or "flowers of rhetoric").

² fragrant towers Floral garlands; but also the secular love poems the poet had made for his beloved.

³ thou Christ.

⁴ curious frame Clever or ingenious structure: the floral garland or chaplet within the fiction of the poem, and the "Coronet" that is the poem itself.

Bermudas

Where the remote Bermudas ride,
 In the ocean's bosom unespied,
 From a small boat, that rowed along,
 The listening winds received this song:
 5 "What should we do but sing his praise
 That led us through the watery maze,
 Unto an isle so long unknown,¹
 And yet far kinder than our own?
 Where He the huge sea-monsters wracks,²
 10 That lift the deep upon their backs,
 He lands us on a grassy stage,
 Safe from the storms, and prelate's rage.³
 He gave us this eternal spring,
 Which here enamels every thing,
 15 And sends the fowls to us in care,
 On daily visits through the air.
 He hangs in shades the orange bright,
 Like golden lamps in a green night,
 And does in the pom'granates close^o
 20 Jewels more rich than Ormus⁴ shows.

enclose

¹ Unto an isle ... unknown Although the Spanish had landed on (and named) Bermuda in 1515, English seafarers first reached the island in 1609, when an expedition on its way to Jamestown landed there during a storm; Shakespeare is thought to have drawn on accounts of their "miraculous" survival for The Tempest. An English colony was founded on the island soon after, and early accounts, such as Lewis Hughes's A letter, sent to England from the Summer Islands (1615) and John Smith's General History of Virginia, the Summer Isles, and New England (1624), stressed Bermuda's paradisaical qualities. Bermuda was sometimes called Somers' or Summer Island, after Sir George Somers, the admiral of the first English expedition that landed there.

² wracks Casts ashore; Marvell is probably referring to a mock-heroic poem by Edmund Waller, "The Battle of the Summer Islands" (1645), which describes attempts by the colonists to kill two stranded whales.

³ prelate's rage This phrase situates the poem in the 1630s, when religious Independents (Congregationalists) left England as a result of attempts by William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, to impose uniformity in Church practice. In the early 1650s, Marvell lived in the house of John Oxenbridge, a religious Independent who had twice been to Bermuda, and who in 1655 would become Governor of the Somers Islands Company. This poem was written at least in part as a compliment to Oxenbridge.

⁴ Ormus Hormuz, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, an international market proverbial for the riches on display.

He makes the figs our mouths to meet,
 And throws the melons at our feet;
 But apples plants of such a price,
 No tree could ever bear them twice;
 25 With cedars chosen by His hand,
 From Lebanon, He stores the land,
 And makes the hollow seas that roar,
 Proclaim the ambergris⁵ on shore;
 He cast (of which we rather boast)
 30 The Gospel's pearl upon our coast,
 And in these rocks for us did frame
 A temple where to sound His name.
 Oh let our voice His praise exalt,
 Till it arrive at heaven's vault,
 35 Which, thence (perhaps) rebounding, may Echo beyond the Mexique Bay."
 Thus sung they, in the English boat,
 An holy and a cheerful note;
 And all the way, to guide their chime,
 40 With falling oars they kept the time.

A Dialogue between the Soul and Body

SOUL

O, who shall from this dungeon raise
 A soul, enslaved so many ways?
 With bolts of bones, that fettered stands
 In feet, and manacled in hands.
 5 Here blinded with an eye; and there
 Deaf with the drumming of an ear.
 A soul hung up, as 'twere, in chains
 Of nerves, and arteries, and veins,
 Tortured, besides each other part,
 10 In a vain head, and double heart.

BODY

O, who shall me deliver whole,
 From bonds of this tyrannic soul?
 Which, stretched upright, impales me so,

⁵ ambergris Wax-like substance secreted by sperm whales, valuable for its use in perfume.

That mine own precipice¹ I go;
 15 And warms and moves this needless frame
 (A fever could but do the same),
 And, wanting where its spite to try,
 Has made me live to let me die,
 A body that could never rest,
 20 Since this ill spirit it possessed.

SOUL

What magic could me thus confine
 Within another's grief to pine?
 Where, whatsoever it complain,
 I feel, that cannot feel, the pain.
 25 And all my care itself employs,
 That to preserve, which me destroys:
 Constrained not only to endure
 Diseases, but, what's worse, the cure:
 And ready oft the port to gain,²
 30 Am shipwrecked into health again.

BODY

But physic yet could never teach
 The maladies thou me dost reach:
 Whom first the cramp of hope does tear,
 And then the palsy shakes of fear;
 35 The pestilence of love does heat,
 Or hatred's hidden ulcer eat;
 Joy's cheerful madness does perplex,
 Or sorrow's other madness vex;
 Which knowledge forces me to know,
 40 And memory will not forgo.
 What but a soul could have the wit
 To build me up for sin so fit?
 So architects do square and hew,
 Green trees that in the forest grew.³

—1681 (PROBABLY WRITTEN AFTER 1652)

The Nymph Complaining for the Death of Her Fawn

The wanton troopers⁴ riding by
 Have shot my fawn, and it will die.
 Ungentle men! They cannot thrive
 To kill thee. Thou ne'er didst alive
 5 Them any harm; alas, nor could
 Thy death yet do them any good.
 I'm sure I never wished them ill;
 Nor do I for all this, nor will:
 But if my simple prayers may yet
 10 Prevail with heaven to forget
 Thy murder, I will join my tears
 Rather than fail. But, O my fears!
 It cannot die so. Heaven's King
 Keeps register of every thing:
 15 And nothing may we use in vain.
 Even beasts must be with justice slain,
 Else men are made their deodands.⁵
 Though they should wash their guilty hands
 In this warm life-blood which doth part
 20 From thine, and wound me to the heart,
 Yet could they not be clean: their stain
 Is dyed in such a purple grain.
 There is not such another in
 The world, to offer for their sin.
 25 Unconstant Sylvio, when yet
 I had not found him counterfeit,
 One morning (I remember well),
 Tied in this silver chain and bell
 Gave it to me: nay, and I know
 30 What he said then, I'm sure I do.
 Said he, "Look how your huntsman here
 Hath taught a fawn to hunt his dear."⁶
 But Sylvio soon had me beguiled.

¹ mine own precipice The body complains that, being upright, it is a moving precipice.

² the port to gain That is, the death of the body, which "lands" the soul in eternal life.

³ What but ... forest grew These last four lines are crossed out by hand in an important copy of Marvell's 1681 Poems that contains several additional poems in manuscript; the annotator has also added the words "desunt multa" ("much is missing").

⁴ troopers Cavalry soldiers; the word was first used of soldiers in the Scottish ("Covenanting") army that invaded England in 1640, and during the civil wars was associated with Parliamentary soldiers.

⁵ deodands Literally, "things given to God": possessions (including animals) that caused a person's death and were therefore forfeited to the king to be used for pious purposes, for example, to be given to the poor and hungry; the nymph suggests that people who unjustly cause an animal's death should be treated likewise.

⁶ dear Sylvio makes the obvious pun on "deer."

35 This waxèd tame, while he grew wild,
 And quite regardless of my smart,
 Left me his fawn, but took his heart.

 Thenceforth I set myself to play
 My solitary time away
 With this: and very well content,
 40 Could so mine idle life have spent.
 For it was full of sport, and light
 Of foot and heart, and did invite
 Me to its game; it seemed to bless
 Itself in me. How could I less
 45 Than love it? O, I cannot be Unkind to a beast that loveth me.

 Had it lived long, I do not know
 Whether it too might have done so
 As Sylvio did; his gifts might be 50 Perhaps as false, or more, than he.
 But I am sure, for aught that I
 Could in so short a time espy,
 Thy love was far more better than^o
 The love of false and cruel men.

55 With sweetest milk and sugar first
 I it at mine own fingers nursed.
 And as it grew, so every day
 It waxed more white and sweet than they.
 It had so sweet a breath! And oft
 60 I blushed to see its foot more soft
 And white (shall I say than my hand?
 Nay, any lady's of the land).

 It is a wondrous thing, how fleet
 'Twas on those little silver feet.
 65 With what a pretty skipping grace,
 It oft would challenge me the race:
 And, when 't had left me far away,
 'Twould stay, and run again, and stay.
 For it was nimbler much than hinds;
 70 And trod, as on the four¹ winds.

 I have a garden of my own,
 But so with roses overgrown,
 And lilies, that you would it guess
 To be a little wilderness.
 75 And all the springtime of the year
 It only lovèd to be there.

 Among the beds of lilies, I
 Have sought it oft, where it should lie;
 Yet could not, till itself would rise,
 80 Find it, although before mine eyes.
 For, in the flaxen lilies' shade,
 It like a bank of lilies laid.
 Upon the roses it would feed,
 Until its lips e'en seem to bleed:
 85 And then to me 'twould boldly trip,
 And print those roses on my lip.
 But all its chief delight was still
 On roses thus itself to fill:
 And its pure virgin limbs to fold
 90 In whitest sheets of lilies cold.
 Had it lived long, it would have been Lilies without, roses within.

 O help! O help! I see it faint:
 And die as calmly as a saint.
 95 See how it weeps. The tears do come
 Sad, slowly, dropping like a gum.
 So weeps the wounded balsam: so
 The holy frankincense doth flow.
 The brotherless Heliades²
 100 Melt in such amber tears as these.

 I in a golden vial will Keep these two crystal tears; and fill
 It till it do o'erflow with mine;
 Then place it in Diana's³ shrine.
 105 Now my sweet fawn is vanished to Whither the swans and turtles^o go:
 In fair Elysium to endure,
 With milk-white lambs, and ermines pure.
 O do not run too fast: for I
 110 Will but bespeak thy grave, and die.

 First, my unhappy statue shall
 Be cut in marble; and withal,
 Let it be weeping too: but there
 The engraver sure his art may spare,
 115 For I so truly thee bemoan, than turtledoves

¹ four Pronounced as two syllables.

² Heliades Daughters of Helios, the sun; while weeping over the death of their brother Phaethon they were transformed into poplar trees that wept amber tears (a story from Ovid's Metamorphoses).

³ Diana Roman goddess of chastity, the moon, and hunting; according to a story in Ovid's Metamorphoses, her pet stag was killed during a hunt.

That I shall weep, though I be stone:¹
 Until my tears, still dropping, wear
 My breast, themselves engraving there.
 There at my feet shalt thou be laid,
 120 Of purest alabaster made:
 For I would have thine image be White as I can, though not as thee.
 —c. 1681

To His Coy Mistress

Had we but world enough, and time,
 This coyness Lady were no crime.
 We would sit down, and think which way
 To walk, and pass our long love's day.
 5 Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
 Shouldst rubies find: I by the tide
 Of Humber² would complain. I would Love you ten years before the Flood:
 And you should, if you please, refuse
 10 Till the conversion of the Jews.³
 My vegetable love⁴ should grow
 Vaster than empires, and more slow.
 An hundred years should go to praise
 Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze.
 15 Two hundred to adore each breast:
 But thirty thousand to the rest.
 An age at least to every part,
 And the last age should show your heart:

¹ I shall weep, though I be stone Like Niobe, who continued to weep after she was turned into stone by Zeus. Niobe wept for the loss of her many children, who died as punishment for Niobe's excessive maternal pride (she had boasted that she was a more impressive mother than Latona, who only had two children, Apollo and Artemis/Diana). From Ovid's Metamorphoses.

² Humber River in northern England; it flowed alongside Hull, Marvell's home town.

⁴ vegetable love His love (or its physical manifestation) would grow slowly and steadily: Aristotle had defined the vegetative part of the soul as that characterized only by growth.

For Lady you deserve this state;
 20 Nor would I love at lower rate.
 But at my back I always hear
 Time's wingèd chariot hurrying near:
 And yonder all before us lie
 Deserts of vast eternity.
 25 Thy beauty shall no more be found;
 Nor, in thy marble vault, shall sound
 My echoing song: then worms shall try⁵
 That long-preserved virginity:
 And your quaint honour turn to dust;
 30 And into ashes all my lust.
 The grave's a fine and private place,
 But none, I think, do there embrace.
 Now, therefore, while the youthful glew
 Sits on thy skin like morning dew,⁶
 35 And while thy willing soul transpires
 At every pore with instant fires,
 Now let us sport us while we may;
 And now, like amorous birds of prey,
 Rather at once our time devour,
 40 Than languish in his slow-chapped⁷ power.
 Let us roll all our strength, and all
 Our sweetness, up into one ball:
 And tear our pleasures with rough strife,
 Thorough⁸ the iron gates⁸ of life.

through

⁵ try Test, and taste.

⁶ youthful glew / ... morning dew One of the more famous textual problems in English literature. The 1681 printed edition has "youthful hew / ... morning glew." The version of the 1681 text with manuscript corrections changes this reading to "youthful glew / ... morning dew." Another manuscript, a transcription of the entire poem dated 1672, reads "youthful glue / ... morning dew." Many modern editions conflate the first line of the 1681 edition with the second line from the two manuscript versions, producing the decorous "youthful hue / ... morning dew." But the original manuscript reading does seem to have been "glew," a word then read by one transcriber as "glue," and changed by a puzzled 1681 printer to "hew." "Glew" appears to mean sweat, which sits on the Lady's skin like dewdrops (and is evaporating from her pores in lines 35-36). The image might seem unusual, but is in keeping with the violent, passionate physicality of the poem's final section. "Glew" might be a northern dialect spelling of "glow," a word that could imply sexual ardour.

⁷ slow-chapped Slowly devouring; "chaps" are jaws.

⁸ gates "Grates" in the 1681 printed edition with manuscript corrections. But many editors see "gates of life" as a typically Marvellian inversion of the Biblical "gates of death" (Psalm 9.13).

45 Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still,¹ yet we will make him run.
—1681

The Picture of Little T.C.² in a Prospect of Flowers

I

See with what simplicity
This nymph begins her golden days!
In the green grass she loves to lie,
And there with her fair aspect tames
5 The wilder flowers, and gives them names:³
But only with the roses plays;
And them does tell
What colour best becomes them, and what smell.

2

Who can foretell for what high cause
10 This Darling of the Gods was born!
Yet this is she whose chaster laws
The wanton Love shall one day fear,
And, under her command severe,
See his bow broke and ensigns torn,
15 Happy, who can
Appease this virtuous enemy of man!

3

O, then let me in time compound,⁴
And parley with those conquering eyes;
Ere they have tried their force to wound,

¹ sun / Stand still Referring ultimately to Joshua 10.12–14, when Joshua made the sun and moon stand still while his army slaughtered the Amorites; but also invoking a traditional trope of love poetry in which lovers ask for time to slow down or stop when in one another's company.

² T.C. Probably Theophila Cornewall (b. 1644), whose mother was a member of a family, the Skinners, with whom Marvell was familiar. "Darling of the Gods" (line 10) is a literal translation of "Theophila."

³ gives them names Associating "T.C." with Eve, traditionally said to have named the flowers in Eden (Paradise Lost, 11.277).

⁴ compound "Come to terms with." The word also had a political resonance in the period: Royalists "compounded" by paying a fine to avoid confiscation of their estates.

20 Ere, with their glancing wheels, they drive
In triumph over hearts that strive,
And them that yield but more despise.
Let me be laid,
Where I may see thy glories from some shade.

4

25 Meantime, whilst every verdant thing
Itself does at thy beauty charm,
Reform the errors of the spring;
Make that the tulips may have share
Of sweetness, seeing they are fair;
30 And roses of their thorns disarm:
But most procure
That violets may a longer age endure.

5

But, O young beauty of the woods,
Whom Nature courts with fruits and flowers,
35 Gather the flowers, but spare the buds;
Lest Flora⁵ angry at thy crime,
To kill her infants in their prime,
Do quickly make the example yours;
And, ere we see,
40 Nip in the blossom all our hopes and thee.
—1681 (PROBABLY WRITTEN IN THE EARLY 1650S)

The Mower against Gardens

Luxurious man, to bring his vice in use,
Did after him the world seduce,
And from the fields the flowers and plants allure,
Where nature was most plain and pure.
5 He first enclosed within the gardens square
A dead and standing pool of air,
And a more luscious earth for them did knead,
Which stupefied them while it fed.
The pink grew then as double as his mind;
10 The nutriment did change the kind.
With strange perfumes he did the roses taint,
And flowers themselves were taught to paint.
The tulip, white, did for complexion seek,

⁵ Flora Roman goddess of flowers.

And learned to interline its cheek:
 15 Its onion root they then so high did hold,
 That one was for a meadow sold.¹
 Another world was searched, through oceans new,
 To find the Marvel of Peru.²
 And yet these rarities might be allowed
 20 To man, that sovereign thing and proud,
 Had he not dealt between the bark and tree,³
 Forbidden mixtures there to see.
 No plant now knew the stock from which it came;
 He grafts upon the wild the tame:
 25 That the uncertain and adulterate fruit
 Might put the palate in dispute.
 His green seraglio has its eunuchs too,
 Lest any tyrant him outdo.
 And in the cherry he does nature vex,
 30 To procreate without a sex.⁴
 'Tis all enforced, the fountain and the grot,
 While the sweet fields do lie forgot:
 Where willing Nature does to all dispense
 A wild and fragrant innocence:
 35 And fauns and fairies do the meadows till,
 More by their presence than their skill.
 Their statues, polished by some ancient hand,
 May to adorn the gardens stand:
 But howsoe'er the figures do excel,
 40 The gods themselves with us⁵ do dwell.
 —1681 (PROBABLY WRITTEN IN THE EARLY 1650S)

¹ for a meadow sold Referring to the speculative bubble of the “tulip mania” in Holland in the 1630s, during which spectacular prices were paid for some bulbs.

² Marvel of Peru Much prized multi-colored tropical flower of South America (and possibly with a pun on the poet’s name).

³ between the bark and tree “To deal between the bark and the tree” was a proverbial expression for interfering activity, often to interfering between husband and wife; the proverb is here made literal through its reference to grafting.

⁴ And in the cherry ... a sex Probably referring to attempts to create, through grafting, stoneless cherries (hence “eunuchs”).

⁵ with us With mowers (not with gardeners).

Damon the Mower

1
 Hark how the Mower Damon sung,
 With love of Juliana stung!
 While everything did seem to paint
 The scene more fit for his complaint.
 5 Like her fair eyes the day was fair,
 But scorching like his am’rous care.
 Sharp like his scythe his sorrow was,
 And withered like his hopes the grass.
 2
 “Oh what unusual heats are here,
 10 Which thus our sunburned meadows sear!
 The grasshopper its pipe gives o’er;
 And hamstringed⁶ frogs can dance no more.
 But in the brook the green frog wades;
 And grasshoppers seek out the shades.
 15 Only the snake, that kept within,
 Now glitters in its second skin.
 3
 “This heat the sun could never raise,
 Nor Dog Star⁷ so inflame the days.
 It from an higher beauty groweth,
 20 Which burns the fields and mower both:
 Which mads the dog, and makes the sun
 Hotter than his own Phaëton.⁸
 Not Jùly causeth these extremes,
 But Juliana’s scorching beams.
 4
 25 “Tell me where I may pass the fires
 Of the hot day, or hot desires.
 To what cool cave shall I descend,

⁶ hamstringed Lamed or disabled (figuratively) by the heat.

⁷ Dog Star Sirius; associated with the “dog days” of July and August, the period when Sirius rises at the same time as the sun.

⁸ Phaëton Son of the sun god, who set part of the world on fire when driving his father’s chariot.

Or to what gelid^o fountain bend?
 Alas! I look for ease in vain,
 30 When remedies themselves complain.
 No moisture but my tears do rest,
 Nor cold but in her icy breast.

5
 “How long wilt thou, fair shepherdess,
 Esteem me, and my presents less?
 35 To thee the harmless snake I bring,
 Disarmèd of its teeth and sting;
 To thee chameleons, changing hue,
 And oak leaves tipped with honey dew.
 Yet thou, ungrateful, hast not sought
 40 Nor what they are, nor who them brought.

6
 “I am the Mower Damon, known
 Through all the meadows I have mown.
 On me the morn her dew distils
 Before her darling daffodils.
 45 And, if at noon my toil me heat,
 The sun himself licks off my sweat.
 While, going home, the evening sweet
 In cowslip-water bathes my feet.

7
 “What, though the piping shepherd stock
 50 The plains with an unnumbered flock,
 This scythe of mine discovers wide
 More ground than all his sheep do hide.
 With this the golden fleece¹ I shear
 Of all these closes^o every year.
 55 And though in wool more poor than they,
 Yet am I richer far in hay.

8
 “Nor am I so deformed to sight,
 If in my scythe I lookèd right;

cold
 In which I see my picture done,
 60 As in a crescent moon the sun.
 The deathless fairies takes me oft
 To lead them in their dances soft:
 And, when I tune myself to sing,
 About me they contract their ring.

9
 65 “How happy might I still have mowed,
 Had not Love here his thistles sowed!
 But now I all the day complain,
 Joining my labour to my pain;
 And with my scythe cut down the grass,
 70 Yet still my grief is where it was:
 But, when the iron blunter grows,
 Sighing, I whet my scythe and woes.”

10
 While thus he threw his elbow round,
 Depopulating all the ground,
 75 And, with his whistling scythe, does cut
 Each stroke between the earth and root,
 The edgèd steel by careless chance
 Did into his own ankle glance;
 And there among the grass fell down,
 80 By his own scythe, the mower mown.

11
 “Alas!” said he, “these hurts are slight
 To those that die by love’s despite.
 With shepherd’s-purse, and clown’s-all-heal,²
 The blood I staunch, and wound I seal.
 85 Only for him no cure is found,
 Whom Juliana’s eyes do wound.
 ’Tis death alone that this must do:
 For Death thou art a mower too.”
 —1681 (PROBABLY WRITTEN IN THE EARLY 1650S)

¹ golden fleece The golden hay he mows, which he implies is superior to the regular fleece of the shepherd’s sheep; but also associating himself with the ancient hero Jason, who sought and obtained the Golden Fleece.

² shepherd’s-purse, and clown’s-all-heal Herbs traditionally used to stop bleeding and to heal wounds; a “clown” is a country dweller.

The Garden

1

How vainly men themselves amaze
 To win the palm, the oak, or bays,¹
 And their uncessant labours see
 Crowned from some single herb or tree,
 5 Whose short and narrow vergèd shade
 Does prudently their toils upbraid,
 While all flow'rs and all trees do close
 To weave the garlands of repose.

2

Fair Quiet, have I found thee here,
 10 And Innocence, thy sister dear!
 Mistaken long, I sought you then
 In busy companies of men.
 Your sacred plants, if here below,
 Only among the plants will grow.
 15 Society is all but rude,
 To this delicious solitude.

3

No white nor red² was ever seen
 So am'rous as this lovely green.
 Fond lovers, cruel as their flame,
 20 Cut in these trees their mistress' name.
 Little, alas, they know, or heed,
 How far these beauties hers exceed!
 Fair trees! wheres'e'er your barks I wound,
 No name shall but your own be found.

4

When we have run our passions' heat,
 25 Love hither makes his best retreat.
 The gods, that mortal beauty chase,
 Still in a tree did end their race.
 Apollo hunted Daphne so,
 30 Only that she might laurel grow.

¹ the palm, the oak, or bays Wreaths or garlands; the traditional rewards signifying military (palm leaves), civic or political (oak leaves), or poetic (laurel, or bay, leaves) achievement.

² white nor red Colors traditionally associated with female beauty.

And Pan³ did after Syrinx speed,
 Not as a nymph, but for a reed.

5

What wondrous life is this I lead!
 Ripe apples drop about my head;
 35 The luscious clusters of the vine
 Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
 The nectarine, and curious peach,
 Into my hands themselves do reach;
 Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
 40 Ensnared with flow'rs, I fall on grass.

6

Meanwhile the mind, from pleasures less,
 Withdraws into its happiness:
 The mind, that ocean where each kind
 Does straight its own resemblance find;⁴
 45 Yet it creates, transcending these,
 Far other worlds, and other seas,
 Annihilating all that's made
 To a green thought in a green shade.

7

Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
 50 Or at some fruit-tree's mossy root,
 Casting the body's vest aside,
 My soul into the boughs does glide:
 There like a bird it sits, and sings,
 Then whets,^o and combs its silver wings; preens
 55 And, till prepared for longer flight,
 Waves in its plumes the various light.

³ Apollo ... Pan The speaker invokes two classical myths associated with erotic pursuit and the transformation of desire into art. Daphne, chased by Apollo, the god of poetry, was transformed into the laurel tree that became Apollo's sacred emblem. Syrinx, chased by Pan, god of flocks and shepherds, was transformed into a reed, the basis of the pan-pipe, emblem of pastoral poetry. The speaker naively (or mischievously) claims that these gods were really seeking the plants these women transformed into, not the women themselves, and thus asserts the superiority in beauty of plants to women.

⁴ that ocean ... own resemblance find Alluding to the Renaissance belief that the ocean contains a counterpart for every plant and animal on land.

8

Such was that happy garden-state,
While man there walked without a mate:
After a place so pure, and sweet,
60 What other help could yet be meet?¹
But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
To wander solitary there:
Two Paradises 'twere in one
To live in Paradise alone.

9

65 How well the skilful gardener drew
Of flowers and herbs this dial² new,
Where from above the milder sun
Does through a fragrant zodiac run;
And, as it works, the industrious bee
70 Computes its time as well as we.
How could such sweet and wholesome hours
Be reckoned but with herbs and flowers!
—1681 (PROBABLY WRITTEN IN THE EARLY 1650S)

*An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland*³

The forward⁴ youth that would appear⁵
Must now forsake his Muses dear,
Nor in the shadows sing

¹ help ... meet Alluding to Genesis 2.18: "And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him."

² dial Floral sundial; sometimes read literally (Renaissance gardens did contain floral sundials), but the speaker also likens the entire garden to a sundial, in that it keeps seasonal time as the sun moves through its twelve-part zodiac.

³ An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland In May 1650, Oliver Cromwell returned from a military expedition to Ireland, where he had defeated Royalist armies in several bloody battles. At the time he was second-in-command of Parliament's New Model Army, but in June 1650 Sir Thomas Fairfax resigned, and Cromwell became Commander-in-Chief in July, just prior to the invasion of Scotland this poem anticipates in lines 125ff. This poem was typeset for inclusion in the 1681 Poems, but the pages on which it was printed were removed before publication ("cancelled") from all but two extant copies.

⁴ forward Prompt, ready, eager, spirited.

⁵ appear Emerge to play a role in public life.

His numbers⁶ languishing:
5 'Tis time to leave the books in dust,
And oil the unused armour's rust:
Removing from the wall
The corslet⁷ of the hall.
So restless Cromwell could not cease
10 In the inglorious arts of peace,
But through adventurous war
Urged his active star:
And, like the three-forked lightning, first
Breaking the clouds where it was nursed,
15 Did thorough⁸ his own side through
His fiery way divide.⁸
(For 'tis all one to courage high
The emulous or enemy:
And with such to enclose
20 Is more than to oppose.)
Then burning through the air he went,
And palaces and temples rent:
And Caesar's head at last
Did through his laurels blast.⁹
25 'Tis madness to resist or blame
The force of angry heaven's flame:
And, if we would speak true,
Much to the man is due,
Who, from his private gardens, where 30 He lived reserved and austere,
As if his highest plot
To plant the bergamot,¹⁰

⁶ numbers Metrical numbers: the youth can no longer spend time in the shadows writing love ("languishing") poetry.

⁷ corslet Piece of armor that covered the body: the youth's "hall" or house had one, hanging on the wall.

⁸ side ... divide Referring to Cromwell's rise to power through the ranks and past "emulous" (envious) rivals.

⁹ And Caesar's head ... blast Comparing Charles I to Caesar, and Cromwell to a bolt of lightning: Roman emperors wore laurel wreaths; lightning was thought not to strike laurel trees; but Cromwell's bolt blasted through this protection. Note that Cromwell is figured as Caesar in line 101, and that lines 81–82 remind readers of the historical clash between the Imperial Caesar and the Roman republic.

¹⁰ bergamot Variety of pear traditionally known as the pear of kings: a "plot" to "plant" (bury) this fruit was not as innocent sounding as it might seem.

Could by industrious valour climb
 To ruin the great work of time,
 35 And cast the kingdoms¹ old
 Into another mould.
 Though justice against fate complain,
 And plead the ancient rights² in vain:
 But those do hold or break
 40 As men are strong or weak.
 Nature, that hateth emptiness,
 Allows of penetration less:³
 And therefore must make room
 Where greater spirits come.
 45 What field of all the Civil Wars,
 Where his were not the deepest scars?
 And Hampton⁴ shows what part
 He had of wiser art:
 Where, twining subtle fears with hope,
 50 He wove a net of such a scope,
 That Charles himself might chase
 To Carisbrooke's narrow case:⁵
 That thence the royal actor borne
 The tragic scaffold might adorn:⁵
 55 While round the armed bands
 Did clap their bloody hands.
He nothing common did or mean
 Upon that memorable scene:

box, prison

¹ kingdoms Charles was King of three countries: England, Scotland, and Ireland.

² ancient rights Not the "divine right" of kings, but the place of the monarch in the "ancient" constitution, a place abolished by the English Republic.

⁴ Hampton Hampton Court Palace, where Charles stayed until, fearful of assassination, he fled to Carisbrooke Castle (see line 52) on the Isle of Wight in November 1647. Charles expected to be safe in the Isle of Wight, but the Governor held him prisoner and he was eventually returned to London for trial. The poem voices contemporary rumors that Cromwell had slyly organized the whole train of events; these rumors are now thought to be groundless.

⁵ The tragic scaffold might adorn The execution of the King (the "royal actor") is presented through a sustained theatrical metaphor. Marvell probably assumed that readers would remember that Charles was beheaded on a scaffold set up outside the Banqueting House, where plays and court entertainments were staged before the war: many of these entertainments, the court masques, celebrated royal power and featured members of the court on stage.

But with his keener eye⁶
 60 The axe's edge did try:
 Nor called the gods with vulgar spite
 To vindicate his helpless right,
 But bowed his comely head,
 Down, as upon a bed.⁷
 65 This was that memorable hour
 Which first assured the forced power.
 So when they did design
 The Capitol's first line,
 A bleeding head where they begun,
 70 Did fright the architects to run;
 And yet in that the State
 Foresaw its happy fate.⁸
 And now the Irish are ashamed
 To see themselves in one year tamed:⁹
 75 So much one man can do,
 That does both act and know.
 They can affirm his praises best,
 And have, though overcome, confessed
 How good he is, how just,
 80 And fit for highest trust:¹⁰
 Nor yet grown stiffer with command,

⁶ keener eye I.e., keener than the blade with which he was to be executed.

⁷ He nothing ... a bed Charles (the "He" of line 57, though the poem requires the reader to pause a moment to identify the referent) won admiration for his dignified manner throughout his trial and execution.

⁸ And yet ... fate The "Capitol" is the ancient Roman temple of Jupiter Capitolium: according to Roman historians, workers digging the temple's foundation found a man's undecayed (hence "bleeding") head, which Roman authorities interpreted as a good omen: in Latin, the word head (caput) is related to capital, so the head was read as a sign that the temple would be the capital of a great empire. The poem implies that under Cromwell another empire will be founded on another bleeding head.

⁹ And now ... tamed Cromwell's ferocious campaign against the Irish lasted from August 1649 to May 1650.

¹⁰ They... trust The Irish; few if any Irish, then or now, would "confess" any goodness or justice to Cromwell in his campaign in Ireland.

But still in the Republic's hand:¹
 How fit he is to sway
 That can so well obey.
 85 He to the Commons' feet presents
 A kingdom, for his first year's rents:
 And, what he may, forbears
 His fame, to make it theirs:
 And has his sword and spoils ungirt,
 90 To lay them at the public's skirt.²
 So when the falcon high
 Falls heavy from the sky,
 She, having killed, no more does search
 But on the next green bough to perch,
 95 Where, when he first does lure,
 The falconer has her sure.
 What may not then our isle presume
 While Victory his crest does plume?
 What may not others fear
 100 If thus he crowns each year?
 A Caesar, he, ere long to Gaul,³
 To Italy a Hannibal,⁴

And to all states not free
 Shall climacteric be.⁵
 105 The Pict⁶ no shelter now shall find
 Within his parti-coloured⁷ mind,
 But from this valour sad⁸
 Shrink underneath the plaid:
 Happy, if in the tufted brake
 110 The English hunter him mistake,
 Nor lay his hounds in near
 The Caledonian^o deer. Scottish
 But thou, the Wars' and Fortune's son,
 March indefatigably on,
 115 And for the last effect
 Still keep thy sword erect:
 Besides the force it has to fright
 The spirits of the shady night,⁹
 The same arts that did gain
 120 A power, must it maintain.
 —1681 (BUT CANCELLED FROM MOST COPIES; WRITTEN 1650)

¹ in ... hand The next four stanzas figure Cromwell as a falcon (see line 91) under the control of the House of Commons, the Republic's representative body: as a bird of prey he hunts kingdoms, but dutifully brings them back to the "falconer" rather than claiming them for himself.

² public's skirt He lays his sword, and trophies, at the feet of the "body politic."

³ A Caesar ... Gaul Julius Caesar subdued Gaul (France); the poem implies that Cromwell before long might do likewise.

⁴ Hannibal Carthaginian general who invaded Italy in 218 BCE, and left, undefeated, fifteen years later. He was later defeated by a Roman army, but the reference is probably not meant ironically: the power to invade, to "be a Hannibal" to Italy, is the key point.

⁵ climacteric be Be the cause of a critical or crucial moment in the lives of those states.

⁶ Pict Scot, from the name of the ancient Celtic people who inhabited Scotland when the Romans occupied Britain; the name, with its link to picture and painting, also puns on "parti-coloured" in the next line.

⁷ parti-coloured Varied in color; the Scots were regarded in the period as politically fickle, prone to change and to variety of opinion.

⁸ sad Referring to Cromwell's "valor": steadfast and grave; also dark or soberly colored (in contrast with the "parti-coloured" Scots).

⁹ Besides ... night Cold iron, and the cross-shaped hilt of a sword, were both thought to have the power to protect against evil spirits.

KATHERINE PHILIPS

1632 – 1664

Katherine Philips, known also by her nom de plume “Orinda” whom some called “the Matchless Orinda,” was the first Englishwoman to enjoy widespread public acclaim as a poet during her lifetime. Despite prejudice against seeing women’s secular works in print, her male peers recognized Philips as a poet of the first rank. As early as 1651, Henry Vaughan paid tribute to her “new miracles in Poetrie,” and in 1663 Abraham Cowley proclaimed her verse “then Man more strong, and more then Woman sweet.” In the guise of her literary persona Orinda, Philips dramatized, within her self-devised Society of Friendship, the ideals—and the realities and tribulations—of Platonic love with wit, elegance, and clarity. Thus the Society—whether fully or partly imaginary—helped establish a literary standard for her generation and Orinda herself a model for the female writers who followed her. Toward the end of her fairly short life Philips also broke new ground as a playwright and translator: although other women had written or translated dramas, her translation of Corneille’s neoclassical Pompey was the first rhymed version of a French tragedy in English and the first English play written by a woman to be performed on the professional stage.

Orinda was born Katherine Fowler in London on 1 January 1632, into a prosperous middle-class family with strong Puritan leanings. Friendships made at the boarding school she attended from 1640 to about 1645 probably influenced Philips’s eventual shift to the Royalist cause. Certainly at school she began to write verse within a coterie of friends and to cultivate a taste for the French romances and Cavalier plays from which she would later choose many of the pet names she gave members of her Society of Friendship.

In 1648, Philips, then 16, married James Philips and moved with him to Cardigan in Wales, which was to remain her family home for the rest of her life. Since her husband was a prominent Parliamentarian, however, she accompanied him occasionally on trips to London, where she befriended a circle of Cavalier writers gathered around the composer Henry Lawes and devoted to the memory of William Cartwright, who had died in 1643. It was her prefatory poem to the 1651 edition of Cartwright’s works, in fact, that marked Philips’s first appearance in print, and she contributed her “To the much honoured Henry Lawes” and “Mutuall Affection between Orinda and Lucasia” (later retitled as “Friendship’s Mysterys”) to Lawes’s Second Book of Ayres in 1655. By this time, her poems were being read in manuscript as public chronicles of a literary and social clique.

The Society of Friendship had its origins in the cult of Neoplatonic love imported from the continent in the 1630s by Charles I’s French wife, Henrietta Maria. Adherents indulged in elaborate rhetoric about the mingling of souls, and often adopted pseudonyms drawn from French pastoral romances or Cavalier dramas. With her literary gifts, however, and her intuitive sense of the value of deep friendships in a time of war and social schism, Philips enriched this convention as a cultural ideal of harmony and personal friendships to set against the faithless, war-torn public world. At the same time many of her poems (which she herself evidently valued highly) address public, political events.

During the 1650s the Society of Friendship probably numbered at least 20 people of both sexes, but Philips's literary energies were concentrated on her two closest female friends, Mary Aubrey ("Rosania")—until the latter's marriage in 1652 caused an estrangement—and then, in the succeeding decade, Anne Owen Lewis ("Lucasia"). The degree to which these friendships and the poetry that sprang from them include an erotic component is a subject of debate among scholars; what is agreed is that these poems have always attracted the keenest critical attention from readers of Philips's works. Initially strongly influenced by John Donne, Philips eventually matched the best of the Cavalier lyricists in freshness of wit, elegant invention, and pleasing rhythm.

Hoping to bolster her husband's political fortunes after the Restoration in 1660, Philips wrote many Royalist occasional pieces and became a friend of Sir Charles Cotterell, Master of Ceremonies to the King. She dubbed him "Poliarchus" and carried on a lively correspondence with him that was published after her death. While visiting the newly married Anne Owen in Ireland in 1662, Philips translated Corneille's Mort de Pompée from French alexandrines into fine English heroic couplets. The play was an instant success in Dublin and London in 1663, introducing Philips to wider celebrity as a playwright. (She left a second Corneille translation, Horace, unfinished, however.)

A supposedly illicit edition of Philips's poems appeared early in 1664. Germaine Greer and others have suggested that Philips engineered the publication of this edition in such a way that she could disown it. In any event, the publisher, Richard Marriott, withdrew the edition before Philips (who rushed to London to deal with the situation) had time to compel him to do so. It was during this same visit to London that Philips contracted smallpox; she died in June of that year, seemingly at the height of her powers. An authorized volume of her collected verse, published by Henry Herringman in 1667, exerted enormous influence on female poets of the succeeding generations, such as Anne Killigrew and Anne Finch, the Countess of Winchelsea. Praised for her modesty and Christian virtue as well as for her poetry, Philips, in her brief career as playwright, helped to pave the way for the acceptance of the somewhat less modest and less virtuous Aphra Behn. Finally, as Orinda, she asserted a female claim to what had been so often thought an exclusively male sphere: ideal friendship. As she claims in "A Friend":

... for men t'exclude
 Women from friendship's capacity,
 Is a design injurious and rude,
 Only maintain'd by partial tyranny.
 Love is allow'd to us, and Innocence,
 And noblest friendships do proceed from thence.

 Thus are you freed from all the cares that do
 Attend on matrimony and a husband too.
 Therefore Madam, be advised by me
 Turn, turn apostate to^o loves levity. reject, forsake

Upon the Double Murder of King Charles
In Answer to a Libelous Rhyme made by V. P.²

I think not on the state, nor am concerned
Which way soever that great helm is turned,
But as that son whose father's danger nigh
Did force his native dumbness, and untie
5 His fettered organs:³ so here is a cause
That will excuse the breach of nature's laws.
Silence were now a sin: nay passion now
Wise men themselves for merit would allow.
What noble eye could see, (and careless pass)
10 The dying lion kicked by every ass?⁴
Hath Charles so broke God's laws, he must not have
A quiet crown, nor yet a quiet grave?
Tombs have been sanctuaries; thieves lie here
Secure from all their penalty and fear.
15 Great Charles his double misery was this,
Unfaithful friends, ignoble enemies;
Had any heathen been this prince's foe,
He would have wept to see him injured so.
His title was his crime, they'd reason good
20 To quarrel at the right they had withstood.
He broke God's laws, and therefore he must die,
And what shall then become of thee and I?

² V.P. Vavasor Powell (1617–70), an itinerant Nonconformist preacher and one of the Fifth Monarchists, who believed in the imminent Second Coming and the illegitimacy of earthly kings. The verses alluded to by Philips have not survived.

³ that son ... fettered organs Referring to the ancient Greek tale in which Croesus, King of Lydia, was saved from summary execution during the sack of Sardis by his mute son, who, speaking for the first time, identified his father as King and thus a man to be taken alive (Herodotus 1.85).

⁴ dying lion kicked by every ass The dying Lion in Aesop's fable "The Sick Lion," who is assaulted in his helplessness by the various beasts, his subjects. On being finally kicked in the face by the Ass, the Lion proclaims, "This is a double death." Aesop's moral reads, "Only cowards insult dying majesty." The Scottish lion was also the dominant figure on the Stuart coat of arms.

Slander must follow treason; but yet stay,^o stop
Take not our reason with our king away.
25 Though you have seized upon all our defense,
Yet do not sequester^o our common sense. confiscate
But I admire not at this new supply:
No bounds will hold those who at scepters fly.
Christ will be King, but I ne'er understood,
30 His subjects built his kingdom up with blood
(Except their own) or that he would dispense
With his commands, though for his own defense.
Oh! to what height of horror are they come
Who dare pull down a crown, tear up a tomb!⁵
—1667

On the Third of September, 1651⁶

As when the glorious magazine of light⁷
Approaches to his canopy of night,
He with new splendor clothes his dying rays,
And double brightness to his beams conveys;
5 As if to brave^o and check his ending fate, defy
Puts on his highest looks in 's lowest state;
Dressed in such terror as to make us all
Be anti-Persians,⁸ and adore his fall;
Then quits the world, depriving it of day,
10 While every herb and plant does droop away:
So when our gasping English royalty
Perceived her period^o now was drawing nigh, end
She summons her whole strength to give one blow,
To raise her self, or pull down others too.
15 Big with revenge and hope, she now spake more
Of terror than in many months before;
And musters her attendants, or to save
Her from, or wait upon^o her to the grave: escort
Yet but enjoyed the miserable fate
20 Of setting majesty, to die in state.
Unhappy Kings! who cannot keep a throne,

⁵ tear up a tomb Deface the honor and memory of the dead king.

⁶ Third of September, 1651 The date of the Battle of Worcester, in which Oliver Cromwell decisively defeated Charles II and the Royalist cause, bringing the English Civil War to an end.

⁷ magazine of light The sun, pictured as a storehouse of light.

⁸ anti-Persians Anti-sun, referring to the ancient Persian worship of Mithra, later identified with the sun.

Nor be so fortunate to fall alone!
 Their weight sinks others: Pompey could not fly,
 But half the world must bear him company;¹
 25 Thus captive Sampson could not life conclude,
 Unless attended with a multitude.²
 Who'd trust to greatness now, whose food is air,³
 Whose ruin sudden, and whose end despair?
 Who would presume upon his glorious birth,
 30 Or quarrel for a spacious share of earth,
 That sees such diadems become thus cheap,
 And heroes tumble in the common heap.
 O! give me virtue then, which sums up^o all, encompasses
 And firmly stands when crowns and scepters fall.

 But they were all deceived.
 For as a watch by art^o is wound mechanical skill

¹ Pompey...company The Roman general Pompey fled to Egypt after being defeated by Julius Caesar at Pharsalus (48 BCE), where 15,000 of his men were killed. Pompey's defeat and subsequent assassination in Egypt brought an end to the Civil War of the Triumvirate.

² captive Sampson... multitude Captured and blinded by the Philistines, the biblical hero Samson brought down the pillars of the temple at Gaza, killing thousands of his enemies along with himself. See Book of Judges 16.

³ whose food is air Who is changeable and inconstant as the chameleon, which had the ability to endure long periods without food, and was thus reputed to live on air.

⁴ Lucasia ... 1651 Philips met her close friend Anne Owen (Lucasia) in 1651.

A soul till she found thine;
 Which now inspires, cures and supplies,

 My joy, my life, my rest.
 Nor bridegroom's nor crowned conqueror's mirth
 To mine compared can be:
 They have but pieces of this earth,
 20 I've all the world in thee.
 Then let our flame still light and shine,
 (And no bold^o fear control) strong
 As innocent as our design,^o intent
 Immortal as our soul.

*Friendship's Mystery,
 To My Dearest Lucasia*

Come, my Lucasia, since we see
 That Miracles Mens faith do move,
 By wonder and by prodigy⁵
 To the dull angry world let's prove
 5 There's a Religion in our Love.
 For though we were design'd t' agree,
 That Fate no liberty destroyes,
 But our Election is as free
 As Angels, who with greedy choice
 10 Are yet determin'd to their joyes.
 Our hearts are doubled by the loss,
 Here Mixture is Addition grown;
 We both diffuse, and both ingross:
 And we whose minds are so much one,
 15 Never, yet ever are alone.
 We court our own Captivity
 Than Thrones more great and innocent:
 'Twere banishment to be set free,
 Since we wear fetters whose intent
 20 Not Bondage is, but Ornament.

⁵ prodigy Miracle or extraordinary event.

Divided joyes are tedious found,
 And griefs united easier grow:
 We are our selves but by rebound,
 And all our Titles shuffled so,
 25 Both Princes, and both Subjects too.

Our Hearts are mutual Victims laid,
 While they (such power in Friendship lies)
 Are Altars, Priests, and Offrings made:
 And each Heart which thus kindly dies,
 30 Grows deathless by the Sacrifice.

On the Death of My First and Dearest Child, Hector Philips¹

1
 Twice forty months of wedlock I did stay,²
 Then had my vows crowned with a lovely boy,
 And yet in forty days he dropt away,
 O swift vicissitude of human joy.

2
 5 I did but see him and he disappeared,
 I did but pluck the rosebud and it fell,
 A sorrow unforeseen and scarcely feared,
 For ill can mortals their afflictions spell.

3
 10 And now (sweet babe) what can my trembling heart
 Suggest to right my doleful fate or thee,
 Tears are my Muse and sorrow all my Art,
 So piercing groans must be thy eulogy.

4
 Thus whilst no eye is witness of my moan,
 I grieve thy loss (ah boy too dear to live)

15 And let the unconcerned world alone,
 Who neither will, nor can refreshment give.

5
 An offring too for thy sad tomb I have,
 Too just a tribute to thy early hearse,
 Receive these gasping numbers to thy grave,
 20 The last of thy unhappy mother's verse.

*Friendship in Emblem,³ or the Seal,
 To My Dearest Lucasia*

The hearts thus intermixed speak
 A love that no bold shock can break;
 For joined and growing, both in one,
 Neither can be disturbed alone.

5 That means a mutual knowledge too;
 For what is't either heart can do,
 Which by its panting sentinel^o
 It does not to the other tell?

guard

That friendship hearts so much refines,
 10 It nothing but itself designs:
 The hearts are free from lower ends,
 For each point to the other tends.

They flame, 'tis true, and several ways,
 But still those flames do so much raise,
 15 That while to either they incline
 They yet are noble and divine.

From smoke or hurt those flames are free,
 From grossness^o or mortality:
 The hearts (like Moses' bush⁴ presumed)
 20 Warmed and enlightened, not consumed.

vulgarity

¹ Hector Philips According to a manuscript copy of this poem, Philips's son Hector was born 23 April 1655 and died about ten days later, on 2 May. She would have one other child, a daughter named Katherine, the following year.

² Twice forty ... stay Philips was married in August 1648, almost seven years before Hector was born.

³ Emblem Drawing expressing an allegory, or representing a quality. Often these were accompanied by a motto and some lines of verse; this poem describes the symbolic elements in an emblem of friendship.

⁴ Moses' bush The Angel of the Lord appears to Moses in a burning bush, which, miraculously, is not consumed by the fire (see Exodus 3.2–5).

The compasses that stand above
Express this great immortal Love;
For friends, like them, can prove this true,
They are, and yet they are not, two.

25 And in their posture is expressed
Friendship's exalted interest:
Each follows where the other leans,
And what each does, the other means.

30 And as when one foot does stand fast,
And t'other circles seeks to cast,
The steady part does regulate
And make the wanderer's motion straight.

35 So friends are only two in this,
T'reclaim each other when they miss:
For whose'er will grossly fall,
Can never be a friend at all.

40 And as that useful instrument
For even lines was ever meant;
So friendship from good angels springs,
To teach the world heroic things.

As these are found out in design
To rule and measure ev'ry line;
So friendship governs actions best,
Prescribing law to all the rest.

45 And as in nature nothing's set
So just as lines and numbers met;
So compasses for these b'ing made,
Do friendship's harmony persuade.

50 And like to them, so friends may own
Extension, not division:
Their points, like bodies, separate;
But head, like souls, knows no such fate.

55 And as each part so well is knit,
That their embraces ever fit:
So friends are such by destiny,
And no third can the place supply.

60 There needs no motto to the seal:
But that we may the mine reveal
To the dull eye, it was thought fit
That friendship only should be writ.

But as there is degrees of bliss,
So there's no friendship meant by this,
But such as will transmit to fame
Lucasia's and Orinda's name.

JOHN MILTON

1608 – 1674

John Milton aspired to be a writer for the ages—and he succeeded. Almost within his lifetime, Milton was widely considered England's greatest poet and a writer whose only serious rivals were the ancient masters Homer and Virgil. His influence on subsequent English poetry is probably second only to that of Shakespeare: for centuries, major poets struggled to define themselves in relation to Milton's achievement in a literary psychodrama of admiration, emulation, exasperation, and denial.

No other English writer appears to have assimilated so thoroughly all the literature, culture, and history that had come before him. Milton first mastered the European artistic tradition, and then out of it made something new, producing magnificent and innovative poems in all the major genres. In addition, had Milton not published a line of verse he would still hold a place in literary history by virtue of his prose. Even though he dismissed these books as the product of “his left hand,” Milton was a significant prose writer and a formidable polemicist, in Latin as well as English, producing a wide range of works on political, social, religious, educational, and historical issues.

Of all the major writers in English, Milton was probably the most deeply engaged in the politics of his time. Milton's poetry has consequently been read in light of his active involvement in political, religious, and social revolution. But the nature of Milton's literary engagement with these issues continues to be debated: Milton, like Shakespeare, rarely if ever offers easy answers. Over the centuries, Milton has been championed as both a pillar of religious orthodoxy and as the great dissenter, a religious radical, or even heretic. He has been called a proto-feminist and the great patriarchal bogeyman, a radical political egalitarian and a man who did not believe in democracy. His is the greatest voice of “Puritanism” in English literature, but to think of him in anything like the modern sense of “puritanical” is to go immediately off-track. While a profoundly religious man, Milton by the end of his life had almost no use for institutional religion or theological tradition. While a “Puritan,” he was also a spokesman for revolution, freedom of the will (which Protestant theory usually denied), and political, social, intellectual, and personal liberty. Thomas Jefferson copied out 48 excerpts from Milton's works into his commonplace book, almost all of them having to do with liberty. Milton's works have been called the culmination of Renaissance humanism and a monument to dead ideas; and they have been celebrated as ushering in the modern world in their complex treatment of human agency, human love, and human political relations.

No writer before Milton fashioned himself quite so insistently and self-consciously as an author: in text after text, Milton invites us to read connections between his life and his writing, and then challenges or complicates our ability to do so. Born the eldest son of a successful scrivener in London in 1608, Milton was surrounded by words from an early age; he began writing seriously at the age of ten. In 1625 he was admitted to Christ's College, Cambridge, where he would remain the next seven years, graduating M.A. in 1632. While Milton did very well in his studies, he also complained repeatedly about the inadequacies of the educational curriculum and requirements: he described his frustration with traditional approaches to education in his treatise On Education (1644). Milton entered Cambridge expecting to become a minister in the Church of England (he would later change his mind, probably in the 1630s). In his university writings, however, he talks about himself as a poet and as a scholar, and never as a prospective minister. But he did develop a reputation for erudition and literary skill: during his university years he wrote several poems he would later publish, including the companion poems “L’Allegro” and “Il Penseroso.”

After he left Cambridge, Milton spent the next six years in “studious retirement,” living with his parents, reading extensively, preparing himself for his vocation—and trying to discover what that vocation was. He published his first poem, an epitaph for Shakespeare included in Shakespeare’s second folio (1632); he accepted commissions for two aristocratic entertainments (Arcades and A Maske, popularly known as Comus). He kept a close eye on the changing political and religious conditions of England over the 1630s. Finally, in 1638, he published “Lycidas,” one of the most extraordinary poems in English, simultaneously a eulogy for a drowned classmate, a denunciation of current Anglican Church leadership, and a confident assertion of his own poetic vocation, all mediated through the conventions of classical pastoral elegy. Writing “Lycidas” seemed to be the trigger that propelled Milton from his retirement into an active engagement with the world. In 1638 and 1639, he traveled abroad, spending considerable time in Italy, where he was much taken with the intellectual and cultural life. Had not rumors of the impending English Civil War called him home in late 1639, Milton’s travels would likely have lasted much longer.

Milton continued to train himself towards his goal of becoming a great poet in the classical tradition of Virgil, becoming familiar with Spanish, Dutch, and Hebrew as well as Latin and Greek, French and Italian, and with the leading works of history, science, and philosophy as well as of literature. But after returning to England in 1639 he devoted himself over the next twenty years very largely to the cause of political and religious change. Most of his publications during this period consist of prose polemic, including some anti-episcopal tracts in the early 1640s, several others arguing for an increased freedom to divorce, Areopagitica (1644), and works of political theory and argument that hold a central place among the writings of the English civil wars: The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649), Eikonoklastes (1649), Defensio pro populo Anglicano (1651), Defensio secunda (1654), and The Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth (1659). Milton’s skill as a polemicist brought him to the attention of the revolutionary government, and in the 1650s he served as Secretary for Foreign Tongues in the government of Oliver Cromwell—a job that entailed writing a wide variety of official documents and letters (Latin remained the most important “foreign tongue” for international communication).

Of his prose works, the most widely read in the modern era has been Areopagitica (1644), Milton’s extended defense of literary and intellectual freedom. The occasion for the work was the effort by Parliament to require books to be licensed prior to publication. Milton did not advocate complete freedom of the press. But his arguments for the necessity of letting readers make up their own minds, of letting arguments fight it out in the public sphere, continue to be cited in legal cases today. At the time, however, Milton was far better known, notorious even, for his books advocating a right to divorce. In June of 1642 Milton (then thirty-six) married Mary Powell, a young woman from a Royalist family. The two proved to be a less than perfect match, and she returned to her family’s home in Buckinghamshire two months later. They were eventually reconciled, but many readers see a connection between their apparent difficulties and Milton’s publication of The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1642), in which he argues that the purpose of marriage is to provide companionship based on affection and like-mindedness, and that divorce should be allowed when a marriage fails to do so. The scandal Milton provoked in England with these arguments was supplanted only by the European-wide scandal he created by defending the execution of King Charles I.

While Milton might not have had time to write much poetry in the 1640s, he did publish the poetry he had written up to the outbreak of war. In 1645, a year that saw some of the bloodiest fighting of the war, Humphrey Moseley, the most prominent literary publisher of the day, produced

The Poems of Mr. John Milton, Both English and Latin. In addition to “On the Morning of Christ’s Nativity,” “On Shakespeare,” “L’Allegro” and “Il Penseroso,” “Lycidas,” and A Maske, the collection included twenty-two other poems in English, ten sonnets (six of them written in Italian), and twelve Latin poems.

Milton’s wife Mary died during childbirth in 1652, and one of the couple’s four children died shortly thereafter. At about the same time Milton entirely lost his sight; the sonnet “When I consider how my light is spent” (often referred to as “On His Blindness”) was written later that same year. His two daughters were among those who served thereafter as scribes; all of his subsequent works were dictated. In 1656 Milton married Katherine Woodcock; two years later, in 1658, she also died of complications arising from childbirth.

With the Restoration in 1660, Milton went into hiding from the authorities. Eventually he suffered a brief imprisonment, but his freedom was negotiated by friends (notable among them the poet Andrew Marvell). His existence for the final fourteen years of his life was one of relative isolation—but these were also the years of his greatest poetic achievement. Rising early each day and beginning to dictate as soon as his scribe or secretary joined him, he had begun in the late 1650s to compose Paradise Lost, a sweeping re-telling of the Biblical story of humanity’s expulsion from Paradise; the epic was initially published in 1667 in ten books, and then reissued in a revised twelve-book edition in 1674. Since the early eighteenth century Paradise Lost has been almost universally accorded a central place in the English literary canon. Two other major works followed: Paradise Regained (1671), which presents in blank verse the story of the temptation of Jesus and of his defeat of Satan; and Samson Agonistes (1671), which recounts in the form of a poetic drama the story of the blind and anguished Samson, struggling to understand God’s will.

In 1663 Milton married Elizabeth Minshul, who became a scribe, caregiver, and inspiration to him in the last decade of his life. Though Paradise Lost sold moderately well from its first publication, and though Milton came to be regarded by many as a “classic” even during his lifetime, his anti-monarchical political views precluded any official honors; when he died in 1674 he was buried not in Westminster Abbey but beside his father in Saint Giles’s Church, Cripplegate.

*L’Allegro*¹

Hence loathèd Melancholy
Of Cerberus,² and blackest Midnight born,
In Stygian³ cave forlorn

5 ’Mongst horrid shapes, and shrieks, and sights unholy,
Find out some uncouth^o cell, desolate
 Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings,
And the night-raven sings;
 There under ebon shades, and low-browed rocks,
As ragged as thy locks,

² Cerberus In classical myth, the three-headed dog that guards the entrance to the underworld.

³ Stygian Hellishly black; from Styx, a river that in classical myth leads to the underworld.

10 In dark Cimmerian⁴ desert ever dwell.
But come thou goddess fair and free,
In heaven yclept^o Euphrosyne,⁵ named
And by men, heart-easing Mirth,
 Whom lovely Venus at a birth
15 With two sister Graces more
To ivy-crownèd Bacchus bore;⁶
Or whether (as some sager sing)

⁴ Cimmerian Densely dark (from the Cimmerians, a people fabled in classical story to live in perpetual darkness).

⁵ Euphrosyne Classical personification of mirth and one of the three Graces.

⁶ heart-easing Mirth ... Bacchus bore Milton makes the three Graces the daughters of Venus (goddess of love) and Bacchus (god of wine); Euphrosyne’s two sisters were Aglaia (Brightness) and Thalia (Bloom).

The frolic wind that breathes the spring,
 Zephyr with Aurora¹ playing,
 20 As he met her once a-Maying,²
 There on beds of violets blue,
 And fresh-blown roses washed in dew,
 Filled her with thee a daughter fair,
 So buxom, blithe, and debonair.³
 25 Haste thee nymph, and bring with thee
 Jest and youthful Jollity,
 Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,⁴
 Nods, and becks,[°] and wreathèd smiles, beckonings
 Such as hang on Hebe's⁵ cheek,
 30 And love to live in dimple sleek;
 Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
 And Laughter holding both his sides.
 Come, and trip it as ye go
 On the light fantastic toe,
 35 And in thy right hand lead with thee,
 The mountain nymph, sweet Liberty;
 And if I give thee honour due,
 Mirth, admit me of thy crew
 To live with her, and live with thee,
 40 In unprovèd[°] pleasures free; free of blame
 To hear the lark begin his flight,
 And singing startle the dull night,
 From his watch-tower in the skies,
 Till the dappled dawn doth rise;
 45 Then to come in spite of sorrow,
 And at my window bid good morrow,⁶
 Through the sweet-briar, or the vine,

² a-Maying Celebrating the arrival of May; May Day was celebrated with various traditional pastimes. Sterner Puritans opposed such revelry as pagan.

³ buxom, blithe, and debonair These three adjectives had overlapping meanings in the period, and were often grouped with one another; buxom Easy-going, lively; blithe Merry, jolly; debonair Affable, kindly, gracious.

⁴ Quips Witty sayings; cranks Play on words; wanton wiles Playful games and tricks.

⁵ Hebe Classical personification of youth.

⁶ to come ... bid good morrow That is, L'Allegro comes to his window and bids the day good morrow (though some readers think it is the lark who bids good morrow to L'Allegro): the same, deliberately agentless syntax has L'Allegro "oft list'ning" and "sometime walking" in subsequent lines.

Or the twisted eglantine.
 While the cock with lively din,
 50 Scatters the rear of darkness thin,
 And to the stack,[°] or the barn door, haystack
 Stoutly struts his dames before,
 Oft list'ning how the hounds and horn
 Cheerly rouse the slumb'ring morn,
 55 From the side of some hoar[°] hill, grey
 Through the high wood echoing shrill.
 Sometime walking not unseen
 By hedgerow elms, on hillocks green,
 Right against the eastern gate,
 60 Where the great sun begins his state,[°] progress
 Robed in flames, and amber light,
 The clouds in thousand liveries dight,[°] clothed
 While the ploughman near at hand,
 Whistles o'er the furrowed land,
 65 And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
 And the mower whets his scythe,
 And every shepherd tells his tale⁷
 Under the hawthorn in the dale.
 Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures
 70 Whilst the landscape round it measures.
 Russet lawns, and fallows grey,
 Where the nibbling flocks do stray,
 Mountains on whose barren breast
 The labouring clouds do often rest:
 75 Meadows trim with daisies pied,[°] multicolored
 Shallow brooks, and rivers wide,
 Towers, and battlements it sees
 Bosomed high in tufted trees,
 Where perhaps some beauty lies,
 80 The cynosure⁸ of neighbouring eyes.
 Hard by, a cottage chimney smokes,
 From betwixt two agèd oaks,
 Where Corydon and Thyrsis⁹ met,
 Are at their savoury dinner set
 85 Of herbs, and other country messes,[°] prepared dishes
 Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses;
 And then in haste her bower she leaves,

⁷ tells his tale A double meaning: "tells his story" and/or "counts his flock."

⁸ cynosure Guiding star, hence center of attraction or interest.

⁹ Corydon ... Thyrsis With "Phyllis" and "Thestylis" five lines below, traditional names in pastoral poetry.

With Thestylis to bind the sheaves;
 Or if the earlier season lead
 90 To the tanned^o haycock in the mead,
 Sometimes with secure^o delight
 The upland hamlets will invite,
 When the merry bells ring round,
 And the jocund rebecks¹ sound
 95 To many a youth, and many a maid,
 Dancing in the chequered shade;
 And young and old come forth to play
 On a sunshine holiday,
 Till the livelong daylight fail,
 100 Then to the spicy nut-brown ale,
 With stories told of many a feat,
 How Fairy Mab² the junkets³ eat,
 She was pinched, and pulled she said,
 And he by Friar's Lantern⁴ led 105 Tells how the drudging Goblin⁵ sweat,
 To earn his cream-bowl duly set,
 When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
 His shadowy flail hath threshed the corn,
 That ten day-labourers could not end;
 110 Then lies him down the lubber^o fiend,
 And stretched out all the chimney's length,
 Basks at the fire his hairy strength;
 And crop-full⁶ out of doors he flings,
 Ere the first cock his matin^o rings.
 115 Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
 By whispering winds soon lulled asleep.
 Towered cities please us then,
 And the busy hum of men,
 Where throngs of knights and barons bold,
 120 In weeds of peace⁷ high triumphs hold,
 With store of ladies, whose bright eyes
 Rain influence, and judge the prize
 Of wit, or arms, while both contend cycle, circuit

⁸ Hymen Classical god of weddings.

⁹ taper clear Candle or torch; it was a good omen for the marriage if the flame burned without smoke ("clear").

¹⁰ sock Slipper worn by comic actors in ancient Greece (as opposed to the buskin worn by actors in tragedies): L'Allegro suggests going to the theater if one of Ben Jonson's erudite comedies is playing.

¹¹ eating cares See Horace, Odes 2.11.18, "Eivus [Dionysus] scatters eating cares."

¹² Lydian airs Soft, convivial songs or melodies ("Lydian" is one of the Greek musical modes).

¹³ the meeting soul I.e., the soul meeting the music.

¹⁴ wanton heed, and giddy cunning Two oxymorons: playful carefulness and silly, excited shrewdness.

¹⁵ Orpheus self That is, Orpheus's self, or Orpheus himself. For Orpheus, see note below.

¹⁶ Elysian From Elysian Fields or Elysium, the resting place of dead heroes in classical myth.

² Fairy Mab In English folklore, the Queen of the Fairies.

³ junkets Dishes of sweet curds and cream.

⁴ Friar's Lantern Folkloric name for the will-o'-the-wisp.

⁵ Goblin Robin Goodfellow or Hobgoblin; usually a mischievous trickster, he might help with household chores, as here, if propitiated with an offering of cream.

⁶ crop-full Filled to the brim (here, with cream).

⁷ weeds of peace Showy tournament outfits, as opposed to real, wartime armor.

150 His half-regained Eurydice.¹
 These delights, if thou canst give,
 Mirth with thee, I mean to live.

*Il Penseroso*²

Hence vain deluding joys,
 The brood of folly without father bred,
 How little you bestead,³
 Or fill the fixèd mind with all your toys;
 5 Dwell in some idle brain,
 And fancies fond^o with gaudy shapes possess, foolish
 As thick and numberless
 As the gay motes that people the sunbeams,
 Or likest hovering dreams
 10 The fickle pensioners of Morpheus' train.⁴
 But hail thou goddess, sage and holy,
 Hail divinest Melancholy,
 Whose saintly visage is too bright
 To hit the sense of human sight;
 15 And therefore to our weaker view,
 O'erlaid with black staid Wisdom's hue.
 Black, but such as in esteem, Prince
 Memnon's sister⁵ might beseem,
 Or that starred Ethiop queen⁶ that strove
 20 To set her beauty's praise above
 The sea-nymphs, and their powers offended.

¹ Orpheus ... Eurydice In classical myth, Orpheus was the musician who traveled to the underworld to reclaim his wife, Eurydice, after she died. Touched by the beauty of Orpheus's playing, Pluto, god of the underworld, agreed to release her. But he made the condition that Orpheus had to leave the underworld without looking back to see if Eurydice was following; at the last minute, he looked, and lost her once again.

² Il Penseroso Italian: The pensive or contemplative man.

³ bestead Help; avail; be of service.

⁴ Morpheus' train Dreams are the attendants of Morpheus, the god of sleep.

⁵ Memnon's sister In classical myth, Memnon was an Ethiopian prince who fought on the side of the Trojans in the Trojan war; his sister was named Himera.

⁶ starred Ethiop queen Cassiopeia; in classical myth she was changed into a constellation (hence "starred") as punishment for claiming to be more beautiful than the sea nymphs.

Yet thou art higher far descended,
 Thee bright-haired Vesta⁷ long of yore,
 To solitary Saturn⁸ bore;
 25 His daughter she (in Saturn's reign,
 Such mixture was not held a stain^o) disgrace
 Oft in glimmering bowers, and glades
 He met her, and in secret shades
 Of woody Ida's⁹ inmost grove,
 30 While yet there was no fear of Jove.
 Come pensive nun, devout and pure,
 Sober, steadfast, and demure,
 All in a robe of darkest grain,^o hue
 Flowing with majestic train,
 35 And sable stole of cypress lawn,¹⁰
 Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
 Come, but keep thy wonted state,¹¹
 With even step, and musing gait,
 And looks commercing^o with the skies, communicating
 40 Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes:
 There held in holy passion still,
 Forget thyself to marble, till
 With a sad leaden downward cast,
 Thou fix them on the earth as fast.
 45 And join with thee calm Peace, and Quiet,
 Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,
 And hears the Muses in a ring,
 Ay round about Jove's altar sing.
 And add to these retired Leisure,
 50 That in trim gardens takes his pleasure;
 But first, and chiefest, with thee bring,
 Him that yon soars on golden wing,
 Guiding the fiery-wheelèd throne,¹²

⁷ Vesta Classical goddess of hearth and home.

⁸ Saturn In classical myth, father of Jove (mentioned below); traditionally "solitary," he was associated with melancholics (hence the adjective "saturnine") even though his was the Golden Age.

⁹ Ida Mount Ida, in Crete, the traditional site from which Saturn ruled, before his son Jove overthrew him.

¹⁰ cypress lawn Lawn is a fine linen, usually white, but "cypress lawn" is black.

¹¹ wonted state Usual dignity.

¹² fiery-wheelèd throne Apparently referring to the Biblical vision of Ezekiel (Ezekiel 10) of a chariot guided by cherubim (angels).

The cherub Contemplation,¹
 55 And the mute Silence hist° along, summon
 'Less Philomel² will deign a song,
 In her sweetest, saddest plight,
 Smoothing the rugged brow of night,
 While Cynthia³ checks her dragon yoke,
 60 Gently o'er th' accustomed oak;
 Sweet bird that shunn'st the noise of folly,
 Most musical, most melancholy!
 Thee chauntress° oft the woods among, female singer
 I woo to hear thy even-song;
 65 And missing thee, I walk unseen
 On the dry smooth-shaven green,
 To behold the wandering moon,
 Riding near her highest noon,⁴
 Like one that had been led astray
 70 Through the heaven's wide pathless way;
 And oft, as if her head she bowed,
 Stooping through a fleecy cloud.
 Oft on a plat° of rising ground, patch
 I hear the far-off curfew sound,⁵
 75 Over some wide-watered shore,
 Swinging slow with sullen roar;
 Or if the air will not permit,
 Some still removèd place will fit,
 Where glowing embers through the room
 80 Teach light to counterfeit a gloom,
 Far from all resort of mirth,
 Save the cricket on the hearth,
 Or the bellman's° drowsy charm, night watchman
 To bless the doors from nightly harm:
 85 Or let my lamp at midnight hour,
 Be seen in some high lonely tower,

¹ The cherub Contemplation The cherubim are angels, second in the nine ranks of celestial hierarchy; their special faculty is contemplation of God.

² Philomel The nightingale, from a classical story in which a young woman, Philomela, is transformed into the sweet-singing bird after being raped and silenced by having her tongue cut out (hence "saddest plight").

³ Cynthia Classical goddess of the moon, here imagined as driving across the night sky in a chariot drawn by a dragon.

⁴ highest noon Highest point, apogee.

⁵ curfew sound Bells rung to signal the beginning of restrictions on nighttime activity.

Where I may oft outwatch the Bear,⁶
 With thrice great Hermes,⁷ or unsphere
 The spirit of Plato⁸ to unfold
 90 What worlds, or what vast regions hold
 The immortal mind that hath forsook
 Her mansion in this fleshly nook:
 And of those daemons⁹ that are found
 In fire, air, flood, or underground,
 95 Whose power hath a true consent
 With planet, or with element.
 Sometime let gorgeous Tragedy
 In sceptred pall¹⁰ come sweeping by,
 Presenting Thebes, or Pelops' line,¹¹
 100 Or the tale of Troy divine.
 Or what (though rare) of later age,
 Ennobled hath the buskined stage.¹²
 But, O sad virgin, that thy power
 Might raise Musaeus¹³ from his bower,
 105 Or bid the soul of Orpheus sing
 Such notes as warbled to the string,
 Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek,
 And made hell grant what love did seek.¹⁴

⁶ the Bear The constellation Ursa Major.

⁷ thrice great Hermes Hermes Trismegistus, the reputed author of the classical Corpus Hermeticum, a collection of mystical ("Hermetic") writings that Il Penseroso stays up all night to read.

⁸ Plato Il Penseroso contemplates reading the works of Plato, whose spirit is imagined as inhabiting a heavenly sphere or star.

⁹ daemons From neo-Platonic or Hermetic philosophy, spirits that inhabit the four "elements" of fire, air, water, and earth.

¹⁰ sceptred pall Cloak and trappings of royalty.

¹¹ Thebes, or Pelops' line Two royal families whose stories provided subject matter for classical tragedies: the house of Thebes was that of Oedipus and his family; the house of Pelops was the family of Atreus, Agamemnon, Orestes, Electra, and Iphigenia.

¹² buskined stage Tragedies, from the footwear worn by Greek tragic actors; Milton implies that good tragedies were rare in his (as opposed to the classical) period.

¹³ Musaeus In classical myth, a great singer, sometimes called the son of Orpheus.

¹⁴ Orpheus ... seek In classical myth, Orpheus was the master musician who traveled to the underworld to reclaim his wife, Eurydice, after she died. Touched by the beauty of Orpheus's playing, Pluto, god of the underworld, agreed to release her. But he made the condition that Orpheus had to leave the underworld without looking back to see if Eurydice was following; at the last minute, he looked, and lost her once again (hence she is "half-regained").

Or call up him¹ that left half-told
 110 The story of Cambuscan bold,
 Of Camball, and of Algarsife,
 And who had Canace to wife,
 That owned the virtuous ring and glass,
 And of the wondrous horse of brass,
 115 On which the Tartar king did ride;²
 And if aught else, great bards beside,
 In sage and solemn tunes have sung,
 Of tourneys and of trophies hung;
 Of forest, and enchantments drear,
 120 Where more is meant than meets the ear.³
 Thus Night oft see me in thy pale career,
 Till civil-suited Morn appear,
 Not tricked and frownced⁴ as she was wont,
 With the Attic boy⁵ to hunt,
 125 But kerchiefed in a comely^o cloud, attractive
 While rocking winds are piping loud,
 Or ushered with a shower still,
 When the gust hath blown his fill,
 Ending on the rustling leaves,
 130 With minute drops from off the eaves.
 And when the sun begins to fling
 His flaring beams, me goddess bring
 To archèd walks of twilight groves,
 And shadows brown that Sylvan⁶ loves
 135 Of pine, or monumental oak,
 Where the rude axe with heavèd stroke,
 Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
 Or fright them from their hallowed haunt.
 There in close covert^o by some brook, hidden shelter
 140 Where no profaner eye may look,

Hide me from day's garish eye,
 While the bee with honied thigh,
 That at her flowery work doth sing,
 And the waters murmuring
 145 With such consort^o as they keep, agreement, harmony
 Entice the dewy-feathered Sleep;
 And let some strange mysterious dream,
 Wave at his wings in airy stream,
 Of lively portraiture displayed,
 150 Softly on my eyelids laid.
 And as I wake, sweet music breathe
 Above, about, or underneath,
 Sent by some spirit to mortals good,
 Or th' unseen genius^o of the wood. guardian spirit
 155 But let my due^o feet never fail, dutiful
 To walk the studious cloister's⁷ pale,^o enclosure
 And love the high embowèd^o roof, arched
 With antique pillars' massy proof,^o solidity
 And storied windows⁸ richly dight,^o decorated 160 Casting a dim religious light.
 There let the pealing organ blow,
 To the full-voiced choir below,
 In service high, and anthems clear,
 As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
 165 Dissolve me into ecstasies,
 And bring all heaven before mine eyes.
 And may at last my weary age
 Find out the peaceful hermitage,
 The hairy gown and mossy cell,
 170 Where I may sit and rightly spell,⁹
 Of every star that heaven doth shew,
 And every herb that sips the dew;
 Till old experience do attain
 To something like prophetic strain.
 175 These pleasures Melancholy give,
 And I with thee will choose to live.

² story of... ride The romance of Cambuscan, his children Camball, Algarsife, and Canace, and the gifts of a brass horse and a magic ring, is told in Chaucer's unfinished "Squire's Tale" in The Canterbury Tales, and continued by Spenser in Book 4 of The Faerie Queene.

³ more is meant than meets the ear Reference to The Faerie Queene and Spenser's allegorical method.

⁴ civil-suited Morn... and frownced Soberly dressed, without showy clothes or hairstyle.

⁵ Attic boy In classical myth, Aurora (Dawn) loved Cephalus, an Athenian (Attic) youth.

⁶ Sylvan Sylvanus, Roman god of forests.

⁷ cloister Covered walk; here, probably a university, not a monastic, cloister.

⁸ storied windows Pictorial stained glass windows.

⁹ spell Study, decipher.

Lycidas

In this monody¹ the author bewails a learned friend,² unfortunately drowned in his passage from Chester on the Irish Seas, 1637. And by occasion foretells the ruin of our corrupted clergy then in their height.³

Y^et once more, O ye laurels, and once more
 Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sere,^o withered
 I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,^o unripe
 And with forced fingers rude,
 5 Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year.⁴
 Bitter constraint, and sad occasion dear,
 Compels me to disturb your season due:
 For Lycidas⁵ is dead, dead ere his prime,
 Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer:
 10 Who would not sing for Lycidas? he knew
 Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme.
 He must not float upon his watery bier⁶
 Unwept, and welter⁷ to the parching wind,
 Without the meed^o of some melodious tear. honor
 15 Begin then, sisters of the sacred well,⁸

² friend Edward King (1612–37), a fellow student of Milton's at Cambridge.

⁴ laurels ... mellowing year The three evergreens mentioned here were emblems of poetic achievement: laurel was sacred to Apollo, so a laurel wreath was the traditional crown of poets; myrtle was sacred to Venus, and so was an emblem of love poetry; ivy was linked with Bacchus, god of wine, and so was associated with poetic ecstasy or inspiration. By saying that he needs to pluck these berries before they are ripe, the speaker implies that he thinks himself unready to write the poetry these plants honored.

⁵ Lycidas Traditional name in classical and Renaissance pastoral literature.

⁶ bier Framework or stand on which a corpse or coffin is placed.

⁷ welter Roll or tumble about.

⁸ sisters of the sacred well The nine Muses; their well is the emblematic source of artistic inspiration.

That from beneath the seat of Jove⁹ doth spring,
 Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.
 Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse,
 So may some gentle muse
 20 With lucky words favour my destined urn,
 And as he passes turn,
 And bid fair peace be to my sable^o shroud. black
 For we were nursed upon the self-same hill,¹⁰
 Fed the same flock; by fountain, shade, and rill.^o brook
 25 Together both, ere the high lawns¹¹ appeared
 Under the opening eyelids of the morn,
 We drove afield, and both together heard
 What time the grey-fly winds¹² her sultry horn, Battening^o our flocks with the fresh dews¹³ feeding
 of night,
 30 Oft till the star that rose, at evening, bright
 Toward heaven's descent had sloped his westering wheel.
 Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute,
 Tempered^o to the oaten flute, attuned
 Rough satyrs¹⁴ danced, and fauns with cloven heel,
 35 From the glad sound would not be absent long,
 And old Damoetas¹⁵ loved to hear our song.
 But O the heavy change, now thou art gone,
 Now thou art gone, and never must return!
 Thee shepherd, thee the woods, and desert caves,
 40 With wild thyme and the gadding^o vine rambling
 o'ergrown,
 And all their echoes mourn.
 The willows, and the hazel copses green,
 Shall now no more be seen,
 Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.^o songs

⁹ seat of Jove Probably Mt. Olympus, from beneath which one of the muses' sacred springs flowed; possibly Mt. Helicon, the site of another sacred spring.

¹⁰ nursed upon the self-same hill Milton uses pastoral conventions to indicate that he and "Lycidas" went to the same school.

¹¹ lawns Open spaces between woods, glades.

¹² winds Blows its horn (that is, buzzes).

¹³ dews Grasses still covered in dew.

¹⁴ satyrs Part human, part animal creatures associated with lechery and wildness; when translated from the pastoral fiction, these are Milton's fellow undergraduates at Cambridge.

¹⁵ Damoetas Conventional pastoral name, and here a teacher or mentor figure, possibly alluding to a real tutor at Cambridge.

45 As killing as the canker¹ to the rose,
 Or taint-worm to the weanling herds² that graze,
 Or frost to flowers, that their gay wardrobe wear,
 When first the whitethorn blows;^o blooms
 Such, Lycidas, thy loss to shepherd's ear.
 50 Where were ye nymphs when the remorseless deep
 Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?
 For neither were ye playing on the steep,^o mountain
 Where your old bards, the famous Druids³ lie,
 Nor on the shaggy top of Mona high,
 55 Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream:
 Ay me, I fondly^o dream! foolishly
 Had ye been there—for what could that have done?
 What could the Muse herself that Orpheus bore,
 The Muse herself, for her enchanting son
 60 Whom universal nature did lament,
 When by the rout that made the hideous roar,
 His gory visage down the stream was sent,
 Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore.⁴
 Alas! What boots^o it with uncessant care profits
 65 To tend the homely^o slighted⁵ shepherd's trade, humble
 And strictly meditate the thankless Muse,
 Were it not better done as others use,
 To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
 Or with the tangles of Neaera's⁶ hair?
 70 Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
 (That last infirmity of noble mind)
 To scorn delights, and live laborious days;
 But the fair guerdon^o when we hope to find, reward
 And think to burst out into sudden blaze,

² taint-worm ... herds Intestinal parasite afflicting lambs or calves (weanlings).

³ Druids The speaker asks if the sea nymphs failed to save the King because they were playing in places associated with the Druids, ancient Celtic minstrel-poets or, here, "bards": Bardsey (the "steep" island where they "lie" buried), the island of Mona (Anglesey), and the river Dee (here, Latinized as "Deva") in Chester.

⁴ What could the Muse ... shore Orpheus was the greatest musician/poet in the classical tradition; his mother was the Muse Calliope. He met his death at the hands of Maenads, a group of women in an ecstatic frenzy. Orpheus's severed bleeding head ("gory visage") floated down the Hebrus river across the sea and to the island of Lesbos, where the Muses buried it.

⁵ slighted Treated with disrespect.

⁶ Amaryllis ... Neaera Conventional names in pastoral poetry for young women.

75 Comes the blind Fury⁷ with th' abhorrèd shears,
 And slits the thin-spun life. But not the praise,
 Phoebus⁸ replied, and touched my trembling ears;
 Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
 Nor in the glistening foil
 80 Set off to the world, nor in broad rumour lies,
 But lives and spreads aloft by those pure eyes,
 And perfect witness of all-judging Jove;
 As he pronounces lastly on each deed,
 Of so much fame in heaven expect thy meed.^o reward
 85 O fountain Arethuse,⁹ and thou honoured flood,
 Smooth-sliding Mincius¹⁰ crowned with vocal reeds,
 That strain^o I heard was of a higher mood: melody
 But now my oat¹¹ proceeds,
 And listens to the herald of the sea^o Triton
 90 That came in Neptune's plea,
 He asked the waves, and asked the felon winds,
 What hard mishap hath doomed this gentle swain?
 And questioned every gust of rugged wings¹²
 That blows from off each beakèd^o promontory; pointed 95 They knew not of his story,
 And sage Hippotades¹³ their answer brings,
 That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed,
 The air was calm, and on the level brine,
 Sleek Panope¹⁴ with all her sisters played.
 100 It was that fatal and perfidious bark^o ship
 Built in th' eclipse, and rigged with curses dark,
 That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.
 Next Camus,¹⁵ reverend sire, went footing slow,

⁷ Fury In classical myth, the three Fates respectively spun the thread of life, measured it, and then cut it; the Fate with the cutting shears was named Atropos, or Destiny. The speaker compares her to one of the Furies, another group of mythological sisters, who were snaky-haired agents of vengeance.

⁸ Phoebus Apollo, god of poetry.

⁹ Arethuse Fountain on an island near Sicily, associated with pastoral poetry; named for the nymph Arethusa, who was transformed into the fountain while being chased by the river god Alpheus (see below, line 132).

¹⁰ Mincius River in Mantua, where the Roman poet Virgil was born.

¹¹ oat Oaten flute (of l. 33); metaphorically, the speaker's song (poem).

¹² wings Winds, imagined as birdlike.

¹³ Hippotades Aeolus, the classical keeper of winds.

¹⁴ Panope The chief nymph of fifty sea-nymph sisters, the Nereids.

¹⁵ Camus Personification of the River Cam, in Cambridge.

His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge,¹
 105 Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge
 Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe.²
 Ah! who hath reft (quoth he) my dearest pledge?³
 Last came, and last did go,
 The pilot of the Galilean lake,⁴
 110 Two massy keys he bore of metals twain
 (The golden opes, the iron shuts amain°), forcefully
 He shook his mitred locks,⁵ and stern bespake,
 How well could I have spared for thee, young swain,
 Enow° of such as for their bellies' sake, enough
 115 Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold?° sheepfold
 Of other care they little reckoning make,
 Than how to scramble at the shearers' feast,
 And shove away the worthy bidden guest.
 Blind mouths! that scarce themselves know how to hold 120 A sheep-hook, or have learned aught else the least
 That to the faithful herdman's art belongs!
 What recks it them?⁶ What need they? They are sped;⁷
 And when they list,⁸ their lean and flashy songs
 Grate on their scrannel⁹ pipes of wretched straw,
 125 The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,
 But swoll'n with wind, and the rank mist they draw,° breathe
 Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread:

¹ His mantle ... sedge His cloak was coarsely woven, and his hat was woven of reeds.

² sanguine flower ... woe The hyacinth. In classical myth, it sprang from the blood of Hyacinthus, a youth beloved of Apollo; the god recorded his grief by marking the flower with the letters AI AI ("alas").

³ who hath ... pledge? Who has stolen Camus's dearest initiate?

⁴ pilot of the Galilean lake Usually identified as St. Peter, speaking as the founder of the Christian Church; he mourns the loss of a young man who had intended to enter the ministry. He holds the keys of the kingdom of Heaven (from Matthew 16.19). The pilot is sometimes identified as Christ. But as a (ship) pilot on Galilee, Peter would here appear to be paired with Christ, mentioned in line 173 below as "Him that walked the waves."

⁵ mitred locks Peter, the first bishop, wears the bishop's miter (a tall, cleft headdress), and shakes his head.

⁶ What recks it them? What do they care?

⁷ They are sped They have done well.

⁸ when they list When they choose, or please.

⁹ scrannel Shriveled, thin; an unusual word, probably provincial dialect, apparently chosen for its appropriately ugly sound.

Besides what the grim wolf¹⁰ with privy paw¹¹
 Daily devours apace, and nothing said,¹²
 130 But that two-handed engine¹³ at the door,
 Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more.
 Return Alpheus,¹⁴ the dread voice is past,
 That shrunk thy streams; return Sicilian Muse,¹⁵
 And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
 135 Their bells, and flowrets of a thousand hues.
 Ye valleys low where the mild whispers use,° frequent
 Of shades and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,
 On whose fresh lap the swart star¹⁶ sparsely looks,
 Throw hither all your quaint enamelled eyes,
 140 That on the green turf suck the honied showers,
 And purple all the ground with vernal° flowers. spring
 Bring the rathe° primrose that forsaken dies, early blooming
 The tufted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,
 The white pink, and the pansy freaked° with jet, streaked
 145 The glowing violet,
 The musk-rose, and the well-attired woodbine,
 With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head,
 And every flower that sad embroidery wears:
 Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
 150 And daffodillies fill their cups with tears,

¹⁰ wolf Usually identified as an allusion to the threat posed by Catholicism.

¹¹ with privy paw With secret or hidden steps; possibly also an allusion to the Privy Council, and implying that the government under Charles I was helping the Church push a Catholic agenda.

¹³ two-handed engine The specific reference here continues to be debated. Probably, in one respect, a sword: in Paradise Lost, the Archangel Michael wields a "huge two-handed" sword (6.251), which likely refers to the two-edged swords mentioned in Revelation 1.16 and Psalm 149.6. But as an emblem for divine agency or judgment, the "sword of God" can also be interpreted as manifesting itself in many different objects, institutions, or ideas (such as the two keys of line 110 above).

¹⁴ Alpheus River in Greece, and the god of the river (see l. 85 above). The speaker invites the return of sources that inspire the pastoral mode.

¹⁵ Sicilian Muse Probably Arethusa (see l. 85 above). Sicily was associated with the pastoral mode: the poet Theocritus (fl. 280 BCE), the creator of pastoral poetry, was Sicilian.

¹⁶ swart star Sirius, the Dog Star, associated with the hottest weeks of the year.

To strew the laureate¹ hearse where Lycid lies.
 For so to interpose a little ease,
 Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise
 (Ay me!) Whilst thee the shores, and sounding seas
 155 Wash far away, where'er thy bones are hurled,
 Whether beyond the stormy Hebrides
 Where thou perhaps under the whelming tide
 Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous world;
 Or whether thou to our moist vows denied,
 160 Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus² old,
 Where the great vision of the guarded mount³
 Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold;^o fortress
 Look homeward angel now, and melt with ruth.^o pity
 And, O ye dolphins, waft the hapless youth.
 165 Weep no more, woeful shepherds weep no more,
 For Lycidas your sorrow is not dead,
 Sunk though he be beneath the watery floor,
 So sinks the day-star^o in the ocean bed, the sun
 And yet anon^o repairs his drooping head, soon
 170 And tricks his beams, and with new spangled ore,⁴
 Flames in the forehead of the morning sky:
 So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high,
 Through the dear might of him⁵ that walked the waves,
 Where other groves, and other streams along,
 175 With nectar pure his oozy locks he laves,^o washes
 And hears the unexpressive^o nuptial song, inexpressive
 In the blest kingdoms meek^o of joy and love. gentle
 There entertain him all the saints above,
 In solemn troops, and sweet societies
 180 That sing, and singing in their glory move,
 And wipe the tears for ever from his eyes.

Now Lycidas the shepherds weep no more;
 Henceforth thou art the genius^o of the shore, guardian spirit
 In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
 185 To all that wander in that perilous flood.
 Thus sang the uncouth^o swain to th' oaks unknown
 and rills,
 While the still morn went out with sandals grey,
 He touched the tender stops of various quills,^o reeds (flutes)
 With eager thought warbling his Doric⁶ lay:
 190 And now the sun had stretched out all the hills,
 And now was dropped into the western bay;
 At last he rose, and twitched^o his mantle blue:⁷ tossed on Tomorrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.⁸
 —1638, 1645

Sonnets

7
 How soon hath Time the subtle thief of youth,
 Stol'n on his wing my three and twentieth year!
 My hasting days fly on with full career,
 But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th.^o shows
 5 Perhaps my semblance might deceive the truth,
 That I to manhood am arriv'd so near,
 And inward ripeness doth much less appear,
 That some more timely-happy spirits endu'th.^o endows
 Yet be it less or more, or soon or slow,
 10 It shall be still^o in strictest measure ev'n, always
 To that same lot, however mean, or high,
 Toward which Time leads me, and the will of Heav'n;
 All is, if I have grace to use it so,
 As ever in my great task-master's eye.
 —1645 (WRITTEN EITHER 1631 OR 1632)

² Bellerus Milton apparently invents the name from Bellarium, the Latin name for Land's End in Cornwall, the south-west tip of England.

³ guarded mount St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, from which the Archangel was traditionally said to guard England; here, Michael looks out toward two places in Spain, but is asked to look "homeward" in pity for Lycidas.

⁴ tricks his beams ... ore The sun adorns its beams with fresh gold.

⁵ him Christ (Matthew 14.25–31).

⁶ Doric Musical mode.

⁷ blue Color traditionally associated with hope.

⁸ Thus sang ... new The final eight lines, rhyming ABABABCC, reflect the form of an ottava rima stanza, one pattern associated with epic narrative poetry.

16¹TO THE LORD GENERAL CROMWELL²

Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud
 Not of war only, but detractions rude,
 Guided by faith and matchless fortitude,
 To peace and truth thy glorious way hast ploughed,
 5 And on the neck of crowned Fortune proud
 Hast reared God's trophies, and his work pursued, While Darwen stream³ with blood of Scots
 imbrued,^o permeated
 And Dunbar field⁴ resounds thy praises loud,
 And Worcester's⁵ laureate wreath; yet much remains
 10 To conquer still: peace hath her victories
 No less renown'd than war. New foes arise
 Threat'ning to bind our souls with secular chains:⁶
 Help us to save free conscience from the paw
 Of hireling⁷ wolves whose Gospel is their maw.
 —1694 (WRITTEN 1652)

18⁸ON THE LATE MASSACRE IN PIEDMONT⁹

Avenge O Lord thy slaughtered saints,¹⁰ whose bones
 Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold,
 Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old
 When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones,
 5 Forget not: in thy book record their groans
 Who were thy sheep and in their ancient fold
 Slain by the bloody Piedmontese that rolled
 Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
 The vales redoubled to the hills, and they 10 To Heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow
 O'er all the Italian fields where still doth sway
 The triple tyrant:¹¹ that from these may grow
 A hundredfold, who having learnt thy way
 Early may fly the Babylonian¹² woe.
 —1673 (WRITTEN 1655)

When I consider how my light is spent,
 Ere half my days,¹⁴ in this dark world and wide,
 And that one talent¹⁵ which is death to hide,

¹ 16 Not published in Milton's lifetime. It is numbered sonnet 16 in Milton's manuscript version, though some modern editions give the number 16 to "When I consider how my light is spent" (Sonnet 19 here). The manuscript dates the poem May 1652, and has a scratched-out subtitle: "On the proposals of certain ministers at the Committee for Propagation of the Gospel."

² TO THE LORD GENERAL CROMWELL Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), at the time Commander-in-Chief of the Parliamentary Army, and subsequently Lord Protector.

³ Darwen stream The river near Preston, where Cromwell defeated a Scottish army in August 1648.

⁴ Dunbar field Where Cromwell routed the Scottish army in September 1650.

⁵ Worcester Where Cromwell in 1651 defeated the Royalist Army of Charles II, who was crowned in Scotland when in exile after the death of his father.

⁶ To conquer ... secular chains Referring to the proposals mentioned in the poem's manuscript subtitle (see note above) that sought to reinstall a state-controlled church.

⁷ hireling Milton disapproved of compulsory tithes, believing that congregations should be able to hire ministers of their own choosing: to him, ministers in a state church are hired state employees.

⁸ 18 Some modern editions number this sonnet 15, the number assigned it in the 1673 edition of Milton's Poems.

⁹ MASSACRE IN PIEDMONT In April 1655, a Catholic army under the command of the Duke of Savoy began a persecution of the Vaudois or Waldensians, a Protestant sect that lived in the mountainous Piedmont region of Italy, near the Swiss border. The Waldensians had broken away from the Catholic Church in the twelfth century. But seventeenth-century Protestants thought they represented a much older tradition, and regarded them as having retained the beliefs of the primitive Church.

¹⁰ saints The term "saint" can refer not only to a martyr or one who has been canonized, but also to any believer in Christ. See, e.g., 1 Corinthians 1.2, 2 Corinthians 1.1, and Romans 1.7.

¹¹ triple tyrant The Pope, from the three-crowned papal miter or headdress.

¹² Babylonian Protestants of Milton's time often used Babylon as a metaphor for the excesses of the papal court.

¹³ 19 Numbered sonnet 16 in some modern editions. The title "On his blindness" was added in the eighteenth century, and appears in some modern editions.

¹⁴ half my days The source of much debate on the date of this poem: Milton was born in December 1608, and it is not clear by what standard he judges the normal length of a life. He was totally blind by early 1652.

¹⁵ talent Alluding to the parable of the talents in Matthew 25.14–30.

Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent
 5 To serve therewith my maker, and present
 My true account, lest he returning chide,
 Doth God exact day-labour, light denied,
 I fondly^o ask; but patience to prevent foolishly
 That murmur, soon replies, God doth not need
 10 Either man's work or his own gifts, who best
 Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best; his state
 Is kingly. 'Thousands'¹ at his bidding speed
 And post^o o'er land and ocean without rest: ride
 They also serve who only stand and wait.
 —1673 (PROBABLY WRITTEN 1652)

Methought I saw my late espoused saint³
 Brought to me, like Alcestis,⁴ from the grave,
 Whom Jove's great son to her glad husband gave,
 Rescued from death by force, though pale and faint.
 5 Mine, as whom washed from spot of child-bed taint
 Purification in the old Law⁵ did save,
 And such as yet once more I trust to have Full sight of her in Heaven without restraint,
 Came vested all in white, pure as her mind;
 10 Her face was veiled,⁶ yet to my fancied sight
 Love, sweetness, goodness in her person shined
 So clear as in no face with more delight.
 But O as to embrace me she inclined,
 I waked, she fled, and day brought back my night.

² 23 Numbered sonnet 19 in some modern editions.

³ late espoused saint Milton's first wife, Mary Powell, died in May 1652, shortly after giving birth to their daughter Deborah. His second wife, Katherine Woodcock, died in February 1658, several months after giving birth to their daughter Katherine. Most scholars believe that the poem refers to Katherine, though arguments have been made for Mary as its subject.

⁴ Alcestis In classical myth, Alcestis sacrificed her life to save her husband, Admetus; Hercules, the son of Jove, repays Admetus's hospitality to him by forcing Death (in a wrestling match) to return her alive. The story is told in the play Alcestis by Euripides.

⁵ Purification in the old Law Referring to the rites of purification after childbirth detailed in Leviticus 12 (the old Law of the Old Testament, as opposed to the new Law of the New Testament).

⁶ veiled Like Alcestis, when she returned; but also from the reader.

from Areopagitica:
A Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing,
*to the Parliament of England*⁷

They who to states and governors of the Commonwealth direct their speech, High Court of Parliament, or, wanting such access in a private condition, write that which they foresee may advance the public good; I suppose them, as at the beginning of no mean endeavour, not a little altered and moved inwardly in their minds: some with doubt of what will be the success, others with fear of what will be the censure; some with hope, others with confidence of what they have to speak. And me perhaps each of these dispositions, as the subject was whereon I entered, may have at other times variously affected; and likely might in these foremost expressions now also disclose which of them swayed most, but that the very attempt of this address thus made, and the thought of whom it hath recourse to, hath got the power within me to a passion, far more welcome than incidental to a preface. ...

If ye be thus resolved, as it were injury to think ye were not, I know not what should withhold me from presenting ye with a fit instance wherein to show both that love of truth which ye eminently profess, and that uprightness of your judgment which is not wont to be ⁷ Areopagitica ... England Milton's title invokes the Areopagite Discourse (c. 355 BCE) by the Greek orator Isocrates, who advocated a return to the days when the Athenian court of the Areopagus (a kind of Supreme Court) was a model of virtue, wisdom, and responsibility. Milton might also expect his readers to remember that Saint Paul delivered an oration on the Areopagus, the hill outside Athens that gave its name to the court that met there (Acts 17.19-34). Milton's text is in the form of an oration to Parliament, the entity the speaker addresses throughout. His motive for writing was a Parliamentary order (June 1643) that banned the publication of any book that had not been licensed before publication: what Milton attacks here is pre-publication censorship, not censorship in general (he does not argue for complete freedom of the press). Milton's main strategy is to embarrass Parliament by linking their attempt to control the press to the similar powers wielded by the monarchical government they were battling to overthrow.

partial to yourselves; by judging over again that Order which ye have ordained to regulate printing: that no book, pamphlet, or paper shall be henceforth printed, unless the same be first approved and licensed by such, or at least one of such, as shall thereto be appointed. For that part which preserves justly every man's copy to himself, or provides for the poor, I touch not, only wish they be not made pretences to abuse and persecute honest and painful men, who offend not in either of these particulars. But that other clause of licensing books, which we thought had died with his brother quadragesimal and matrimonial¹ when the prelates expired, I shall now attend with such a homily, as shall lay before ye, first the inventors of it to be those whom ye will be loath to own; next what is to be thought in general of reading, whatever sort the books be; and that this Order avails nothing to the suppressing of scandalous, seditious, and libellous books, which were mainly intended to be suppressed. Last, that it will be primarily to the discouragement of all learning, and the stop of Truth, not only by disexercising and blunting our abilities in what we know already, but by hindering and cropping the discovery that might be yet further made both in religious and civil wisdom.

I deny not, but that it is of greatest concernment in the Church and Commonwealth to have a vigilant eye how books demean themselves as well as men; and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors. For books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous dragon's teeth;² and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book. Who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. 'Tis true, no age can restore a life, whereof perhaps there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse.

We should be wary therefore what persecutions we raise against the living labours of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom, and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre; whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at that ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself, slays an immortality rather than a life. ...

Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed upon Psyche³ as an incessant labour to cull out, and sort asunder, were not more intermixed. It was from out the rind of one apple tasted, that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil, that is to say of knowing good by evil. As therefore the state of man now is; what wisdom can there be to choose, what continence to forbear without the knowledge of evil? He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring Christian.

I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather; that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue therefore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental¹ whiteness. Which was the reason why our sage and serious poet Spenser, whom I dare be known to think a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas, describing true temperance under the person of Guyon, brings him in with his Palmer through the cave of Mammon, and the bower of earthly bliss, that he might see and know, and yet abstain.² Since therefore the knowledge and survey of vice is in this world so necessary to the constituting of human virtue, and the scanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more safely, and with less danger, scout into the regions of sin and falsity than by reading all manner of tractates and hearing all manner of reason? And this is the benefit which may be had of books promiscuously read. ...

¹ quadragesimal and matrimonial Referring to powers formerly held by bishops to award dispensations, here specifically those governing dietary restrictions in Lent ("quadragesimal" refers to Lent's forty days) and marriage licenses. Milton's point, a recurring one, is that with this new order, Parliament was giving itself the kind of controlling powers it had abolished when it abolished episcopacy.

² dragon's teeth In Greek mythology, the teeth of a dragon slain by the hero Cadmus bred armed men when sown in the ground.

³ Psyche Apuleius (born 125 CE) tells the story of Cupid and Psyche in The Golden Ass; Psyche's impossible task was set her by her mother-in-law, Venus.

If we think to regulate printing, thereby to rectify manners, we must regulate all recreations and pastimes, all that is delightful to man. No music must be heard, no song be set or sung, but what is grave and Doric.³ There must be licensing dancers, that no gesture, motion, or deportment be taught our youth but what by their allowance shall be thought honest; for such Plato was provided of; it will ask more than the work of twenty licensers to examine all the lutes, the violins, and the guitars in every house; they must not be suffered to prattle as they do, but must be licensed what they may say. And who shall silence all the airs and madrigals that whisper softness in chambers? The windows also, and the balconies must be thought on; there are shrewd books, with dangerous frontispieces, set to sale; who shall prohibit them, shall twenty licensers? The villages also must have their visitors to inquire what lectures the bagpipe and the rebeck⁴ reads, even to the ballatry and the gamut of every municipal fiddler, for these are the countryman's Arcadias, and his Montemayors.⁵

Next, what more national corruption, for which England hears ill abroad, than household gluttony: who shall be the rectors of our daily rioting? And what shall be done to inhibit the multitudes that frequent those houses where drunkenness is sold and harboured? Our garments also should be referred to the licensing of some more sober workmasters to see them cut into a less wanton garb. Who shall regulate all the mixed conversation of our youth, male and female together, as is the fashion of this country? Who shall still appoint what shall be discoursed, what presumed, and no further? Lastly, who shall forbid and separate all idle resort, all evil company? These things will be, and must be; but how they shall be least hurtful, how least enticing, herein consists the grave and governing wisdom of a state.

To sequester out of the world into Atlantic and Utopian polities which never can be drawn into use will not mend our condition; but to ordain wisely as in this world of evil, in the midst whereof God hath placed us unavoidably. Nor is it Plato's licensing of books will do this, which necessarily pulls along with it so many other kinds of licensing, as will make us all both ridiculous and weary, and yet frustrate; but those unwritten, or at least unconstraining, laws of virtuous education, religious and civil nurture, which Plato there mentions as the bonds and ligaments of the commonwealth, the pillars and the sustainers of every written statute; these they be which will bear chief sway in such matters as these, when all licensing will be easily eluded. Impunity

² Which was the reason ... yet abstain Milton here famously misremembers The Faerie Queene. Guyon, the Knight of Temperance in Book 2, does resist the temptation offered by the Bower of Bliss (2.12.42ff.) with the aid of the Palmer (a pilgrim who has been to the Holy Land, and in Spenser a figure for the reason that restrains passion). But Guyon's settled habits of temperance allow him to withstand the temptations of Mammon's cave on his own (2.7.2, 2.8.3).

³ Doric One of the "modes" of ancient music; in his Republic, Plato (cited later in the paragraph) used "Doric" to describe poetry that was manly and dignified.

⁴ bagpipe and the rebeck Viewed as rustic instruments; a rebeck is a three-stringed fiddle.

⁵ the countryman's Arcadias, and his Montemayors That is, popular music is the rural equivalent to sophisticated prose romances, such as Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1590) and Jorge de Montemayor's Diana (c. 1559).

and remissness, for certain, are the bane of a commonwealth; but here the great art lies, to discern in what the law is to bid restraint and punishment, and in what things persuasion only is to work.

If every action which is good or evil in man at ripe years were to be under pittance and prescription and compulsion, what were virtue but a name, what praise could be then due to well-doing, what gramercy to be sober, just, or continent? Many there be that complain of Divine Providence for suffering Adam to transgress; foolish tongues! When God gave him reason, he gave him freedom to choose, for reason is but choosing; he had been else a mere artificial Adam, such an Adam as he is in the motions. We ourselves esteem not of that obedience, or love, or gift, which is of force: God therefore left him free, set before him a provoking object, ever almost in his eyes; herein consisted his merit, herein the right of his reward, the praise of his abstinence. Wherefore did he create passions within us, pleasures round about us, but that these rightly tempered are the very ingredients of virtue? ...

And lest some should persuade ye, Lords and Commons, that these arguments of learned men's discouragement at this your Order are mere flourishes, and not real, I could recount what I have seen and heard in other countries, where this kind of inquisition tyrannizes; when I have sat among their learned men, for that honour I had, and been counted happy to be born in such a place of philosophic freedom, as they supposed England was, while themselves did nothing but bemoan the servile condition into which learning amongst them was brought; that this was it which had damped the glory of Italian wits; that nothing had been there written now these many years but flattery and fustian. There it was that I found and visited the famous Galileo,¹ grown old a prisoner to the Inquisition, for thinking in astronomy otherwise than the Franciscan and Dominican licensers thought.

And though I knew that England then was groaning loudest under the prelatical yoke, nevertheless I took it as a pledge of future happiness, that other nations were so persuaded of her liberty. Yet was it beyond my hope that those worthies were then breathing in her air, who should be her leaders to such a deliverance, as shall never be forgotten by any revolution of time that this world hath to finish. When that was once begun, it was as little in my fear that, what words of complaint I heard among learned men of other parts uttered against the Inquisition, the same I should hear by as learned men at home uttered in time of Parliament against an order of licensing; and that so generally that, when I had disclosed myself a companion of their discontent, I might say, if without envy, that he whom an honest quaestorship had endeared to the Sicilians was not more by them importuned against Verres,² than the favourable opinion which I had among many who honour ye, and are known and respected by ye, loaded me with entreaties and persuasions, that I would not despair to lay together that which just reason should bring into my mind, toward the removal of an undeserved thralldom upon learning. That this is not therefore the disburdening of a particular fancy, but the common grievance of all those who had prepared their minds and studies above the vulgar pitch to advance truth in others, and from others to entertain it, thus much may satisfy. ...

Truth indeed came once into the world with her Divine Master, and was a perfect shape most glorious to look on: but when He ascended, and His Apostles after Him were laid asleep, then straight arose a wicked race of deceivers, who, as that story goes of the Egyptian Typhon with his conspirators, how they dealt with the good Osiris,³ took the virgin Truth, hewed her lovely form into a thousand pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. From that time ever since, the sad friends of Truth, such as durst appear, imitating the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, went up and down gathering up limb by limb, still as they could find them. We have not yet found them all, Lords and Commons, nor ever shall do, till her Master's second coming; He shall bring together every joint and member, and shall mold them into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection. Suffer not these licensing prohibitions to stand at every place of opportunity, forbidding and disturbing them that continue seeking, that continue to do our obsequies to the torn body of our martyred saint.

¹ There it was ... Galileo Milton visited Italy in 1638-39; there seems no reason to doubt his claim to have visited Galileo, who is the only contemporary Milton names in Paradise Lost (5.262). Galileo at the time was under house arrest for having published his Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief World Systems.

² he ... Verres Cicero (106-43 BCE), whose forensic oratory drove the corrupt Gaius Verres from office.

³ Typhon ... Osiris Milton's source for this allegory about the search for the divided body of truth is likely Plutarch's essay "On Isis and Osiris." Typhon (the Egyptian god Set) tore up and scattered the body of Osiris; Isis, Osiris's sister, collected the pieces and put them back together.

We boast our light; but if we look not wisely on the Sun itself, it smites us into darkness. Who can discern those planets that are oft combust, and those stars of brightest magnitude that rise and set with the Sun, until the opposite motion of their orbs bring them to such a place in the firmament, where they may be seen evening or morning? The light which we have gained was given us, not to be ever staring on, but by it to discover onward things more remote from our knowledge. It is not the unfrocking of a priest, the unmitring of a bishop, and the removing him from off the Presbyterian shoulders, that will make us a happy nation. No, if other things as great in the Church, and in the rule of life both economical and political, be not looked into and reformed, we have looked so long upon the blaze that Zwinglius and Calvin¹ hath beaconed up to us, that we are stark blind. There be who perpetually complain of schisms and sects, and make it such a calamity that any man dissents from their maxims. 'Tis their own pride and ignorance which causes the disturbing, who neither will hear with meekness, nor can convince; yet all must be suppressed which is not found in their syntagma.² They are the troublers, they are the dividers of unity, who neglect and permit not others to unite those dis severed pieces which are yet wanting to the body of Truth. To be still searching what we know not by what we know, still closing up truth to truth as we find it (for all her body is homogeneous and proportional), this is the golden rule in theology as well as in arithmetic, and makes up the best harmony in a Church; not the forced and outward union of cold and neutral, and inwardly divided minds.

Lords and Commons of England, consider what nation it is whereof ye are, and whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious and piercing spirit, acute to invent, subtle and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point, the highest that human capacity can soar to. Therefore the studies of Learning in her deepest sciences have been so ancient and so eminent among us, that writers of good antiquity and ablest judgment have been persuaded that even the school of Pythagoras and the Persian wisdom took beginning from the old philosophy of this island. And that wise and civil Roman, Julius Agricola, who governed once here for Caesar, preferred the natural wits of Britain before the laboured studies of the French.³ Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Transylvanian sends out yearly from as far as the mountainous borders of Russia, and beyond the Hercynian wilderness, not their youth, but their staid men, to learn our language and our theologic arts.⁴

Yet that which is above all this, the favour and the love of Heaven, we have great argument to think in a peculiar manner propitious and propending towards us. Why else was this nation chosen before any other, that out of her, as out of Sion, should be proclaimed and sounded forth the first tidings and trumpet of Reformation to all Europe? And had it not been the obstinate perverseness of our prelates against the divine and admirable spirit of Wycliffe,⁵ to suppress him as a schismatic and innovator, perhaps neither the Bohemian

³ And that wise ... the French Citing a story that appears in the Roman historian Tacitus, Agricola, 21.

⁴ Nor is it ... theologic arts Many theologians from strongly Protestant Transylvania came to study during this period in Western European universities.

⁵ Wycliffe John Wycliffe (c. 1324–84), an early Church reformer associated with the Lollard movement, often regarded as a proto-Protestant.

Huss and Jerome,¹ no nor the name of Luther or of Calvin, had been ever known: the glory of reforming all our neighbours had been completely ours. But now, as our obdurate clergy have with violence demeaned the matter, we are become hitherto the latest and backwardest scholars, of whom God offered to have made us the teachers. Now once again by all concurrence of signs, and by the general instinct of holy and devout men, as they daily and solemnly express their thoughts, God is decreeing to begin some new and great period in his Church, even to the reforming of Reformation itself: what does He then but reveal himself to His servants, and as His manner is, first to his Englishmen? I say, as his manner is, first to us, though we mark not the method of His counsels, and are unworthy.

Behold now this vast city: a city of refuge, the mansion house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with His protection; the shop of war hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed Justice in defence of beleaguered Truth, than there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching Reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and convincement. What could a man require more from a nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soil but wise and faithful labourers, to make a knowing people, a nation of prophets, of sages, and of worthies? We reckon more than five months yet to harvest; there need not be five weeks; had we but eyes to lift up, the fields are white already.²

Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. Under these fantastic terrors of sect and schism, we wrong the earnest and zealous thirst after knowledge and understanding which God hath stirred up in this city. What some lament of, we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men, to reassume the ill-reputed care of their Religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to join, and unite in one general and brotherly search after Truth; could we but forgo this prelatical tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men. I doubt not, if some great and worthy stranger should come among us, wise to discern the mold and temper of a people, and how to govern it, observing the high hopes and aims, the diligent alacrity of our extended thoughts and reasonings, in the pursuance of truth and freedom, but that he would cry out as Pyrrhus did,³ admiring the Roman docility and courage: If such were my Epirots, I would not despair the greatest design that could be attempted, to make a Church or Kingdom happy.

Yet these are the men cried out against for schismatics and sectaries; as if, while the temple of the Lord was building, some cutting, some squaring the marble, others hewing the cedars, there should be a sort of irrational men who could not consider there must be many schisms and many dissections made in the quarry and in the timber, ere the house of God can be built. And when every stone is laid artfully together, it cannot be united into a continuity, it can but be contiguous in this world; neither can every piece of the building be of one form; nay rather the perfection consists in this, that, out of many moderate varieties and brotherly dissimilarities that are not vastly disproportional, arises the goodly and the graceful symmetry that commends the whole pile and structure.

Let us therefore be more considerate builders, more wise in spiritual architecture, when great reformation is expected. For now the time seems come, wherein Moses the great prophet may sit in heaven rejoicing to see that memorable and glorious wish of his fulfilled, when not only our seventy Elders, but all the Lord's people, are ¹ Huss and Jerome John Huss (c. 1383–1415), founder of an influential reform movement in Bohemia, also often regarded as proto-Protestant; Jerome of Prague (d. 1416) was a disciple of both Wycliffe and Huss.

² We reckon ... white already Milton here adapts John 4.35.

³ Pyrrhus did Pyrrhus, King of Epirus (his people are the "Epirots" mentioned later in the paragraph) defeated a Roman army in 280 BCE.

become prophets. No marvel then though some men, and some good men too perhaps, but young in goodness, as Joshua then was, envy them. They fret, and out of their own weakness are in agony, lest these divisions and subdivisions will undo us. The adversary again applauds, and waits the hour: When they have branched themselves out, saith he, small enough into parties and partitions, then will be our time. Fool! he sees not the firm root, out of which we all grow, though into branches: nor will beware until he see our small divided maniples¹ cutting through at every angle of his ill-united and unwieldy brigade. And that we are to hope better of all these supposed sects and schisms, and that we shall not need that solicitude, honest perhaps though overtimorous of them that vex in this behalf, but shall laugh in the end at those malicious applauders of our differences, I have these reasons to persuade me.

First, when a city shall be as it were besieged and blocked about, her navigable river infested, inroads and incursions round, defiance and battle oft rumoured to be marching up even to her walls and suburb trenches, that then the people, or the greater part, more than at other times, wholly taken up with the study of highest and most important matters to be reformed, should be disputing, reasoning, reading, inventing, discoursing, even to a rarity and admiration, things not before discoursed or written of, argues first a singular goodwill, contentedness and confidence in your prudent foresight and safe government, Lords and Commons; and from thence derives itself to a gallant bravery and well-grounded contempt of their enemies, as if there were no small number of as great spirits among us, as his was, who when Rome was nigh besieged by Hannibal, being in the city, bought that piece of ground at no cheap rate, whereon Hannibal himself encamped his own regiment.

Next, it is a lively and cheerful presage of our happy success and victory. For as in a body, when the blood is fresh, the spirits pure and vigorous, not only to vital but to rational faculties, and those in the acutest and the pertest operations of wit and subtlety, it argues in what good plight and constitution the body is so when the cheerfulness of the people is so sprightly up, as that it has not only wherewith to guard well its own freedom and safety, but to spare, and to bestow upon the solidest and sublimest points of controversy and new invention, it betokens us not degenerated, nor drooping to a fatal decay, but casting off the old and wrinkled skin of corruption to outlive these pangs and wax young again, entering the glorious ways of truth and prosperous virtue, destined to become great and honourable in these latter ages. Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing² her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam; purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms.

What would ye do then? Should ye suppress all this flowery crop of knowledge and new light sprung up and yet springing daily in this city? should ye set an oligarchy of twenty engrossers³ over it, to bring a famine upon our minds again, when we shall know nothing but what is measured to us by their bushel? Believe it, Lords and Commons, they who counsel ye to such a suppressing do as good as bid ye suppress yourselves; and I will soon show how. If it be desired to know the immediate cause of all this free writing and free speaking, there cannot be assigned a truer than your own mild and free and humane government. It is the liberty, Lords and Commons, which your own valorous and happy counsels have purchased us, liberty which is the nurse of all great wits; this is that which hath rarefied and enlightened our spirits like the influence of heaven; this is that which hath enfranchised, enlarged and lifted up our apprehensions degrees above themselves.

Ye cannot make us now less capable, less knowing, less eagerly pursuing of the truth, unless ye first make yourselves, that made us so, less the lovers, less the founders of our true liberty. We can grow ignorant again, brutish, formal and slavish, as ye found us; but you then must first become that which ye cannot be, oppressive, arbitrary and tyrannous, as they were from whom ye have freed us. That our hearts are now more capacious, our thoughts more erected to the search and expectation of greatest and exactest things, is the issue of your own virtue propagated in us; ye cannot suppress that, unless ye reinforce an abrogated and merciless law, that fathers may dispatch at will their own children. And who shall then stick closest to ye, and excite others? not he who takes up arms for coat and conduct and his four nobles of Danegelt.¹ Although I dispraise not the defence of just immunities, yet love my peace better, if that were all. Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties. ...

² mewing Renewing, from a term in falconry meaning to moult.

³ engrossers Monopolists.

For who knows not that Truth is strong, next to the Almighty? She needs no policies, nor stratagems, nor licensings to make her victorious; those are the shifts and the defences that error uses against her power. Give her but room, and do not bind her when she sleeps, for then she speaks not true, as the old Proteus² did, who spake oracles only when he was caught and bound, but then rather she turns herself into all shapes, except her own, and perhaps tunes her voice according to the time, as Micaiah did before Ahab,³ until she be adjured into her own likeness. Yet is it not impossible that she may have more shapes than one. What else is all that rank of things indifferent, wherein Truth may be on this side or on the other, without being unlike herself? What but a vain shadow else is the abolition of those ordinances, that handwriting nailed to the cross? What great purchase is this Christian liberty which Paul so often boasts of? His doctrine is, that he who eats or eats not, regards a day or regards it not, may do either to the Lord. How many other things might be tolerated in peace, and left to conscience, had we but charity, and were it not the chief stronghold of our hypocrisy to be ever judging one another?

I fear yet this iron yoke of outward conformity hath left a slavish print upon our necks; the ghost of a linen decency⁴ yet haunts us. We stumble and are impatient at the least dividing of one visible congregation from another, though it be not in fundamentals; and through our forwardness to suppress, and our backwardness to recover any enthralled piece of truth out of the grip of custom, we care not to keep truth separated from truth, which is the fiercest rent and disunion of all. We do not see that, while we still affect by all means a rigid external formality, we may as soon fall again into a gross conforming stupidity, a stark and dead congealment of wood and hay and stubble, forced and frozen together, which is more to the sudden degenerating of a Church than many subdichotomies of petty schisms.

Not that I can think well of every light separation, or that all in a Church is to be expected gold and silver and precious stones: it is not possible for man to sever the wheat from the tares, the good fish from the other fry; that must be the angels' ministry at the end of mortal things. Yet if all cannot be of one mind—as who looks they should be?—this doubtless is more wholesome, more prudent, and more Christian that many be tolerated, rather than all compelled. I mean not tolerated popery, and open superstition, which, as it extirpates all religions and civil supremacies, so itself should be extirpate, provided first that all charitable and compassionate means be used to win and regain the weak and the misled: that also which is impious or evil absolutely either against faith or manners no law can possibly permit, that intends not to unlaw itself: but those neighbouring differences, or rather indifferences, are what I speak of, whether in some point of doctrine or of discipline, which, though they may be many, yet need not interrupt the unity of Spirit, if we could but find among us the bond of peace.

In the meanwhile if any one would write, and bring his helpful hand to the slow-moving Reformation which we labour under, if Truth have spoken to him before others, or but seemed at least to speak, who hath so bejesuited us that we should trouble that man with asking licence to do so worthy a deed? and not consider this, that if it come to prohibiting, there is not aught more likely to be prohibited than truth itself; whose first appearance to our eyes, bleared and dimmed with prejudice and custom, is more unsightly and unpalatable than many errors, even as the person is of many a great man slight and contemptible to see to. And what do they tell us vainly of new opinions, when this very opinion of theirs, that none must be heard, but whom they like, is the worst and newest opinion of all others; and is the chief cause why sects and schisms do so much abound, and true knowledge is kept at distance from us; besides yet a greater danger which is in it? ...

And as for regulating the press, let no man think to have the honour of advising ye better than yourselves have done in that Order published next before this, "that no book be printed, unless the printer's and the author's name, or at least the printer's, be registered."¹

Those which otherwise come forth, if they be found mischievous and libellous, the fire and the executioner will be the timeliest and the most effectual remedy that man's prevention can use. For this authentic Spanish policy of licensing books, if I have said aught, will prove the most unlicensed book itself within a short while; and was the immediate image of a Star Chamber decree² to that purpose made in those very times when that Court did the rest of those her pious works, for which she is now fallen from the stars with Lucifer. Whereby ye may guess what kind of state prudence, what love of the people, what care of religion or good manners there was at the contriving, although with singular hypocrisy it pretended to bind books to their good behaviour.

¹ And as for regulating ... be registered Milton cites a Parliamentary Order of January 29, 1642.

² Star Chamber decree Referring to the 1637 Star Chamber decree for licensing books; the Court of Star Chamber at Westminster Palace was associated with efforts to maintain royal authority before the war, and had been abolished by Parliament in 1641. Milton punningly links the "fallen" Star Chamber with Lucifer, the "morning star" (Isaiah 14.12) and "fallen" angel.

Paradise Lost

While there is some evidence that Milton drafted parts of Paradise Lost in the 1640s, he appears to have written most of the poem between about 1658 and about 1663. He thus composed his great epic of human loss followed by the restoration of hope across the Restoration of 1660, an event that marked the collapse of the English Republic and Milton's own hopes for a reformed political and religious structure. Paradise Lost was first published in 1667 as a work of ten books. Milton subsequently re-divided the poem (with the original Books 7 and 10 each split into two) and republished it in 1674 as a work in twelve books, thus more closely mirroring the form of Virgil's Aeneid. Since Milton had gone completely blind in the early 1650s, he wrote the work through dictation. Interestingly, the one surviving manuscript (which includes only Book 1) reveals that he nevertheless revised with a view to spelling and punctuation.

The epic, written in blank verse (i.e., unrhymed lines of iambic pentameter), draws heavily on classical inspiration and is highly allusive. Scholars estimate that Milton draws on more than 1500 books in Paradise Lost, but his primary touchstones are Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, Virgil's Aeneid, Ovid's Metamorphoses, Spenser's Faerie Queene, and such central works of epic and romance of the European Renaissance as Ludovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, Torquato Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, and Guillaume Du Bartas's Divine Weeks (Milton in fact borrows many whole phrases from Joshua Sylvester's 1608 translation of Du Bartas). Milton takes his title from the account in Genesis of the expulsion of humankind from Paradise after Adam and Eve eat from the forbidden Tree of Knowledge. As a retelling of the Biblical Fall, Paradise Lost is the best known and most influential literary version of this foundational story of innocence and experience, temptation and expulsion, desire and its consequences.

The poem's dramatic first two books focus not on humanity but on the defeated but still rebellious Satan, cast down from Heaven with his traitor legions for daring to war on God. Satan and his fellows explore Hell, make a home of sorts, and decide to continue their fight with God not in open warfare, but through subverting and corrupting God's new creation, humankind. The rest of Paradise Lost follows the enactment of Satan's plan, though in true epic fashion the poem flashes back to the story's beginnings and looks forward to its end, which in this case means the beginning and end of time itself. Critical discussion of the poem has often concerned the extent to which Satan appears to be the driving force behind the epic, sometimes taking as a starting point William Blake's remark that the "reason Milton wrote in fetters when he wrote of Angels & God, and at liberty when of Devils & Hell, is because he was a true Poet and of the Devil's party without knowing it." As a character, Satan is indeed dramatically compelling, if also arguably repellent in his pride and thirst for power: Milton opens his epic by confronting us with the power of the adversary he believed we faced in everyday life. But many readers also find that Satan recedes and shrinks over the whole course of the poem, while Adam and Eve gain in complexity and stature through their conversations with one another and with the angels Raphael and Michael.

The theological heart of Paradise Lost is the extended conversation in Book 3 between God and the Son. God addresses the problem of foreknowledge and free will by explaining the central importance in Milton's world of choice and freedom. God anticipates Satan's subsequent actions, yet promises mercy and grace through the Son should humanity fall. In its broad outlines, the theology Milton presents is conventional Christian thought; in some respects though, Milton is less orthodox. His God, for example, is not a Calvinist: there is no predestination in Milton's heaven, because all will hear the call of the Divine, and all those who choose to be saved will be saved. Milton also appears to make the Son subordinate to (rather than co-eternal with) the Father, though scholars argue over the implications (and importance to the poem) of this conception of the divine.

The most frequently debated issue in Paradise Lost is probably Milton's depiction of Adam and Eve. Modern readers can feel uncomfortable with the explicit subordination of women in some passages, particularly those that draw on St. Paul's injunctions from the New Testament. Are these moments to be taken as representing the views of Adam, of Raphael, of Milton, or of God? In other passages, however, Paradise Lost gives Eve a greater personal, political, and theological equality than she had ever been accorded: in Book 10 in particular, Eve's actions give her a good claim to be the poem's true hero. She even gives names to some of God's creation, a sign of power and capacity to rule that the Bible itself reserves only for Adam. On the subject of Eve, the poem speaks with two voices, and Milton invites readers to work through the implications of the ways Adam and Eve are presented as man and woman, as husband and wife, as humanity in general, and even as different aspects of the individual human psyche.

Despite its daunting erudition and older poetics, Paradise Lost still speaks powerfully and directly to modern readers. As Johnson, Coleridge, and many others have pointed out, the verbal acrobatics of the poem may occasionally frustrate, but vested in them is also the capacity to astonish. And the rich poetic texture of the full poem retains the capacity to provoke intellectual inquiry not only concerning theology and gender, but also concerning the human condition, religious faith, responsibility and heroism, politics and hierarchy, and the limits that may exist on the pursuit of knowledge and freedom.

THE VERSE

The measure is English heroic verse without rhyme,¹ as that of Homer in Greek, and Virgil in Latin; rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age, to set off wretched matter and lame metre; graced indeed since by the use of some famous modern poets,² carried away by custom, but much to their own vexation, hindrance, and constraint to express many things otherwise, and for the most part worse than else they would have expressed them. Not without cause therefore some both Italian, and Spanish poets of prime note have rejected rhyme both in longer and shorter works, as have also long since our best English tragedies, as a thing of itself, to all judicious ears, trivial, and of no true musical delight; which consists only in apt numbers,³ fit quantity of syllables, and the sense variously drawn out from one verse into another, not in the jingling sound of like endings, a fault avoided by the learned ancients both in poetry and all good oratory. This neglect then of rhyme so little is to be taken for a defect, though it may seem so perhaps to vulgar readers, that it rather is to be esteemed an example set, the first in English, of ancient liberty recovered to heroic poem from the troublesome and modern bondage of rhyming.

ARGUMENT TO BOOK I⁴

This first book proposes first in brief the whole subject, man's disobedience, and the loss thereupon of Paradise wherein he was placed: then touches the prime

¹ English ... rhyme Verse suited to the treatment of heroic or elevated themes; i.e., blank verse in iambic pentameter.

² invention ... age Early medieval hymns that incorporated rhyme went on to influence satirical poets, who chose bawdier "wretched matter"; famous modern poets Milton's contemporaries John Dryden and Andrew Marvell were, for example, proponents of rhyme.

³ apt numbers Correct rhythm.

⁴ ARGUMENT TO BOOK I The Arguments are Milton's own prose summaries of the action in each of the twelve books of Paradise Lost. They did not appear in the first edition, but Milton added them in 1668, apparently at the request of his printer.

cause of his fall, the serpent, or rather Satan in the serpent; who revolting from God, and drawing to his side many legions of angels, was by the command of God driven out of Heaven with all his crew into the great deep. Which action past over, the poem hastes into the midst⁵ of things, presenting Satan with his angels now fallen into Hell, described here, not in the centre (for Heaven and Earth may be supposed as yet not made, certainly not yet accurst) but in a place of utter darkness, fittest called Chaos: here Satan with his angels lying on the burning lake, thunder-struck and astonished, after a certain space recovers, as from confusion, calls up him who next in order and dignity lay by him; they confer of their miserable fall. Satan awakens all his legions, who lay till then in the same manner confounded; they rise, their numbers, array of battle, their chief leaders named, according to the idols known afterwards in Canaan and the countries adjoining. To these Satan directs his speech, comforts them with hope yet of regaining Heaven, but tells them lastly of a new world and new kind of creature to be created, according to an ancient prophesy or report in Heaven; for that angels were long before this visible creation, was the opinion of many ancient Fathers.⁶ To find out the truth of this prophesy, and what to determine thereon, he refers to a full council. What his associates thence attempt. Pandemonium the palace of Satan rises, suddenly built out of the deep: the infernal peers there sit in council.

¹ Of Oreb, or of Sinai God delivered the Ten Commandments to Moses on the summit either of Mount Horeb (Deuteronomy 4.10) or Mount Sinai (Exodus 19.10).

² That Shepherd Moses, who was tending the sheep of his father-in-law, Jethro, when God first appeared to him as a burning bush (Exodus 3.1–4).

³ the chosen Seed The Jewish people. See Deuteronomy 6.6–8.

⁴ Sion Hill Mount Zion, a sacred mountain, site of Solomon's temple and a seat of religious and secular law (Isaiah 2.3).

⁵ Siloa's Brook The pool of Siloam in the Temple at Jerusalem, mentioned first in Nehemiah 3.15, then used by Jesus to restore a blind man's sight in John 9.1–12.

⁶ thy I.e., Urania's God.

⁷ th' Aonian Mount Helicon, a mountain in central Greece sacred to the Muses, and one of their homes.

⁸ Things ... Rhime Ironically, this line is borrowed from Ariosto's Orlando Furioso.

⁹ Dove-like satst brooding Imagery alluding to a Latin translation of Genesis 1.2.

¹⁰ O Spirit ... pregnant Referring to the Holy Spirit, specifically in its generative aspect.

Say first—for Heav'n hides nothing from thy view,
 Nor the deep tract of Hell—say first what cause¹²
 Moved our grand parents,¹³ in that happy state,¹⁴
 30 Favoured of Heav'n so highly, to fall off
 From their Creator, and transgress His will
 For one restraint,¹⁵ lords of the world besides.
 Who first seduced them to that foul revolt?
 Th' infernal Serpent; he it was whose guile,
 35 Stirred up with envy and revenge, deceived
 The mother of mankind, what time¹⁶ his pride
 Had cast him out from Heav'n, with all his host
 Of rebel angels, by whose aid, aspiring
 To set himself in glory above his peers,
 40 He trusted to have equalled the Most High,
 If he opposed, and with ambitious aim
 Against the throne and monarchy of God,
 Raised impious war in Heav'n and battle proud,
 With vain attempt. Him the Almighty Power
 45 Hurl'd headlong flaming from th' ethereal sky,
 With hideous ruin and combustion, down
 To bottomless perdition, there to dwell
 In adamantin^o chains and penal fire, unbreakable
 Who dared defy th' Omnipotent to arms.
 50 Nine times the space that measures day and night
 To mortal men, he, with his horrid crew,
 Lay vanquished, rolling in the fiery gulf,
 Confounded, though immortal. But his doom
 Reserved him to more wrath;¹⁷ for now the thought
 55 Both of lost happiness and lasting pain
 Torments him: round he throws his baleful^o malevolent
 eyes,
 That witnessed huge affliction and dismay,
 Mixed with obdurate pride and steadfast hate.
 At once, as far as angels ken,^o he views can see

¹³ our grand parents Adam and Eve.

¹⁴ in that happy state Simultaneously the state of innocence and the state, or country, of Eden.

¹⁵ one restraint God's admonition against eating from the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil (Genesis 2.17).

¹⁶ what time "When" or "by which time."

¹⁷ Reserved him to more wrath Gave Satan yet more pain.

As one great furnace flamed; yet from those flames
 No light; but rather darkness visible
 Served only to discover sights of woe,
 65 Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace
 And rest can never dwell, hope never comes¹
 That comes to all, but torture without end
 Still urges, and a fiery deluge,^o fed downpour
 With ever-burning sulphur unconsumed.
 70 Such place Eternal Justice has prepared
 For those rebellious; here their prison ordained
 In utter darkness, and their portion set,
 As far removed from God and light of Heav'n
 As from the centre thrice to the utmost pole.²
 75 Oh how unlike the place from whence they fell!
 There the companions of his fall, overwhelmed
 With floods and whirlwinds of tempestuous fire,
 He soon discerns; and, weltering^o by his side, rolling
 One next himself in power, and next in crime,
 80 Long after known in Palestine, and named
 Beelzebub.³ To whom th' arch-enemy,
 And thence in Heaven called Satan,⁴ with bold words
 Breaking the horrid silence, thus began:—
 “If thou beest he—but O how fall'n!⁵ How changed
 85 From him who, in the happy realms of light
 Clothed with transcendent brightness, didst outshine
 Myriads, though bright!—if he whom mutual league,
 United thoughts and counsels, equal hope
 And hazard in the glorious enterprise
 90 Joined with me once, now misery hath joined
 In equal ruin; into what pit thou seest
 From what height fall'n: so much the stronger proved

He with his thunder; and till then who knew
 The force of those dire arms? Yet not for those,
 95 Nor what the potent Victor in his rage
 Can else inflict, do I repent, or change,
 Though changed in outward lustre, that fixed mind,
 And high disdain from sense of injured merit,
 That with the mightiest raised me to contend,
 100 And to the fierce contentions brought along
 Innumerable force of Spirits armed,
 That dared dislike His reign, and, me preferring,
 His utmost power with adverse power opposed
 In dubious^o battle on the plains of Heaven, uncertain
 105 And shook His throne. What though the field be lost?
 All is not lost—the unconquerable will,
 And study⁶ of revenge, immortal hate,
 And courage never to submit or yield:
 And what is else not to be overcome?
 110 That glory never shall His wrath or might Extort from me. To bow and sue for grace
 With suppliant knee, and deify His power
 Who, from the terror of this arm, so late
 Doubted⁷ His empire—that were low indeed;
 115 That were an ignominy and shame beneath
 This downfall; since, by fate, the strength of gods,⁸
 And this empyreal^o substance, cannot fail;⁹ celestial
 Since, through experience of this great event,
 In arms not worse, in foresight much advanced,
 120 We may with more successful hope resolve
 To wage by force or guile eternal war,
 Irreconcilable to our grand foe,
 Who now triumphs, and in th' excess of joy
 Sole reigning holds the tyranny of Heaven.”
 125 So spake th' apostate¹⁰ angel, though in pain,
 Vaunting^o aloud, but racked with deep despair; bragging
 And him thus answered soon his bold compeer:¹¹
 “O Prince, O Chief of many thronèd powers

¹ hope never comes Echo of Dante's famous line: “All hope abandon, ye who enter here” (Inferno 3.9).

² As far removed ... utmost pole In the first of many depictions of the universe throughout the poem, Milton here references a Ptolemaic model in which the earth exists at the center of a series of ten concentric spheres containing the other planets, moon, and sun. The distance between Hell and Heaven is “thrice” that between the earth and the farthest sphere.

³ Beelzebub Hebrew for Lord of the Flies, the name is an alteration of Baal, historically the chief male god of Phoenicia and Canaan.

⁴ And thence in Heaven called Satan Satan is the English transliteration of the Hebrew word for “adversary.”

⁵ O how fall'n See Isaiah 14.12.

⁶ study Profound deliberation.

⁷ Doubted Worried for the fate of.

⁸ gods Here, angels, though Satan has sought to attain the role of an actual god.

⁹ fail I.e., fail to survive.

¹⁰ apostate One who has abandoned one's faith.

¹¹ compeer Fellow comrade.

That led th' embattled seraphim¹ to war
 Under thy conduct, and, in dreadful deeds
 Fearless, endangered Heav'n's perpetual king,
 And put to proof his high supremacy,
 Whether upheld by strength, or chance, or fate,
 Too well I see and rue the dire event²
 That, with sad overthrow and foul defeat,
 Hath lost us Heav'n, and all this mighty host
 In horrible destruction laid thus low,
 As far as gods and heavenly essences
 Can perish: for the mind and spirit remains
 Invincible, and vigour soon returns,
 Though all our glory extinct, and happy state
 Here swallowed up in endless misery.
 But what if He our conqueror (whom I now
 Of force³ believe almighty, since no less Than such could have o'erpow'ed such force as ours)
 Have left us this our spirit and strength entire,
 Strongly to suffer and support our pains,
 That we may so suffice His vengeful ire,
 Or do Him mightier service as His thralls
 By right of war, whatever His business be,
 Here in the heart of Hell to work in fire,
 Or do His errands in the gloomy deep?
 What can it then avail though yet we feel Strength undiminished, or eternal being
 To undergo eternal punishment?"⁴
 Whereto with speedy words the archfiend replied:
 "Fall'n cherub, to be weak is miserable,
 Doing or suffering: but of this be sure—
 To do aught° good never will be our task,
 But ever to do ill our sole delight,
 As being the contrary to His high will
 Whom we resist. If then His Providence
 Out of our evil seek to bring forth good,
 Our labour must be to pervert that end,
 And out of good still to find means of evil;
 Which oft times may succeed so as perhaps

Shall grieve Him, if I fail not, and disturb
 His inmost counsels from their destined aim.
 But see! The angry Victor hath recalled
 His ministers of vengeance and pursuit
 Back to the gates of Heav'n: the sulphurous hail,
 Shot after us in storm, o'erblown has laid° settled
 The fiery surge⁵ that from the precipice
 Of Heav'n received us falling;⁶ and the thunder,
 Winged with red lightning and impetuous rage,
 Perhaps hath spent his shafts, and ceases now
 To bellow through the vast and boundless deep.
 Let us not slip° th' occasion, whether scorn miss
 Or satiate° fury yield it from our Foe. satisfied
 Seest thou yon dreary plain, forlorn and wild,
 The seat of desolation, void of light,
 Save what the glimmering of these livid° flames blue-colored
 Casts pale and dreadful? Thither let us tend⁷
 From off the tossing of these fiery waves;
 There rest, if any rest can harbour there;
 And, re-assembling our afflicted powers,⁸
 Consult how we may henceforth most offend° damage
 Our enemy, our own loss how repair,
 How overcome this dire calamity,
 What reinforcement we may gain from hope,
 If not, what resolution from despair."
 Thus Satan, talking to his nearest mate,
 With head uplift above the wave, and eyes
 That sparkling blazed; his other parts besides
 Prone on the flood, extended long and large,
 Lay floating many a rood,⁹ in bulk as huge
 As whom the fables name of monstrous size,
 Titanian or Earth-born, that warred on Jove,
 Briareos or Typhon,¹⁰ whom the den

 Behind him cast.⁴ The broad circumference
 Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
 Through optic glass⁵ the Tuscan artist⁶ views
 At ev'ning, from the top of Fesolè,⁷
 290 Or in Valdarno,⁸ to descry new lands,
 Rivers, or mountains, in her spotty globe.
 His spear—to equal which the tallest pine
 Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
 Of some great ammiral,⁹ were but a wand
 295 He walked with, to support uneasy steps
 Over the burning marl,[°] not like those steps soil
 On Heaven's azure; and the torrid clime
 Smote on him sore besides, vaulted with fire.

Natheless° he so endured, till on the beach nevertheless 300 Of that inflamèd sea he stood, and called
 His legions—angel forms, who lay entranced
 Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks
 In Vallombrosa,¹⁰ where th' Etrurian shades
 High over-arched embower;¹¹ or scattered sedge
 305 Afloat, when with fierce winds Orion¹² armed Hath vexed the Red Sea coast, whose waves o'erthrew
 Busiris and his Memphian chivalry,¹³
 While with perfidious hatred they pursued
 The sojourners of Goshen,¹⁴ who beheld
 310 From the safe shore their floating carcasses
 And broken chariot wheels. So thick bestrewn,
 Abject and lost, lay these, covering the flood,
 Under amazement of their hideous change.
 He called so loud that all the hollow deep
 315 Of Hell resounded: "Princes, potentates,¹⁵
 Warriors, the flower of Heav'n once yours; now lost,
 If such astonishment as this can seize Eternal spirits! Or have ye chos'n this place
 After the toil of battle to repose
 320 Your wearied virtue,° for the ease you find power
 To slumber here, as in the vales of Heav'n?
 Or in this abject posture have ye sworn
 To adore the conqueror who now beholds
 Cherub and seraph rolling in the flood
 325 With scattered arms and ensigns,° till anon flags
 His swift pursuers from Heaven-gates discern
 Th' advantage, and descending, tread us down
 Thus drooping, or with linkèd thunderbolts
 Transfix us to the bottom of this gulf?
 330 Awake, arise, or be forever fall'n!"

¹ on th' oblivious pool I.e., in oblivion on this pool. The phrase also evokes the Lethe, another underworld river, which causes forgetting.

² perilous ... battle Battlefront.

³ Ethereal temper Tempered by heavenly flames.

⁴ Behind him cast Satan wears his shield slung across his back.

⁵ optic glass Telescope.

⁶ the Tuscan artist Galileo (1564–1652), the only contemporary mentioned in the poem.

⁷ Fesolè Fiesole, a town just outside Florence, Italy.

⁸ Valdarno Arno Valley, the valley in which Florence is located.

⁹ ammiral Admiral's flagship. This spelling was standard at the time, and refers specifically to a first-rate ship of the fleet.

¹⁰ Vallombrosa Valley near Florence famous for its arboreal displays; literally, valley of shadow or shadowed valley.

¹¹ where th' Etrurian ... embower Where the leaves of Etruria arch high and densely overhead. Etruria was an ancient region in west-central Italy, the seat of the Etruscan empire.

¹² Orion Great hunter whom Diana loved but killed in error and then had made into a constellation in the Northern sky; its appearance above the horizon heralds winter and is associated with stormy weather.

¹³ Busiris and his Memphian chivalry Pharaoh and his horsemen or charioteers, stymied by Moses's parting of the Red Sea (Exodus 14.21–31).

¹⁴ sojourners of Goshen Israelites who fled Egypt with Moses.

¹⁵ potentates Royal leaders.

They heard, and were abashed, and up they sprung
 Upon the wing, as when men wont^o to watch accustomed
 On duty, sleeping found by whom they dread,
 Rouse and bestir themselves ere well awake.
 335 Nor did they not perceive the evil plight
 In which they were, or the fierce pains not feel;
 Yet to their General's voice they soon obeyed
 Innumerable. As when the potent rod
 Of Amram's son, in Egypt's evil day,
 340 Waved round the coast, up-called a pitchy cloud
 Of locusts, warping on the eastern wind,
 That o'er the realm of impious Pharaoh hung
 Like Night, and darkened all the land of Nile;¹
 So numberless were those bad angels seen
 345 Hovering on wing under the cope^o of Hell, vault, canopy
 'Twixt upper, nether,^o and surrounding fires; lower
 Till, as a signal giv'n, th' uplifted spear
 Of their great sultan² waving to direct
 Their course, in even balance down they light
 350 On the firm brimstone, and fill all the plain:
 A multitude like which the populous North
 Poured never from her frozen loins to pass
 Rhene or the Danaw,³ when her barbarous sons
 Came like a deluge on the south, and spread 355 Beneath Gibraltar to the Libyan sands.
 Forthwith, from every squadron and each band,
 The heads and leaders thither haste where stood
 Their great commander—godlike shapes, and forms
 Excelling human; princely dignities;
 360 And powers that erst^o in Heav'n sat on thrones, formerly
 Though on their names in heav'nly records now
 Be no memorial, blotted out and razed
 By their rebellion from the books of life.⁴
 Nor had they yet among the sons of Eve
 365 Got them new names, till, wand'ring ov'r the earth,
 Through God's high sufferance for the trial of man,
 By falsities and lies the greatest part

Of mankind they corrupted to forsake
 God their Creator, and th' invisible
 370 Glory of Him that made them to transform
 Oft to the image of a brute, adorned
 With gay religions⁵ full of pomp and gold,
 And devils to adore for deities:⁶
 Then were they known to men by various names,
 375 And various idols through the heathen world.
 Say, Muse, their names then known,⁷ who first, who last,
 Roused from the slumber on that fiery couch,
 At their great emperor's call, as next in worth
 Came singly⁸ where he stood on the bare strand,
 380 While the promiscuous crowd stood yet aloof?
 The chief were those who, from the pit of Hell
 Roaming to seek their prey on Earth, dared fix
 Their seats, long after, next the seat of God,⁹
 Their altars by His altar, gods adored
 385 Among the nations round, and dared abide Jehovah thundering out of Sion, throned
 Between the cherubim;¹⁰ yea, often placed
 Within His sanctuary itself their shrines,
 Abominations; and with cursèd things
 390 His holy rites and solemn feasts profaned,
 And with their darkness dared affront His light.
 First, Moloch,¹¹ horrid king, besmeared with blood
 Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears;
 Though, for the noise of drums and timbrels^o loud, small hand drums
 395 Their children's cries unheard that passed through fire
 To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite¹²
 Worshiped in Rabba and her watery plain,
 In Argob and in Basan, to the stream

⁵ gay religions Spectacular ceremonies.

⁶ devils ... deities It was thought that the fallen angels took on new names and reappeared as the pagan gods venerated on Earth.

⁷ Say ... known Milton adopts the cataloguing list, another convention of epic poetry.

⁸ singly One by one.

⁹ Their seats ... God The fallen angels were based in the Middle East, next to Jerusalem.

¹⁰ Between the cherubim Depictions of cherubim graced the cover of the Ark of the Covenant in Jerusalem.

¹¹ Moloch Heathen god purportedly worshipped through the sacrifice of children in ovens or flame; his name means king or monarch.

¹² Ammonite Biblical enemies of the Israelites.

¹ As when the potent ... land of Nile Moses was the son of Amram; at God's command he reached out with his staff (or rod) summoning the plague of locusts to afflict Egypt (Exodus 10.12–20).

² sultan This title identifies Satan with the image of an Islamic ruler.

³ Rhene or the Danaw Rhine or Danube Rivers.

⁴ books of life Books in which are written all the names of God's faithful (Exodus 32.32–33).

400 Of utmost Arnon.¹ Nor content with such Audacious neighbourhood, the wisest heart
 Of Solomon he led by fraud to build
 His temple right against the temple of God
 On that opprobrious^o hill, and made his grove dishonorable
 The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet² thence 405 And black Gehenna³ called, the type of Hell.
 Next Chemos, th' obscene dread of Moab's⁴ sons,
 From Aroar to Nebo and the wild
 Of southmost Abarim; in Hesebon
 And Horonaim, Seon's realm, beyond
 410 The flow'ry dale of Sibma clad with vines,
 And Eleale to th' Asphaltic Pool:⁵
 Peor⁶ his other name, when he enticed
 Israel in Sittim,⁷ on their march from Nile,
 To do him wanton rites, which cost them woe.
 415 Yet thence his lustful orgies he enlarged
 Even to that hill of scandal,⁸ by the grove
 Of Moloch homicide, lust hard by hate,
 Till good Josiah⁹ drove them thence to Hell.
 With these came they who, from the bordering flood
 420 Of old Euphrates to the brook that parts
 Egypt from Syrian ground, had general names

¹ Rabba ... Argob ... Basan ... Arnon Lands east of the Dead Sea, in present-day Jordan.

² Hinnom Valley west and southwest of Jerusalem, mentioned in the Bible as a place of child sacrifice; Tophet City in the valley Hinnom where children were sacrificed in flame (see Jeremiah 7.31–32).

³ Gehenna Because of the sacrifice of children at Tophet in Hinnom, Gehenna (a transliteration of the Hebrew for the place-name) became the New Testament word for Hell.

⁴ Chemos God of war worshipped by the Moabites. See 1 Kings 11.7; Moab Biblical country east of the Dead Sea. The place names that follow are all associated with Moab in various books of the Old Testament.

⁵ Asphaltic Pool Dead Sea.

⁶ Peor Diminutive form of Baal-Peor, a Moabite god who appeared both as a sun god and moon goddess.

⁷ Sittim Site of the last camp of the Israelites before they entered Canaan and were suborned by Baal-Peor (Numbers 25).

⁸ hill of scandal Mount of Olives, upon which Solomon built shrines to honor several pagan gods.

⁹ Josiah Biblical King of Judah who renewed his people's covenant with God and ruined heathen temples (2 Kings 23).

Of Baalim and Ashtaroth¹⁰—those male,
 These feminine. For spirits, when they please,
 Can either sex assume, or both; so soft
 425 And uncompounded^o is their essence pure, unalloyed
 Not tried or manacled with joint or limb,
 Nor founded on the brittle strength of bones,
 Like cumbrous flesh; but, in what shape they choose,
 Dilated or condensed, bright or obscure,
 430 Can execute their airy purposes,
 And works of love or enmity fulfil.
 For those the race of Israel oft forsook
 Their living strength,¹¹ and unfrequented left
 His righteous altar, bowing lowly down
 435 To bestial gods; for which their heads as low
 Bowed down in battle, sunk before the spear
 Of despicable foes. With these in troop
 Came Astoreth, whom the Phoenicians called
 Astarte, queen of Heaven, with crescent horns;
 440 To whose bright image nightly by the moon
 Sidonian¹² virgins paid their vows and songs;
 In Sion also not unsung, where stood
 Her temple on th' offensive mountain, built
 By that uxorious king whose heart, though large,
 445 Beguiled by fair idolatresses, fell
 To idols foul.¹³ Thammuz came next behind,
 Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
 The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
 In amorous ditties all a summer's day,
 450 While smooth Adonis from his native rock
 Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
 Of Thammuz yearly wounded:¹⁴ the love-tale
 Infected Sion's daughters with like heat,
 Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
 455 Ezekiel saw, when, by the vision led,

¹⁰ Baalim Hebrew: collective term for Phoenician and Canaanite sun gods; Ashtaroth Collective term for variants of Ashtoreth, or Ishtar, a goddess of love, fertility, and war worshiped throughout the Middle East; her classical equivalent is Venus.

¹¹ living strength I.e., God.

¹² Sidonian From Sidonia, a Biblical country north of the Dead Sea, between modern day Lebanon and Syria.

¹³ that uxorious king ... idols foul King Solomon.

¹⁴ Thammuz came next ... yearly wounded Syrian god and consort of Astarte, identified with the Greek god Adonis. His sacred river runs reddish-purple yearly with silt, marking his feast and commemorating his mortal wounding by a wild boar.

His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
 Of alienated Judah.¹ Next came one
 Who mourned in earnest, when the captive ark
 Maimed his brute image, head and hands lopped off,
 460 In his own temple, on the groundsel-edge,^o threshold
 Where he fell flat and shamed his worshippers:²
 Dagon his name, sea-monster, upward man
 And downward fish; yet had his temple high
 Reared in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
 465 Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon,
 And Accaron³ and Gaza's frontier bounds.
 Him followed Rimmon,⁴ whose delightful seat
 Was fair Damascus, on the fertile banks
 Of Abbana and Pharphar, lucid streams.
 470 He also against the house of God was bold:
 A leper⁵ once he lost, and gained a king—
 Ahaz,⁶ his sottish conqueror, whom he drew
 God's altar to disparage and displace
 For one of Syrian mode, whereon to burn
 475 His odious offerings, and adore the gods
 Whom he had vanquished. After these appeared
 A crew who, under names of old renown,
 Osiris, Isis, Orus,⁷ and their train,
 With monstrous shapes and sorceries abused
 480 Fanatic Egypt and her priests to seek

Their wandering gods disguised in brutish forms⁸
 Rather than human. Nor did Israel scape
 Th' infection, when their borrowed gold composed
 The calf in Oreb;⁹ and the rebel king
 485 Doubled that sin in Bethel and in Dan,¹⁰
 Lik'ning his maker to the grazèd ox,
 Jehovah, who in one night, when he passed
 From Egypt marching, equalled^o with one stroke leveled
 Both her first-born and all her bleating gods.¹¹
 490 Belial¹² came last; than whom a Spirit more lewd
 Fell not from Heaven, or more gross to love
 Vice for itself. To him no temple stood
 Or altar smoked; yet who more oft than he
 In temples and at altars, when the priest
 495 Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons,¹³ who filled
 With lust and violence the house of God?
 In courts and palaces he also reigns,
 And in luxurious cities, where the noise
 Of riot ascends above their loftiest tow'rs,
 500 And injury and outrage; and, when night
 Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
 Of Belial,¹⁴ flown^o with insolence and wine. delirious
 Witness the streets of Sodom,¹⁵ and that night
 In Gibeah, when the hospitable door

¹ Whose wanton passions ... alienated Judah See Ezekiel's vision of faithless Israelites in Ezekiel 8.9–15.

² the captive ark ... worshippers After the Philistines captured the Ark of the Covenant and brought it back to the temple of sea god Dagon, the statue of Dagon fell and broke into pieces (1 Samuel 5.1–5).

³ Azotus Philistine city northeast of Gaza, also called Ashdod; Gath Now thought to be located at modern Tel es-Safi, west of Jerusalem; Ascalon Now called Ashkelon, located southwest of Ashdod; Accaron Modern Tel Mique, located approximately twenty-five miles west of Jerusalem; these four cities plus Gaza were the five major cities of the Philistines.

⁴ Rimmon Ancient Syrian storm god.

⁵ A leper Naamon, a Syrian who abandoned his loyalty to Rimmon and became a follower of Israel's God after he was cured of leprosy.

⁶ Ahaz Also known as Ahaziah, a wicked apostate king of the Israelites (1 Kings 22.51–53, 2 Kings 1.1–17).

⁸ disguised in brutish forms Ancient Egyptian gods were depicted as having animal heads.

⁹ The calf in Oreb While waiting for Moses to return from his mountaintop meeting with God, his brother Aaron crafted a golden calf, and the Israelites began to worship it as an idol (Exodus 32).

¹⁰ the rebel king ... and in Dan Jeroboam is the rebel king who, with the ten tribes of Israel, overthrew King Rehoboam, the son of Solomon (1 Kings 11). He set up two golden bull idols, saying "It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem. Here are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt" (1 Kings 12.28).

¹¹ Jehovah ... her bleating gods Jehovah in one night ravaged Egypt and its gods by slaying Egypt's firstborn sons (see Exodus 12:29–33).

¹² Belial Personification of defilement, fornication, and wealth. Here a devil; originally a Hebrew word for worthlessness.

¹³ Eli's sons Eli had two lustful sons who seduced members of the congregation and appropriated church offerings for their own enjoyment (1 Samuel 2.12–25).

¹⁴ sons / Of Belial I.e., drunken rioters and lechers.

¹⁵ Sodom Biblical city that epitomized wickedness and debauchery, and the home of Lot, who in Genesis 19.4–8 protected his male house guests (who were disguised angels) from rape at the hands of a mob by offering his daughters instead.

505 Exposed a matron, to avoid worse rape.¹
 These were the prime in order and in might:
 The rest were long to tell; though far renowned
 Th' Ionian° gods—of Javan's² issue held Greek
 Gods, yet confessed later than Heav'n and Earth,
 510 Their boasted parents;³ Titan, Heav'n's first-born,
 With his enormous brood, and birthright seized
 By younger Saturn: he from mightier Jove,
 His own and Rhea's son, like measure found;
 So Jove usurping reigned.⁴ These, first in Crete
 515 And Ida⁵ known, thence on the snowy top
 Of cold Olympus ruled the middle air,⁶
 Their highest Heav'n; or on the Delphian cliff,⁷
 Or in Dodona,⁸ and through all the bounds
 Of Doric° land; or who with Saturn old Greek
 520 Fled over Adria to th' Hesperian fields,
 And o'er the Celtic roamed the utmost isles.⁹
 All these and more came flocking; but with looks
 Downcast and damp;° yet such wherein appeared sad
 Obscure some glimpse of joy to have found their chief 525 Not in despair, to have found themselves not lost
 In loss itself; which on his count'nance cast
 Like doubtful hue.¹⁰ But he, his wonted pride
 Soon recollecting, with high words, that bore
 Semblance of worth, not substance, gently raised
 530 Their fainting courage, and dispelled their fears.

¹ that night ... worse rape Biblical incident in which a group who demanded to rape an Israelite man traveling through Gibeah settled instead for raping and killing his concubine, whose master then cut her into pieces. See Judges 19.16–30.

² Javan Grandson of Noah.

³ held / Gods ... parents Javan's descendants believed the Titans to be gods, born from parents Heaven and Earth.

⁴ birthright ... reigned Titan ruler Saturn (Cronus) usurped the throne from his father and married Rhea, his sister, but was eventually usurped by his own son Jove (Zeus).

⁵ Ida Highest mountain in Crete, where Jove was raised secretly.

⁶ middle air Location of Mount Olympus, the ruling base of the Olympian gods venerated across Greece.

⁷ Delphian cliff Site of ancient Greece's most important Oracle.

⁸ Dodona The most ancient Greek oracular site.

⁹ Adria The Adriatic Sea; Hesperian fields Italy; Celtic France; utmost isles Britain, Ireland, and surrounding islands.

¹⁰ Like doubtful hue Similarly concerned expression.

Then straight° commands that, at the promptly sound warlike
 Of trumpets loud and clarions, be upreared
 His mighty standard. That proud honour claimed
 Azazel¹¹ as his right, a cherub tall:
 535 Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurled
 Th' imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,
 Shone like a meteor streaming to the wind,
 With gems and golden lustre rich emblazed,
 Seraphic arms and trophies; all the while 540 Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds:
 At which the universal host up-sent
 A shout that tore Hell's concave,¹² and beyond
 Frighted the reign of chaos and old night.
 All in a moment through the gloom were seen
 545 Ten thousand banners rise into the air,
 With orient° colours waving; with them rose exotic
 A forest huge of spears; and thronging helms
 Appeared, and serried° shields in thick array crowded
 Of depth immeasurable. Anon they move
 550 In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood¹³
 Of flutes and soft recorders—such as raised
 To height of noblest temper heroes old
 Arming to battle, and instead of rage
 Deliberate valour breathed, firm, and unmoved
 555 With dread of death to flight or foul retreat;
 Nor wanting power to mitigate and swage¹⁴
 With solemn touches troubled thoughts, and chase
 Anguish and doubt and fear and sorrow and pain
 From mortal or immortal minds. Thus they,
 560 Breathing united force with fixed thought,
 Moved on in silence to soft pipes that charmed
 Their painful steps o'er the burnt soil. And now
 Advanced in view they stand—a horrid¹⁵ front
 Of dreadful length and dazzling arms, in guise
 565 Of warriors old, with ordered spear and shield,
 Awaiting what command their mighty chief
 Had to impose. He through the armèd files

¹¹ Azazel One of Satan's standard bearers, according to some Jewish and Christian traditions.

¹² Hell's concave The roof of Hell.

¹³ phalanx Classical military formation; the Dorian mood Greek musical mode associated with martial valor.

¹⁴ swage I.e., assuage: to appease.

¹⁵ horrid Bristling (with their weapons pointed).

Darts his experienced eye, and soon traverse^o crosswise
 The whole battalion views—their order due,
 570 Their visages and stature as of gods;
 Their number last he sums. And now his heart
 Distends with pride, and, hardening in his strength,
 Glories: for never, since created Man,
 Met such embodied force as, named with these,
 575 Could merit more than that small infantry
 Warred on by cranes¹—though all the giant brood
 Of Phlegra² with th' heroic race were joined
 That fought at Thebes and Ilium,^o on each side Troy
 Mixed with auxiliar^o gods; and what resounds united 580 In fable or romance of Uther's son,³
 Begirt with British and Armoric^o knights; Breton
 And all who since, baptized or infidel,
 Jousted in Aspramont, or Montalban,
 Damasco, or Marocco, or Trebison^d,⁴
 585 Or whom Bizerta⁵ sent from Afric shore
 When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell
 By Fontarabbia.⁶ Thus far these beyond
 Compare of mortal prowess, yet observed^o followed
 Their dread commander. He, above the rest
 590 In shape and gesture proudly eminent,
 Stood like a tow'r. His form had yet not lost
 All her original brightness, nor appeared
 Less than archangel ruined, and th' excess
 Of glory obscured: as when the sun new-ris'n
 595 Looks through the horizontal⁷ misty air
 Shorn of his beams, or, from behind the moon,
 In dim eclipse, disastrous^o twilight sheds ill-omened
 On half the nations, and with fear of change

¹ that small infantry ... cranes Pygmies. Allusion to the fabled battle between cranes and tiny pygmies often mentioned in classical texts and after.

² Phlegra Location of the battle between rebellious giants and Zeus.

³ Uther's son King Arthur, son of Uther Pendragon.

⁴ Aspramont ... Montalban ... Damasco ... Marocco ... Trebison Sites associated with the Crusades.

⁵ Bizerta Departure point from which Moorish fleets invaded southern Europe.

⁶ When Charlemagne ... By Fontarabbia Charlemagne (742–814) did not die at Fontarabia, in Northern Spain, but his troops under the command of Roland (Charlemagne's general) were defeated at Roncesvalles, 40 miles from Fontarabia, in 778.

⁷ horizontal I.e., across the horizon.

Perplexes monarchs.⁸ Dark'n'd so, yet shone
 600 Above them all th' archangel: but his face
 Deep scars of thunder had entrenched, and care
 Sat on his faded cheek, but under brows
 Of dauntless courage, and considerate^o pride purposeful
 Waiting revenge. Cruel his eye, but cast
 605 Signs of remorse and passion,^o to behold sympathy
 The fellows of his crime, the followers rather (Far other once beheld in bliss), condemned
 Forever now to have their lot in pain—
 Millions of spirits for his fault amerced
 610 Of Heav'n,⁹ and from eternal splendours flung
 For his revolt—yet faithful how they stood,
 Their glory withered; as, when Heaven's fire
 Has scathed^o the forest oaks or mountain pines, blasted
 With singèd top their stately growth, though bare,
 615 Stands on the blasted heath. He now prepared
 To speak; whereat their doubled ranks they bend
 From wing to wing, and half enclose him round
 With all his peers: attention held them mute.
 Thrice he assayed,^o and thrice, in spite of scorn, attempted
 620 Tears, such as angels weep, burst forth: at last Words interwove with sighs found out their way:
 "O myriads of immortal spirits! O powers
 Matchless, but with th' Almighty; and that strife
 Was not inglorious, though th' event was dire,
 625 As this place testifies, and this dire change,
 Hateful to utter. But what power of mind,
 Foreseeing or presaging, from the depth
 Of knowledge past or present, could have feared
 How such united force of gods, how such 630 As stood like these, could ever know repulse?
 For who can yet believe, though after loss,
 That all these puissant^o legions, whose exile powerful
 Hath emptied Heaven, shall fail to re-ascend,
 Self-raised, and repossess their native seat?
 635 For me, be witness all the host of Heav'n,
 If counsels different,^o or danger shunned conflicting
 By me, have lost our hopes. But He who reigns
 Monarch in Heav'n till then as one secure

⁸ from behind the moon ... Perplexes monarchs Eclipses are traditionally harbingers of disaster or of death, especially of the deaths of monarchs, who were routinely identified with the sun.

⁹ amerced / Of Heav'n Both those banished from Heaven, and those punished by Heaven.

Sat on His throne, upheld by old repute,
 640 Consent or custom, and His regal state Put forth at full, but still^o His strength always concealed—
 Which tempted our attempt, and wrought our fall.
 Henceforth His might we know, and know our own,
 So as not either to provoke, or dread
 645 New war provoked: our better part remains
 To work in close design, by fraud or guile,
 What force effected not; that He no less
 At length from us may find, who overcomes
 By force hath overcome but half His foe.
 650 Space may produce new worlds; whereof so rife^o frequent
 There went a fame^o in Heav'n that He ere long rumor
 Intended to create, and therein plant
 A generation whom His choice regard
 Should favour equal to the sons of Heav'n.
 655 Thither, if but to pry, shall be perhaps
 Our first eruption—thither, or elsewhere;
 For this infernal pit shall never hold
 Celestial spirits in bondage, nor th' abyss
 Long under darkness cover. But these thoughts 660 Full counsel must mature. Peace is despaired;
 For who can think submission? War, then, war
 Open or understood,^o must be resolved.” hidden
 He spake; and, to confirm his words, outflow
 Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs
 665 Of mighty cherubim; the sudden blaze
 Far round illumined Hell. Highly they raged
 Against the highest and fierce with graspèd arms
 Clashed on their sounding shields the din of war,
 Hurling defiance toward the vault of Heav'n.
 670 There stood a hill not far, whose grisly top Belched fire and rolling smoke; the rest entire Shone with a glossy scurf¹—undoubted sign
 That in his womb was hid metallic ore,
 The work of sulphur.² Thither, winged with speed,
 675 A numerous brigade hastened: as when bands
 Of pioneers,³ with spade and pickaxe armed,
 Forerun the royal camp, to trench a field,
 Or cast a rampart. Mammon led them on—

Mammon, the least erected⁴ spirit that fell
 680 From Heav'n; for even in Heav'n his looks and thoughts
 Were always downward bent, admiring more
 The riches of Heav'n's pavement, trodden gold,
 Than aught divine or holy else enjoyed
 In vision beatific. By him first 685 Men also, and by his suggestion taught,
 Ransacked the centre,⁵ and with impious hands
 Rifled the bowels of their mother Earth
 For treasures better hid. Soon had his crew
 Op'nd into the hill a spacious wound,
 690 And digged out ribs of gold. Let none admire^o ponder
 That riches grow in Hell; that soil may best
 Deserve the precious bane.^o And here let those poison
 Who boast in mortal things, and wondering tell
 Of Babel, and the works of Memphian kings,⁶
 695 Learn how their greatest monuments of fame
 And strength and art are easily outdone
 By spirits reprobate, and in an hour
 What in an age they, with incessant toil
 And hands innumerable, scarce perform.
 700 Nigh on the plain, in many cells prepared,
 That underneath had veins of liquid fire
 Sluiced from the lake, a second multitude
 With wondrous art founded the massy^o ore, heavy
 Sev'ring each kind, and scummed the bullion dross.⁷
 705 A third as soon had formed within the ground
 A various mould, and from the boiling cells
 By strange conveyance filled each hollow nook;
 As in an organ, from one blast of wind,
 To many a row of pipes the soundboard breathes.
 710 Anon out of the earth a fabric huge
 Rose like an exhalation, with the sound

⁴ least erected Lowest-ranked. Mammon refers to worldly or material goods and wealth and is often associated with gods or demons who personified wealth, such as Spenser's cave-guarding demon (The Faerie Queene 2.7).

⁵ Ransacked the centre Mined the Earth; "centre" extends the Ptolemaic metaphor.

⁶ Babel Tower built by men who wished to reach Heaven. For their presumption, God caused them all to speak in different languages, so that they could not communicate well enough to continue to build the city. See Genesis 11.1–9; Memphian kings Egyptian Pharaohs who built the pyramids.

⁷ Sev'ring ... dross Dividing the types of metal and skimming out the dregs.

² sulphur Believed to be, along with mercury, the base of all metal.

³ pioneers Advance body of foot-soldiers who made preparations for the main body of the army.

Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet—

 730 As from a sky. The hasty multitude
 Admiring entered; and the work some praise,
 And some the architect. His hand was known
 In Heav'n by many a towered structure high,
 Where sceptred angels held their residence,
 735 And sat as princes, whom the supreme King
 Exalted to such power, and gave to rule,
 Each in his hierarchy, the orders bright.
 Nor was his name unheard or unadored
 In ancient Greece; and in Ausonian° land Italian
 740 Men called him Mulciber;⁵ and how he fell
 From Heav'n they fabled, thrown by angry Jove
 Sheer o'er the crystal battlements: from morn
 To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve,
 A summer's day, and with the setting sun
 745 Dropt from the zenith, like a falling star,
 On Lemnos, th' Aegaeon isle.⁶ Thus they relate,

² Doric pillars Austere architectural feature compared with the more ornate design elements that follow in the description.

³ Belus Baal; Serapis Egyptian bull god.

⁴ naphtha Flammable fluid.

⁵ Mulciber Vulcan, or Hephaestus, the gods' blacksmith.

⁶ and how he fell ... Aegaeon isle In some accounts, Hephaestus was thrown out of Heaven for attempting to protect his mother, Hera, from Zeus's (Jove's) anger.

Erring; for he with this rebellious rout
 Fell long before; nor aught availed him now
 To have built in Heav'n high tow'rs; nor did he 'scape
 750 By all his engines, but was headlong sent,
 With his industrious crew, to build in Hell.
 Meanwhile the wingèd heralds, by command
 Of sovereign power, with awful ceremony
 And trumpet's sound, throughout the host proclaim 755 A solemn council forthwith to be held
 At Pandemonium,⁷ the high capital
 Of Satan and his peers. Their summons called
 From every band and squared regiment
 By place or choice⁸ the worthiest: they anon
 760 With hundreds and with thousands trooping came Attended. All access was thronged; the gates
 And porches wide, but chief the spacious hall
 (Though like a covered field, where champions bold
 Wont ride in armed, and at the Soldan's° chair Sultan's
 765 Defied the best of paynim° chivalry pagan
 To mortal combat, or career° with lance), joust
 Thick swarmed, both on the ground and in the air,
 Brushed with the hiss of rustling wings. As bees
 In springtime, when the sun with Taurus rides,⁹
 770 Pour forth their populous youth about the hive
 In clusters; they among fresh dew and flowers
 Fly to and fro, or on the smoothèd plank,
 The suburb of their straw-built citadel,
 New rubbed with balm, expatiate, and confer
 775 Their state-affairs: so thick the airy crowd
 Swarmed and were straightened; till, the signal giv'n, Behold a wonder! They but now who seemed
 In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons,
 Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room
 780 Throng numberless—like that pygmean race
 Beyond the Indian mount;¹⁰ or faery elves,
 Whose midnight revels, by a forest-side

⁷ Pandemonium Literally, all demonhood or all demons; the word is Milton's invention.

⁸ By place or choice Either by hierarchical status or through an elected position.

⁹ when the sun with Taurus rides Springtime, when the sun is in the astrological house of Taurus, the bull.

¹⁰ pygmean ... Indian mount The home of the pygmies was said to be located east of the Himalayan Duge.

Or fountain, some belated peasant¹ sees,
 Or dreams he sees, while overhead the moon
 785 Sits arbitress,^o and nearer to the earth spectator
 Wheels her pale course: they, on their mirth and dance
 Intent, with jocund music charm his ear;
 At once with joy and fear his heart rebounds.
 Thus incorporeal spirits to smallest forms
 790 Reduced their shapes immense, and were at large,
 Though without number still, amidst the hall
 Of that infernal court. But far within,
 And in their own dimensions like themselves,
 The great seraphic lords and cherubim
 795 In close recess and secret conclave sat,
 A thousand demi-gods on golden seats,
 Frequent^o and full. After short silence then, many
 And summons read, the great consult² began.

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 2

The consultation begun, Satan debates whether another battle be to be hazarded for the recovery of Heaven: some advise it, others dissuade. A third proposal is preferred, mentioned before by Satan, to search the truth of that prophesy or tradition in Heaven concerning another world, and another kind of creature equal or not much inferior to themselves, about this time to be created; their doubt who shall be sent on this difficult search; Satan their chief undertakes alone the voyage, is honoured and applauded. The council thus ended, the rest betake them several ways and to several employments, as their inclinations lead them, to entertain the time till Satan return. He passes on his journey to Hell gates, finds them shut, and who sat there to guard them, by whom at length they are opened, and discover to him the great gulf between Hell and Heaven; with what difficulty he passes through, directed by Chaos, the power of that place, to the sight of this new world which he sought.

BOOK 2

High on a throne of royal state, which far
 Outshone the wealth of Ormuz and of Ind,³
 Or where the gorgeous east with richest hand
 Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold,
 5 Satan exalted sat, by merit raised
 To that bad eminence; and, from despair
 Thus high uplifted beyond hope, aspires
 Beyond thus high, insatiate to pursue
 Vain war with Heav'n; and, by success^o consequence
 untaught,
 10 His proud imaginations^o thus displayed: plotting
 "Powers and dominions,⁴ deities of Heav'n!
 For, since no deep^o within her gulf can hold depth
 Immortal vigour, though oppressed and fallen,
 I give not Heav'n for lost: from this descent
 15 Celestial virtues rising will appear
 More glorious and more dread than from no fall,
 And trust themselves to fear no second fate!
 Me though just right, and the fixed laws of Heav'n,
 Did first create your leader—next, free choice
 20 With what besides in council or in fight
 Hath been achieved of merit—yet this loss,
 Thus far at least recovered, hath much more
 Established in a safe, unenvied throne,
 Yielded with full consent. The happier state
 25 In Heav'n, which follows dignity, might draw
 Envy from each inferior; but who here
 Will envy whom the highest place exposes
 Foremost to stand against the Thunderer's aim
 Your bulwark,⁵ and condemns to greatest share
 30 Of endless pain? Where there is, then, no good
 For which to strive, no strife can grow up there
 From faction: for none sure will claim in Hell
 Precedence; none whose portion is so small
 Of present pain that with ambitious mind
 35 Will covet more! With this advantage, then,
 To union, and firm faith, and firm accord,
 More than can be in Heav'n, we now return

³ Ormuz Wealthy island kingdom situated at the edge of the Strait of Hormuz, a waterway linking the Persian Gulf with the Gulf of Oman—traditionally and still a critical waterway for trade and shipping; Ind India.⁴ Powers and dominions Two of the hierarchical ranks of angels.⁵ bulwark Protective wall.

To claim our just inheritance of old,
 Surer to prosper than prosperity
 40 Could have assured us; and by what best way,
 Whether of open war or covert guile,
 We now debate. Who can advise may speak.”
 He ceased; and next him Moloch, sceptred king,
 Stood up—the strongest and the fiercest spirit
 45 That fought in Heav’n, now fiercer by despair.
 His trust was with th’ eternal to be deemed Equal in strength, and rather than be less
 Cared not to be at all; with that care lost
 Went all his fear: of God, or Hell, or worse,
 50 He recked^o not, and these words thereafter spake: cared
 “My sentence^o is for open war. Of wiles, opinion
 More unexpert, I boast not: them let those Contrive who need, or when they need; not now.
 For, while they sit contriving, shall the rest—
 55 Millions that stand in arms, and longing wait
 The signal to ascend—sit lingering here,
 Heav’n’s fugitives, and for their dwelling-place
 Accept this dark opprobrious den of shame,
 The prison of His tyranny who reigns
 60 By our delay? No! Let us rather choose,
 Armed with Hell-flames and fury, all at once
 O’er Heav’n’s high towers to force resistless¹ way,
 Turning our tortures into horrid arms
 Against the Torturer; when, to meet the noise
 65 Of His almighty engine,² He shall hear
 Infernal thunder, and, for lightning, see
 Black fire and horror shot with equal rage
 Among His angels, and His throne itself
 Mixed with Tartarean^o sulphur and strange fire, hellish
 70 His own invented torments. But perhaps
 The way seems difficult, and steep to scale
 With upright wing against a higher foe!
 Let such bethink them, if the sleepy drench^o drink
 Of that forgetful lake³ benumb not still,
 75 That in our proper motion we ascend
 Up to our native seat; descent and fall
 To us is adverse. Who but felt of late,
 When the fierce Foe hung on our broken rear

² engine I.e., war machine or torture device, in this case a thunder-bolt.

³ Of that forgetful lake Lethe, river of oblivion in Hades.

Insulting,⁴ and pursued us through the deep,
 80 With what compulsion and laborious flight
 We sunk thus low? Th’ ascent is easy, then;
 Th’ event is feared! Should we again provoke
 Our stronger, some worse way His wrath may find
 To our destruction, if there be in Hell
 85 Fear to be worse destroyed! What can be worse
 Than to dwell here, driven out from bliss, condemned
 In this abhorred deep to utter woe!
 Where pain of unextinguishable fire
 Must exercise^o us without hope of end torture
 90 The vassals⁵ of His anger, when the scourge
 Inexorably, and the torturing hour,
 Calls us to penance? More destroyed than thus,
 We should be quite abolished, and expire.
 What fear we then? What doubt we to incense
 95 His utmost ire? Which, to the height enraged,
 Will either quite consume us, and reduce
 To nothing this essential^o—happier far essence
 Than miserable to have eternal being—
 Or, if our substance be indeed divine,
 100 And cannot cease to be, we are at worst
 On this side nothing;⁶ and by proof we feel
 Our power sufficient to disturb his Heav’n,
 And with perpetual inroads⁷ to alarm,
 Though inaccessible, his fatal⁸ throne:
 105 Which, if not victory, is yet revenge.”
 He ended frowning, and his look denounced^o professed
 Desperate revenge, and battle dangerous
 To less than gods. On th’ other side up rose Belial, in act more graceful and humane.
 110 A fairer person lost not Heav’n; he seemed
 For dignity composed, and high exploit.

⁴ hung ... Insulting Followed close behind our broken rear ranks, attacking us and exulting; the scatological joke of “broken rear” is intentional.

⁵ vassals Either vessels or attendants.

⁶ What doubt we ... this side nothing Why do we care if we anger God more? We’re immortal, and either God can’t hurt us, or He will completely erase us from existence—either way, we are no worse off than we are right now.

⁷ perpetual inroads Constant attacks.

⁸ fatal In the control of Fate, with the additional meaning of “lethal.”

But all was false and hollow; though his tongue
 Dropped manna,¹ and could make the worse appear
 The better reason, to perplex and dash^o confound
 115 Maturest counsels: for his thoughts were low—
 To vice industrious,² but to nobler deeds
 Timorous^o and slothful. Yet he pleased apprehensive
 the ear,
 And with persuasive accent thus began:
 “I should be much for open war, O peers,
 120 As not behind in hate, if what was urged
 Main reason to persuade immediate war
 Did not dissuade me most, and seem to cast
 Ominous conjecture on the whole success;
 When he who most excels in fact^o of arms, achievement
 125 In what he counsels and in what excels
 Mistrustful, grounds his courage on despair
 And utter dissolution, as the scope
 Of all his aim, after some dire revenge.
 First, what revenge? The tow’rs of Heav’n are filled 130 With armèd watch,^o that render all access guards
 Impregnable: oft on the bordering deep
 Encamp their legions, or with obscure wing
 Scout far and wide into the realm of night,
 Scorning³ surprise. Or, could we break our way
 135 By force, and at our heels all Hell should rise
 With blackest insurrection to confound
 Heav’n’s purest light, yet our great Enemy,
 All incorruptible, would on His throne
 Sit unpolluted, and th’ ethereal mould,
 140 Incapable of stain, would soon expel
 Her mischief, and purge off the baser fire,⁴
 Victorious. Thus repulsed, our final hope
 Is flat despair: we must exasperate
 Th’ almighty Victor to spend all his rage;
 145 And that must end us; that must be our cure—

¹ though his tongue / Dropped manna Though he spoke sweetly. Manna was the food God miraculously gave to the Israelites in the desert (Exodus 16).

² To vice industrious Quick to commit vice, and hardworking when doing so.

³ Scorning Making impossible.

⁴ th’ ethereal mould . . . purge off the baser fire The pure “consuming fire” of God (Exodus 24.17, Numbers 11.1, Deuteronomy 4.24) would quickly defeat and exterminate the merely “flaming fire” of the rebel angels (Exodus 3.2, Psalm 104.4, Hebrews 1.7).

To be no more. Sad cure! For who would lose,
 Though full of pain, this intellectual^o being, sentient
 Those thoughts that wander through eternity,
 To perish rather, swallowed up and lost
 150 In the wide womb of uncreated night,
 Devoid of sense and motion? And who knows,
 Let this be good, whether our angry Foe
 Can give it, or will ever? How He can
 Is doubtful; that He never will is sure.
 155 Will He, so wise, let loose at once His ire, Belike^o through impotence or unaware, possibly
 To give His enemies their wish, and end
 Them in His anger whom His anger saves
 To punish endless? ‘Wherefore cease we, then?’
 160 Say they who counsel war; ‘we are decreed,
 Reserved, and destined to eternal woe;
 Whatever doing, what can we suffer more,
 What can we suffer worse?’ Is this, then, worst—
 Thus sitting, thus consulting, thus in arms?
 165 What when we fled amain,^o pursued at full speed and struck
 With Heav’n’s afflicting thunder, and besought
 The deep to shelter us? This Hell then seemed
 A refuge from those wounds. Or when we lay Chained on the burning lake? That sure was worse.
 170 What if the breath that kindled those grim fires,
 Awaked, should blow them into sevenfold rage,
 And plunge us in the flames; or from above
 Should intermitted^o vengeance arm again paused
 His red right hand to plague us? What if all 175 Her stores were op’n’d, and this firmament^o sky
 Of Hell should spout her cataracts of fire,
 Impendent^o horrors, threatening hideous fall hanging
 One day upon our heads; while we perhaps,
 Designing or exhorting glorious war,
 180 Caught in a fiery tempest, shall be hurled,
 Each on his rock⁵ transfixèd,^o the sport and prey pinned
 Of racking^o whirlwinds, or forever sunk torturing
 Under yon boiling ocean, wrapt in chains,
 There to converse with everlasting groans,
 185 Unrespited, unpitied, unreprieved,
 Ages of hopeless end?⁶ This would be worse.

⁵ on his rock As punishment for giving fire to humankind, Prometheus was also bound to a rock.

⁶ Ages of hopeless end An ages-long hopeless fate.

War, therefore, open or concealed, alike
 My voice dissuades; for what can force or guile
 With Him, or who deceive His mind, whose eye
 190 Views all things at one view? He from Heav'n's height
 All these our motions^o vain sees and derides, plans
 Not more almighty to resist our might
 Than wise to frustrate all our plots and wiles.
 Shall we, then, live thus vile—the race of Heav'n
 195 Thus trampled, thus expelled, to suffer here
 Chains and these torments? Better these than worse,
 By my advice; since fate inevitable
 Subdues us, and omnipotent decree,
 The Victor's will. To suffer, as to do,
 200 Our strength is equal; nor the law unjust
 That so ordains. This was at first resolved,
 If we were wise, against so great a foe
 Contending, and so doubtful what might fall.
 I laugh when those who at the spear are bold
 205 And venturous, if that fail them, shrink, and fear
 What yet they know must follow—to endure
 Exile, or ignominy, or bonds, or pain,
 The sentence of their conqueror. This is now
 Our doom; which if we can sustain and bear,
 210 Our supreme Foe in time may much remit
 His anger, and perhaps, thus far removed,
 Not mind us not offending, satisfied
 With what is punished; whence these raging fires
 Will slacken, if His breath stir not their flames.
 215 Our purer essence then will overcome
 Their noxious vapour; or, inured, not feel;
 Or, changed at length, and to the place conformed
 In temper and in nature, will receive
 Familiar the fierce heat; and, void of pain,
 220 This horror will grow mild, this darkness light;
 Besides what hope the never-ending flight
 Of future days may bring, what chance, what change
 Worth waiting—since our present lot appears
 For happy though but ill, for ill not worst,¹
 225 If we procure not to ourselves more woe.”

Thus Belial, with words clothed in reason's garb,
 Counsell'd ignoble ease and peaceful sloth,
 Not peace; and after him thus Mammon spoke:
 “Either to disenthroned the King of Heaven

230 We war, if war be best, or to regain
 Our own right lost. Him to unthroned we then
 May hope, when everlasting fate shall yield
 To fickle chance, and chaos judge the strife.
 The former, vain to hope, argues as vain
 235 The latter; for what place can be for us
 Within Heav'n's bound, unless Heav'n's Lord Supreme
 We overpower? Suppose He should relent
 And publish^o grace to all, on promise made grant
 Of new subjection; with what eyes could we 240 Stand in His presence humble, and receive
 Strict laws imposed, to celebrate His throne
 With warbled hymns, and to His godhead sing
 Forced hallelujahs, while He lordly sits
 Our envied Sovereign, and His altar breathes
 245 Ambrosial odours and ambrosial² flowers,
 Our servile offerings? This must be our task
 In Heav'n, this our delight. How wearisome
 Eternity so spent in worship paid
 To Whom we hate! Let us not then pursue
 250 By force impossible, by leave obtained
 Unacceptable,³ though in Heav'n, our state
 Of splendid vassalage;^o but rather seek servitude
 Our own good from ourselves, and from our own
 Live to ourselves, though in this vast recess,
 255 Free and to none accountable, preferring
 Hard liberty before the easy yoke
 Of servile pomp. Our greatness will appear
 Then most conspicuous when great things of small,
 Useful of hurtful, prosperous of adverse,
 260 We can create, and in what place so'er^o whatsoever
 Thrive under evil, and work ease out of pain
 Through labour and endurance. This deep world
 Of darkness do we dread? How oft amidst Thick clouds and dark doth Heav'n's all-ruling Sire
 265 Choose to reside, His glory unobscured,
 And with the majesty of darkness round

² ambrosial Ambrosia is the mythical food of the Greek and Roman gods; it is said to be intensely aromatic and able to grant eternal life.

³ Let us not ... Unacceptable Let us not try and take by impossible force of arms what we would find unacceptable if we obtained it (i.e., servitude in Heaven).

¹ For happy ... worst Though we are not happy, we have also not yet experienced the worst.

Covers His throne, from whence deep thunders roar.¹
 Must'ring their rage, and Heav'n resembles Hell!
 As He our darkness, cannot we His light
 270 Imitate when we please? This desert soil
 Wants^o not her hidden lustre, gems and gold; lacks
 Nor want we skill or art from whence to raise Magnificence; and what can Heav'n show more?
 Our torments also may, in length of time,
 275 Become our elements, these piercing fires
 As soft as now severe, our temper^o changed nature
 Into their temper; which must needs remove
 The sensible of pain.² All things invite
 To peaceful counsels, and the settled state
 280 Of order, how in safety best we may
 Compose our present evils,³ with regard
 Of what we are and where, dismissing quite
 All thoughts of war. Ye have what I advise.”
 He scarce had finished, when such murmur filled
 285 Th' assembly as when hollow rocks retain
 The sound of blustering winds, which all night long
 Had roused the sea, now with hoarse cadence lull Seafaring men o'erwatched,⁴ whose bark^o by boat chance
 Or pinnace,^o anchors in a craggy bay ship
 290 After the tempest. Such applause was heard
 As Mammon ended, and his sentence pleased,
 Advising peace: for such another field⁵
 They dreaded worse than Hell; so much the fear
 Of thunder and the sword of Michael⁶
 295 Wrought still within them; and no less desire
 To found this nether empire, which might rise,
 By policy and long process of time,
 In emulation opposite to Heav'n.
 Which when Beelzebub perceived—than whom,
 300 Satan except, none higher sat—with grave
 Aspect he rose, and in his rising seemed
 A pillar of state. Deep on his front^o engraven forehead

¹ How oft amidst ... from whence deep thunders roar See, for example, Exodus 13 and 14, Leviticus 16.2, Numbers 9–16.

² The sensible of pain Those who feel pain with the senses.

³ Compose our present evils Come to accept our current situation.

⁴ o'erwatched Worn out from having to forgo sleep for watchfulness.

⁵ field I.e., battleground.

⁶ Michael Archangel Michael, a general of God's army.

Deliberation sat, and public care;
 And princely counsel in his face yet shone,
 305 Majestic, though in ruin. Sage he stood
 With Atlantean⁷ shoulders, fit to bear
 The weight of mightiest monarchies; his look
 Drew audience and attention still as night
 Or summer's noontide air, while thus he spoke:
 310 “Thrones and imperial powers, offspring of Heav'n,
 Ethereal virtues; or these titles now
 Must we renounce, and, changing style,⁸ be called Princes of Hell? For so the popular vote
 Inclines—here to continue, and build up here
 315 A growing empire; doubtless; while we dream,
 And know not that the King of Heav'n hath doomed
 This place our dungeon, not our safe retreat
 Beyond His potent arm, to live exempt
 From Heav'n's high jurisdiction, in new league
 320 Banded against His throne, but to remain
 In strictest bondage, though thus far removed,
 Under th' inevitable curb, reserved
 His captive multitude. For He, to be sure,
 In height or depth, still first and last will reign
 325 Sole king, and of His kingdom lose no part
 By our revolt, but over Hell extend
 His empire, and with iron sceptre rule
 Us here, as with His golden those in Heav'n.
 What sit we then projecting peace and war?
 330 War hath determined us⁹ and foiled with loss
 Irreparable; terms of peace yet none
 Vouchsafed^o or sought; for what peace will bestowed be given
 To us enslaved, but custody severe,
 And stripes^o and arbitrary punishment lashes
 335 Inflicted? And what peace can we return,
 But, to our power,¹⁰ hostility and hate,
 Untamed reluctance,^o and revenge, though opposition
 slow,
 Yet ever plotting how the Conqueror least
 May reap His conquest, and may least rejoice
 340 In doing what we most in suffering feel?

⁷ Atlantean The Titan Atlas carried the world on his broad shoulders as penance for his revolutionary acts.

⁸ style Formal title.

⁹ determined us Made the choice for us.

¹⁰ to our power To our utmost ability.

Nor will occasion want, nor shall we need
 With dangerous expedition to invade
 Heaven, whose high walls fear no assault or siege,
 Or ambush from the deep. What if we find
 345 Some easier enterprise? There is a place
 (If ancient and prophetic fame in Heav'n Err not)—another world, the happy seat
 Of some new race called Man, about this time
 To be created like to us, though less
 350 In power and excellence, but favoured more
 Of Him who rules above; so was His will Pronounced among the gods, and by an oath
 That shook Heav'n's whole circumference confirmed.
 Thither let us bend all our thoughts, to learn
 355 What creatures there inhabit, of what mould^o form
 Or substance, how endued,^o and what their equipped power
 And where their weakness: how attempted^o best, assailed
 By force or subtlety. Though Heav'n be shut,
 And Heav'n's high Arbitrator sit secure
 360 In His own strength, this place may lie exposed,
 The utmost border of His kingdom, left
 To their defence who hold it:¹ here, perhaps,
 Some advantageous act may be achieved
 By sudden onset^o—either with Hell-fire assault
 365 To waste^o His whole creation, or possess destroy
 All as our own, and drive, as we were driven,
 The puny habitants; or, if not drive,
 Seduce them to our party, that their God
 May prove their Foe, and with repenting hand
 370 Abolish His own works.² This would surpass
 Common revenge, and interrupt His joy
 In our confusion,^o and our joy upraise ruin
 In His disturbance; when his darling sons,
 Hurl'd headlong to partake with us, shall curse
 375 Their frail original,³ and faded bliss—
 Faded so soon! Advise^o if this be worth contemplate
 Attempting, or to sit in darkness here
 Hatching vain empires.” Thus Beelzebub
 Pleaded his devilish counsel—first devised
 380 By Satan, and in part proposed: for whence,

But from the author of all ill, could spring
 So deep a malice, to confound^o the race destroy
 Of mankind in one root,⁴ and earth with Hell
 To mingle and involve, done all to spite
 385 The great Creator? But their spite still serves
 His glory to augment. The bold design
 Pleased highly those infernal states,⁵ and joy
 Sparkled in all their eyes: with full assent
 They vote: whereat his speech he thus renews:
 390 “Well have ye judged, well ended long debate,
 Synod⁶ of gods, and, like to what ye are,
 Great things resolved, which from the lowest deep
 Will once more lift us up, in spite of fate,
 Nearer our ancient seat—perhaps in view
 395 Of those bright confines, whence, with neighbouring arms,
 And opportune excursion, we may chance
 Re-enter Heav'n; or else in some mild zone
 Dwell, not unvisited of Heav'n's fair light,
 Secure, and at the bright'ning orient beam⁷
 400 Purge off this gloom: the soft delicious air,
 To heal the scar of these corrosive fires,
 Shall breathe her balm. But, first, whom shall we send
 In search of this new world? Whom shall we find Sufficient? Who shall tempt^o with wandering attempt feet
 405 The dark, unbottomed, infinite abyss,
 And through the palpable obscure⁸ find out
 His uncouth^o way, or spread his airy flight, unknown
 Upborne with indefatigable wings
 Over the vast abrupt,^o ere he arrive chasm
 410 The happy isle? What strength, what art, can then
 Suffice, or what evasion bear him safe,
 Through the strict sentries and stations thick
 Of angels watching round? Here he had need
 All circumspection: and we now no less 415 Choice in our suffrage; for on whom we send
 The weight of all, and our last hope, relies.”
 This said, he sat; and expectation held

¹ To their ... hold it In the protection of those still inhabiting it.

² Abolish His own works In Genesis 6.7, God says that he will destroy his own creations in his regret at having made them.

³ original Adam, the originator of the human race.

⁴ root Parent, i.e., Adam.

⁵ states Heads of state or estates, the hierarchs of Hell.

⁶ Synod Council or assembly, especially of church officials.

⁷ bright'ning orient beam Lightening of the eastern horizon; dawn.

⁸ the palpable obscure Darkness so complete one can feel it.

His look suspense,¹ awaiting who appeared
 To second, or oppose, or undertake
 420 The perilous attempt. But all sat mute,
 Pondering the danger with deep thoughts; and each
 In other's count'nance read his own dismay,
 Astonished. None among the choice and prime
 Of those Heav'n-warring champions could be found 425 So hardy² as to proffer or accept,
 Alone, the dreadful voyage; till, at last,
 Satan, whom now transcendent glory raised
 Above his fellows, with monarchal pride
 Conscious of highest worth, unmoved thus spake:
 430 "O progeny of Heav'n! Empyreal thrones!
 With reason hath deep silence and demur^o uncertainty
 Seized us, though undismayed. Long is the way
 And hard, that out of Hell leads up to light.
 Our prison strong, this huge convex^o of fire, dome
 435 Outrageous^o to devour, immures us round eager Ninefold; and gates of burning adamant,³
 Barred over us, prohibit all egress.
 These passed, if any pass, the void profound
 Of unessential⁴ night receives him next,
 440 Wide-gaping, and with utter loss of being
 Threatens him, plunged in that abortive gulf.
 If thence he scape, into whatever world,
 Or unknown region, what remains him less
 Than⁵ unknown dangers, and as hard escape?
 445 But I should ill become this throne, O peers,
 And this imperial sov'reignty, adorned
 With splendour, armed with power, if aught proposed
 And judged of public moment^o in the shape importance
 Of difficulty or danger, could deter
 450 Me from attempting. Wherefore do I assume
 These royalties, and not refuse to reign,
 Refusing⁶ to accept as great a share
 Of hazard as of honour, due alike
 To him who reigns, and so much to him due

¹ expectation . . . suspense His look was suspenseful as he waited for their response.

² hardy Tough, or also possibly "foolhardy."

³ immures . . . Ninefold Nine walls were said to surround Hell; adamant Unbreakable shining metal.

⁴ unessential Having no substance, absolutely empty.

⁶ Refusing Should I refuse.

455 Of hazard more as he above the rest
 High honoured sits? Go, therefore, mighty powers,
 Terror of Heav'n, though fallen; intend at⁷ home,
 While here shall be our home, what best may ease
 The present misery, and render Hell
 460 More tolerable; if there be cure or charm
 To respite, or deceive, or slack the pain
 Of this ill mansion: intermit no watch⁸
 Against a wakeful foe, while I abroad
 Through all the coasts^o of dark destruction seek regions
 465 Deliverance for us all. This enterprise
 None shall partake with me." Thus saying rose
 The monarch, and prevented all reply;
 Prudent, lest from his resolution raised^o delayed
 Others among the chief might offer now,
 470 Certain to be refused, what erst^o they feared, formerly
 And, so refused, might in opinion stand
 His rivals, winning cheap the high repute
 Which he through hazard huge must earn. But they Dreaded not more th' adventure than his voice
 475 Forbidding; and at once with him they rose.
 Their rising all at once was as the sound
 Of thunder heard remote. Towards him they bend
 With awful⁹ reverence prone, and as a God
 Extol him equal to the high'st in Heav'n.
 480 Nor failed they to express how much they praised
 That for the general safety he despised
 His own: for neither do the spirits damned
 Lose all their virtue; lest bad men should boast
 Their specious^o deeds on earth, which glory worthless
 excites,
 485 Or close ambition varnished o'er with zeal.
 Thus they their doubtful consultations dark
 Ended, rejoicing in their matchless chief:
 As, when from mountaintops the dusky clouds
 Ascending, while the north wind sleeps, o'erspread
 490 Heav'n's cheerful face, the louring element¹⁰
 Scowls o'er the darkened landscape snow or shower,
 If chance the radiant sun, with farewell sweet,
 Extend his ev'ning beam, the fields revive,

⁷ intend at Turn your thoughts to.

⁸ intermit no watch Do not interrupt your vigilance.

⁹ awful Full of awe.

¹⁰ louring element Darkening sky.

The birds their notes renew, and bleating herds
 495 Attest their joy, that hill and valley rings.
 O shame to men! Devil with devil damned
 Firm concord holds;¹ men only disagree
 Of creatures rational, though under hope
 Of heavenly grace, and, God proclaiming peace,
 500 Yet live in hatred, enmity, and strife
 Among themselves, and levy cruel wars
 Wasting the earth, each other to destroy:
 As if (which might induce us to accord)
 Man had not hellish foes enow^o besides, enough
 505 That day and night for his destruction wait!
 The Stygian^o council thus dissolved; and forth bellish
 In order came the grand infernal peers:
 Midst came their mighty paramount,² and seemed Alone th' antagonist of Heaven, nor less 510 Than Hell's dread emperor, with pomp supreme,
 And God-like imitated state: him round³
 A globe^o of fiery seraphim enclosed ring
 With bright emblazonry, and horrent arms.⁴
 Then of their session ended they bid cry
 515 With trumpet's regal sound the great result:
 Toward the four winds four speedy cherubim
 Put to their mouths the sounding alchemy,⁵
 By herald's voice explained; the hollow abyss
 Heard far and wide, and all the host of Hell
 520 With deaf'ning shout returned them loud acclaim.
 Thence more at ease their minds, and somewhat raised
 By false presumptuous hope, the rangèd⁶ powers
 Disband; and, wand'ring, each his several way
 Pursues, as inclination or sad choice
 525 Leads him perplexed, where he may likeliest find
 Truce to his restless thoughts, and entertain
 The irksome hours, till his great chief return.
 Part^o on the plain, or in the air sublime,^o some / overhead
 Upon the wing or in swift race contend,

530 As at th' Olympian games or Pythian fields;⁷
 Part curb their fiery steeds, or shun the goal
 With rapid wheels,⁸ or fronted^o opposing ranked brigades form:
 As when, to warn proud cities, war appears
 Waged in the troubled sky, and armies rush
 535 To battle in the clouds;⁹ before each van^o foremost division
 Prick forth the airy knights, and couch^o their spears, set
 Till thickest legions close;¹⁰ with feats of arms
 From either end of Heav'n the welkin^o burns. sky
 Others, with vast Typhoean¹¹ rage, more fell,^o evil
 540 Rend up both rocks and hills, and ride the air
 In whirlwind; Hell scarce holds the wild uproar:
 As when Alcides,^o from Oechalia crowned Hercules
 With conquest, felt th' envenomed robe, and tore
 Through pain up by the roots Thessalian pines,
 545 And Lichas from the top of Oeta threw
 Into th' Euboic sea.¹² Others, more mild,
 Retreated in a silent valley, sing
 With notes angelical to many a harp
 Their own heroic deeds, and hapless fall
 550 By doom of battle, and complain that fate
 Free virtue should enthrall to force or chance.
 Their song was partial;¹³ but the harmony
 (What could it less when spirits immortal sing?)
 Suspended¹⁴ Hell, and took with ravishment
 555 The thronging audience. In discourse more sweet

⁷ Pythian fields Fields below the Temple of the Oracle at Delphi, site of games honoring Apollo's victory over Python, the great serpent that was ravaging the area.

⁸ shun ... wheels Avoid crashing their chariots into the goalposts they must pass close to in order to score in their games.

⁹ battle in the clouds The apparition of a battle in the air was thought to warn of coming strife on the ground.

¹⁰ close Meet in combat.

¹¹ Typhoean Monstrous, from Typhon the monstrous giant whom Zeus threw into Hades. Some said he lay under Mt. Aetna and caused eruptions.

¹² from Oechalia ... th' Euboic sea Hercules, after returning from victory in Oechalia, a region in Greece, was presented as a gift a cloak dipped in burning venom. Once he put it on, the pain drove him into a violent rage and he threw Lichas, the innocent and unknowing giver of the fatal gift, into the Euboean Sea.

¹³ partial Sung in parts, or harmony, but also with a suggestion of "biased" or "self-interested."

¹⁴ Suspended Kept in a state of anticipation.

² paramount Absolute ruler.

³ him round Around him.

⁴ bright emblazonry ... horrent arms Bright heraldry and bared weapons.

⁵ the sounding alchemy Trumpets, metal that sings.

⁶ rangèd Structured in hierarchical levels.

(For eloquence the soul, song charms the sense)¹
 Others apart sat on a hill retired,
 In thoughts more elevate, and reasoned high
 Of Providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate—
 560 Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute,
 And found no end, in wandering mazes lost.
 Of good and evil much they argued then,
 Of happiness and final misery,
 Passion and apathy, and glory and shame:
 565 Vain wisdom all, and false philosophy!
 Yet, with a pleasing sorcery, could charm
 Pain for a while or anguish, and excite
 Fallacious hope, or arm th' obdured breast²
 With stubborn patience as with triple steel.
 570 Another part, in squadrons and gross^o bands, dense
 On bold adventure to discover wide
 That dismal world, if any clime^o perhaps region
 Might yield them easier habitation, bend
 Four ways their flying march, along the banks
 575 Of four infernal rivers, that disgorge
 Into the burning lake their baleful streams—
 Abhorred Styx, the flood of deadly hate;
 Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep;
 Cocytus, named of lamentation loud
 580 Heard on the rueful stream; fierce Phlegeton,
 Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with rage.
 Far off from these, a slow and silent stream,
 Lethe,³ the river of oblivion, rolls
 Her watery labyrinth, whereof who drinks
 585 Forthwith his former state and being forgets—
 Forgets both joy and grief, pleasure and pain.
 Beyond this flood a frozen continent
 Lies dark and wild, beat with perpetual storms
 Of whirlwind and dire hail, which on firm land
 590 Thaws not, but gathers heap,⁴ and ruin seems
 Of ancient pile;^o all else deep snow and ice, construction
 A gulf profound as that Serbonian bog

Between Damietta and Mount Casius old,⁵
 Where armies whole have sunk: the parching air
 595 Burns froze,^o and cold performs th' effect of fire. frostily
 Thither, by harpy-footed furies⁶ haled,^o dragged
 At certain revolutions⁷ all the damned
 Are brought; and feel by turns the bitter change
 Of fierce extremes, extremes by change more fierce,
 600 From beds of raging fire to starve^o in ice i.e., freeze
 Their soft ethereal warmth, and there to pine
 Immovable, infixed, and frozen round
 Periods of time, thence hurried back to fire.
 They ferry over this Lethæan sound⁸
 605 Both to and fro, their sorrow to augment,
 And wish and struggle, as they pass, to reach
 The tempting stream, with one small drop to lose
 In sweet forgetfulness all pain and woe,
 All in one moment, and so near the brink;
 610 But fate withstands, and, to oppose th' attempt,
 Medusa with Gorgonian terror⁹ guards
 The ford, and of itself the water flies
 All taste of living wight,^o as once it fled person
 The lip of Tantalus.¹⁰ Thus roving on 615 In confused march forlorn, th' adventurous bands,
 With shuddering horror pale, and eyes aghast,
 Viewed first their lamentable lot, and found
 No rest. Through many a dark and dreary vale
 They passed, and many a region dolorous,
 620 O'er many a frozen, many a fiery alp,¹¹
 Rocks, caves, lakes, fens, bogs, dens, and shades of death—
 A universe of death, which God by curse

² obdured breast Hardened heart.

³ Acheron River of woe; Cocytus River of lamentation; Phlegeton River of fire; Lethe River from which the dead drink to forget their prior lives; these are four of the five rivers of the underworld in Greek mythology, the fifth being the Styx.

⁴ gathers heap Gathers into heaps.

⁵ that Serbonian bog ... Mount Casius old Lake Serbonis (modern Lake Bardawil), located in northern Egypt, is surrounded by quicksand.

⁶ harpy-footed furies Talon-footed furies. Both the infernal snake-haired Furies and Harpies (taloned birds with heads of women) were agents of retribution in classical myth.

⁷ revolutions Repeated times.

⁸ sound Expanse of water.

⁹ Medusa with Gorgonian terror Medusa and her sisters were Gorgons, monsters of Greek myth, and Medusa specifically was so terrible that her sight turned men to stone.

¹⁰ The lip of Tantalus In Greek myth, Tantalus was condemned to be immersed in water that receded when he tried to drink and was overhung by fruit on a branch that retreated from his reach.

¹¹ fiery alp Volcanic peak.

Created evil, for evil only good;
 Where all life dies, death lives, and nature breeds,
 625 Perverse, all monstrous, all prodigious things,
 Abominable, inutterable, and worse
 Than fables yet have feigned or fear conceived,
 Gorgons, and hydras, and chimeras¹ dire.
 Meanwhile the adversary² of God and man,
 630 Satan, with thoughts inflamed of highest design,
 Puts on swift wings, and toward the gates of Hell
 Explores his solitary flight: sometimes
 He scours the right hand coast, sometimes the left;
 Now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars
 635 Up to the fiery concave towering high.
 As when far off at sea a fleet descried
 Hangs in the clouds, by equinoctial winds
 Close sailing from Bengala, or the isles
 Of Ternate and Tidore,³ whence merchants bring 640 Their spicy drugs; they on the trading flood,
 Through the wide Ethiopian to the Cape,⁴
 Ply stemming nightly toward the pole:⁵ so seemed Far off the flying fiend. At last appear
 Hell-bounds, high reaching to the horrid roof,
 645 And thrice threefold the gates; three folds were brass,
 Three iron, three of adamant rock,
 Impenetrable, impaled^o with circling fire, fenced
 Yet unconsumed. Before the gates there sat
 On either side a formidable shape.
 650 The one seemed woman to the waist, and fair,
 But ended foul in many a scaly fold,
 Voluminous and vast—a serpent armed
 With mortal sting. About her middle round
 A cry^o of Hell-hounds never-ceasing barked pack
 655 With wide Cerberean⁶ mouths full loud, and rung
 A hideous peal; yet, when they list,^o would wanted to creep,

¹ hydras Monstrous multi-headed serpents; chimeras Fire-breathing beings made up of dragon, goat, and lion features.

² adversary The Hebrew name "Satan" means "adversary."

³ Bengala ... Ternate ... Tidore Three eastern Indian ports, sources of spices and exotic trade riches.

⁴ the wide Ethiopian to the Cape The Indian Ocean to the Cape of Good Hope.

⁵ the pole The South pole.

⁶ Cerberean Cerberus, guardian of the underworld in classical mythology, was a dog with three heads.

If aught disturbed their noise, into her womb,
 And kennel there; yet there still barked and howled Within unseen. Far less abhorred than these 660 Vexed Scylla,⁷ bathing in the sea that parts
 Calabria from the hoarse Trinacrian^o shore; Sicilian
 Nor uglier follow the night-hag,⁸ when, called
 In secret, riding through the air she comes,
 Lured with the smell of infant blood, to dance
 665 With Lapland witches, while the labouring^o unsettled moon
 Eclipses at their charms.^o The other shape— spells
 If shape it might be called that shape had none
 Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb;
 Or substance might be called that shadow seemed,
 670 For each seemed either—black it stood as night,
 Fierce as ten furies, terrible as Hell,
 And shook a dreadful dart:^o what seemed his head javelin
 The likeness of a kingly crown had on.
 Satan was now at hand, and from his seat
 675 The monster moving onward came as fast
 With horrid strides; Hell trembled as he strode.
 Th' undaunted fiend what this might be admired^o— wondered Admired, not feared (God and His Son except, Created thing naught valued he nor shunned),
 680 And with disdainful look thus first began:
 "Whence and what art thou, execrable shape,
 That dar'st, though grim and terrible, advance
 Thy miscreated front⁹ athwart my way
 To yonder gates? Through them I mean to pass, 685 That be assured, without leave asked of thee.
 Retire; or taste thy folly, and learn by proof,
 Hell-born, not to contend with spirits of Heav'n."
 To whom the goblin,^o full of wrath, replied: monster
 "Are thou that traitor angel? Are thou he,
 690 Who first broke peace in Heav'n and faith, till then
 Unbroken, and in proud rebellious arms
 Drew after him the third part of Heaven's sons, Conjured^o against the highest—for which both aligned thou
 And they, outcast from God, are here condemned

⁷ Scylla Nymph transformed by Circe, the Greek enchantress, into a dreadful monster with a lower body composed of savage dogs.

⁸ night-hag Hecate, the underworld goddess and patron of sorcery.

⁹ miscreated front Deformed face.

695 To waste eternal days in woe and pain?
 And reckon'st thou thyself with spirits of Heav'n
 Hell-doomed, and breath'st defiance here and scorn,
 Where I reign king, and, to enrage thee more,
 Thy king and lord? Back to thy punishment,
 700 False fugitive; and to thy speed add wings,
 Lest with a whip of scorpions¹ I pursue
 Thy lingering, or with one stroke of this dart
 Strange horror seize thee, and pangs unfelt before."

So spake the grisly terror, and in shape,
 705 So speaking and so threat'ning, grew tenfold,
 More dreadful and deform. On th' other side,
 Incensed with indignation, Satan stood
 Unterrified, and like a comet burned,
 That fires the length of Ophiuchus² huge
 710 In th' arctic sky, and from his horrid hair
 Shakes pestilence and war.³ Each at the head
 Levelled his deadly aim; their fatal hands
 No second stroke intend; and such a frown
 Each cast at th' other as when two black clouds, 715 With Heav'n's artillery⁴ fraught, came rattling on
 Over the Caspian,⁵ then stand front to front
 Hovering a space, till winds the signal blow
 To join their dark encounter in mid-air.
 So frowned the mighty combatants that Hell
 720 Grew darker at their frown; so matched they stood;
 For never but once more was either like
 To meet so great a foe. And now great deeds
 Had been achieved, whereof all Hell had rung,
 Had not the snaky sorceress, that sat
 725 Fast by Hell-gate and kept the fatal key,
 Risen, and with hideous outcry rushed between.

"O father, what intends thy hand," she cried,
 "Against thy only son? What fury, O son,
 Possesses thee to bend that mortal dart
 730 Against thy father's head? And know'st for whom?"

¹ with a whip of scorpions Mirrors the words of King Rheoboam, son of Solomon in 1 Kings 12.11, whose promise of harshness sparked a civil war.

² Ophiuchus The constellation Serpent Bearer, visible in the northern sky from June to October.

³ from his horrid hair ... war Comets, with their long luminous tails, or hair, were believed to be harbingers of disaster.

⁴ Heav'n's artillery Lightning.

⁵ the Caspian Storm-riddled sea.

For Him who sits above, and laughs the while
 At thee, ordained His drudge to execute
 Whate'er His wrath, which He calls justice, bids—
 His wrath, which one day will destroy ye both!"

735 She spake, and at her words the hellish pest Forbore: then these to her Satan returned:

"So strange thy outcry, and thy words so strange
 Thou interposest, that my sudden hand,
 Prevented, spares^o to tell thee yet by deeds withholds
 740 What it intends, till first I know of thee
 What thing thou art, thus double-formed, and why,
 In this infernal vale first met, thou call'st
 Me father, and that phantasm call'st my son.
 I know thee not, nor ever saw till now
 745 Sight more detestable than him and thee."

T' whom thus the portress⁶ of Hell-gate replied:
 "Hast thou forgot me, then; and do I seem
 Now in thine eye so foul? Once deemed so fair
 In Heaven, when at th' assembly, and in sight
 750 Of all the seraphim with thee combined
 In bold conspiracy against Heaven's King,
 All on a sudden miserable pain
 Surprised thee, dim thine eyes and dizzy swum
 In darkness, while thy head flames thick and fast
 755 Threw forth, till on the left side op'ning wide,
 Likest to thee in shape and count'nance bright,
 Then shining heav'nly fair, a goddess armed,
 Out of thy head I sprung.⁷ Amazement seized
 All th' host of Heav'n; back they recoiled afraid
 760 At first, and called me Sin, and for a sign
 Portentous held me; but, familiar grown,
 I pleased, and with attractive graces won
 The most averse—thee chiefly, who, full oft
 Thyself in me thy perfect image viewing,
 765 Becam'st enamored; and such joy thou took'st
 With me in secret that my womb conceived
 A growing burden. Meanwhile war arose,
 And fields were fought in Heav'n; wherein remained
 (For what could else?) to our Almighty Foe
 770 Clear victory; to our part loss and rout
 Through all the Empyrean. Down they fell,

⁶ portress Female doorkeeper.

⁷ Out of thy head I sprung Cf. Athena's birth from the head of Zeus in classical myth.

Driven headlong from the pitch° of Heaven, down
 Into this deep; and in the general fall
 I also: at which time this powerful key 775 Into my hands was given, with charge to keep
 These gates for ever shut, which none can pass
 Without my op'ning. Pensive here I sat
 Alone; but long I sat not, till my womb,
 Pregnant by thee, and now excessive grown,
 780 Prodigious motion felt and rueful throes.
 At last this odious offspring whom thou seest,
 Thine own begotten, breaking violent way,
 Tore through my entrails, that, with fear and pain
 Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew
 785 Transformed: but he my inbred enemy
 Forth issued, brandishing his fatal dart,
 Made to destroy. I fled, and cried out Death!
 Hell trembled at the hideous name, and sighed
 From all her caves, and back resounded Death!
 790 I fled; but he pursued (though more, it seems, Inflamed with lust than rage), and, swifter far,
 Me overtook, his mother, all dismayed,
 And, in embraces forcible and foul
 Engendering with me, of that rape begot
 795 These yelling monsters, that with ceaseless cry
 Surround me, as thou saw'st—hourly conceived
 And hourly born, with sorrow infinite
 To me; for, when they list, into the womb
 That bred them they return, and howl, and gnaw
 800 My bowels, their repast; then, bursting forth
 Afresh, with conscious terrors vex me round,
 That rest or intermission none I find.
 Before mine eyes in opposition sits
 Grim Death, my son and foe, who set them on,
 805 And me, his parent, would full soon devour
 For want of other prey, but that he knows
 His end with mine involved, and knows that I
 Should prove a bitter morsel, and his bane,
 Whenever that shall be: so fate pronounced.
 810 But thou, O father, I forewarn thee, shun
 His deadly arrow; neither vainly hope
 To be invulnerable in those bright arms,
 Though tempered heavenly; for that mortal dint,¹
 He who reigns above, none can resist."

815 She finished; and the subtle fiend his lore° instruction
 Soon learned, now milder, and thus answered smooth:
 "Dear daughter—since thou claim'st me for thy sire,
 And my fair son here show'st me, the dear pledge
 Of dalliance had with thee in Heav'n, and joys
 820 Then sweet, now sad to mention, through dire change
 Befall'n us unforeseen, unthought-of-know,
 I come no enemy, but to set free
 From out this dark and dismal house of pain
 Both him and thee, and all the heav'nly host 825 Of spirits that, in our just pretences° armed, demands
 Fell with us from on high. From them I go
 This uncouth° errand sole, and one for all unfamiliar
 Myself expose, with lonely steps to tread
 Th' unfounded° deep, and through the void unending immense
 830 To search, with wandering quest, a place foretold
 Should be—and, by concurring signs, ere now
 Created vast and round—a place of bliss
 In the purlieus° of Heav'n; and therein placed outskirts
 A race of upstart creatures, to supply
 835 Perhaps our vacant room, though more removed,
 Lest Heav'n, surcharged° with potent multitude, congested
 Might hap to move new broils.² Be this, or aught
 Than this more secret, now designed, I haste
 To know; and, this once known, shall soon return,
 840 And bring ye to the place where thou and Death
 Shall dwell at ease, and up and down unseen
 Wing silently the buxom° air, embalmed healthy
 With odours. There ye shall be fed and filled Immeasurably; all things shall be your prey."
 845 He ceased; for both seemed highly pleased, and Death
 Grinned horrible a ghastly smile, to hear
 His famine³ should be filled, and blessed his maw° stomach
 Destined to that good hour. No less rejoiced
 His mother bad, and thus bespake her sire:
 850 "The key of this infernal pit, by due
 And by command of Heav'n's all-powerful King,
 I keep, by Him forbidden to unlock
 These adamantine gates; against all force
 Death ready stands to interpose his dart,
 855 Fearless to be o'ermatched by living might.

² Might hap ... broils Might chance to begin new wars.

³ famine Voracious appetite.

But what owe I to His commands above,
 Who hates me, and hath hither thrust me down
 Into this gloom of Tartarus profound,
 To sit in hateful office^o here confined, duty
 860 Inhabitant of Heav'n and heav'nly born—
 Here in perpetual agony and pain,
 With terrors and with clamours compassed round
 Of mine own brood, that on my bowels feed?
 Thou art my father, thou my author, thou
 865 My being gav'st me; whom should I obey
 But thee? Whom follow? Thou will bring me soon
 To that new world of light and bliss, among
 The gods who live at ease, where I shall reign
 At thy right hand voluptuous,¹ as beseems
 870 Thy daughter and thy darling, without end.”
 Thus saying, from her side the fatal key,
 Sad instrument of all our woe, she took;
 And, towards the gate rolling her bestial train,
 Forthwith the huge portcullis high up-drew,
 875 Which, but herself, not all the Stygian powers
 Could once have moved; then in the key-hole turns
 Th' intricate wards,² and every bolt and bar
 Of massy iron or solid rock with ease
 Unfast'ns. On a sudden op'n fly,
 880 With impetuous recoil and jarring sound,
 Th' infernal doors, and on their hinges grate
 Harsh thunder, that the lowest bottom shook
 Of Erebus.³ She op'nd; but to shut
 Excelled^o her power: the gates wide op'n stood, surpassed
 885 That with extended wings a bannered host,
 Under spread ensigns^o marching, might pass flags
 through
 With horse and chariots ranked in loose array;
 So wide they stood, and like a furnace-mouth
 Cast forth redounding^o smoke and ruddy flame. copious
 890 Before their eyes in sudden view appear
 The secrets of the hoary^o deep—a dark aged
 Illimitable^o ocean, without bound, limitless
 Without dimension; where length, breadth, and height,

¹ I shall ... voluptuous I.e., she will occupy a throne at the right hand of his father—a parody of the Son's position at God's right hand.

² wards The tumblers and pin assemblies of a lock, which mate with and are turned by the teeth of a key.

³ Erebus Upper region of Hades.

And time, and place, are lost; where eldest Night
 895 And Chaos, ancestors of nature, hold
 Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise
 Of endless wars, and by confusion stand.
 For Hot, Cold, Moist, and Dry,⁴ four champions fierce,
 Strive here for mastery, and to battle bring 900 Their embryo atoms:⁵ they around the flag
 Of each his faction, in their several clans,
 Light-armed or heavy, sharp, smooth, swift, or slow,
 Swarm populous, unnumbered as the sands
 Of Barca or Cyrene's torrid soil,⁶
 905 Levied to side with warring winds, and poise
 Their lighter wings. To whom these most adhere
 He rules a moment: Chaos umpire sits,
 And by decision more embroils the fray
 By which he reigns: next him, high arbiter,
 910 Chance governs all. Into this wild abyss,
 The womb of Nature, and perhaps her grave,
 Of neither sea, nor shore, nor air, nor fire,
 But all these in their pregnant causes mixed
 Confus'dly, and which thus must ever fight,
 915 Unless th' Almighty Maker them ordain
 His dark materials to create more worlds—
 Into this wild abyss the wary fiend
 Stood on the brink of Hell and looked a while,
 Pondering his voyage; for no narrow frith^o ford
 920 He had to cross. Nor was his ear less pealed^o deafened
 With noises loud and ruinous (to compare
 Great things with small) than when Bellona⁷ storms
 With all her battering engines, bent to raze
 Some capital city; or less than if this frame
 925 Of Heav'n were falling, and these elements
 In mutiny had from her axle torn
 The steadfast Earth. At last his sail-broad vans^o wings
 He spread for flight, and, in the surging smoke
 Uplifted, spurns the ground; thence many a league,
 930 As in a cloudy chair, ascending rides
 Audacious; but, that seat soon failing, meets

⁴ Hot, Cold, Moist, and Dry Personifications of the four classical elements: fire, air, water, and earth.

⁵ Their embryo atoms Their primeval matter.

⁶ Barca or Cyrene's torrid soil Barca and Cyrene are cities in the Libyan desert surrounded by sand dunes.

⁷ Bellona Goddess of war in the Roman pantheon.

A vast vacuity. All unawares,
 Fluttering his pennons^o vain, plumb down¹ he drops wings
 Ten thousand fathom deep, and to this hour
 935 Down had been falling, had not, by ill chance,
 The strong rebuff of some tumultuous cloud,
 Instinct² with fire and nitre, hurried him
 As many miles aloft. That fury stayed—
 Quenched in a boggy Syrtis,³ neither sea,
 940 Nor good dry land—nigh foundered,⁴ on he fares,
 Treading the crude consistence, half on foot,
 Half flying; behoves him now both oar and sail.
 As when a griffon⁵ through the wilderness
 With wingèd course, o'er hill or moory dale,
 945 Pursues the Arimaspians,⁶ who by stealth
 Had from his wakeful custody purloined
 The guarded gold; so eagerly the fiend
 O'er bog or steep, through strait, rough, dense, or rare,
 With head, hands, wings, or feet, pursues his way,
 950 And swims, or sinks, or wades, or creeps, or flies.
 At length a universal hubbub wild
 Of stunning sounds, and voices all confused,
 Borne through the hollow dark, assaults his ear
 With loudest vehemence. Thither he plies
 955 Undaunted, to meet there whatever power
 Or spirit of the nethermost abyss
 Might in that noise reside, of whom to ask
 Which way the nearest coast of darkness lies
 Bordering on light; when straight behold the throne
 960 Of Chaos, and his dark pavilion spread Wide on the wasteful^o deep! With him enthroned empty
 Sat sable^o-vested night, eldest of things, black
 The consort of his reign; and by them stood
 Orcus and Ades, and the dreaded name

¹ plumb down Straight down.

² Instinct Shot through.

³ Syrtis Pair of quicksand gulfs on either side of Tripoli; see Book 5 of Pliny the Elder's Natural History.

⁴ nigh foundered Nearly sunk.

⁵ griffon Fabled beast with the head and wings of an eagle, the body of a lion, a voracious appetite for horses, and a penchant for hoarding gold and treasure.

⁶ Arimaspian Member of the Arimaspi tribe, said by Herodotus to pilfer the griffons' treasure.

965 Of Demogorgon;⁷ Rumour next, and Chance,
 And Tumult, and Confusion, all embroiled,
 And Discord with a thousand various mouths.
 T' whom Satan, turning boldly, thus: "Ye powers
 And spirits of this nethermost abyss,
 970 Chaos and ancient Night, I come no spy
 With purpose to explore or to disturb
 The secrets of your realm; but, by constraint^o necessity
 Wandering this darksome desert, as my way
 Lies through your spacious empire up to light, 975 Alone and without guide, half lost, I seek,
 What readiest path leads where your gloomy bounds
 Confine^o with Heav'n; or, if some other place, meet
 From your dominion won, th' ethereal King
 Possesses lately, thither to arrive
 980 I travel this profound.^o Direct my course: deep
 Directed, no mean recompense^o it brings reward
 To your behoof,^o if I that region lost, benefit
 All usurpation thence expelled, reduce
 To her original darkness and your sway
 985 (Which is my present journey^o), and undertaking
 once more
 Erect the standard^o there of ancient Night. flag
 Yours be th' advantage all, mine the revenge!"
 Thus Satan; and him thus the anarch old,⁸
 With faltering speech and visage incomposed,^o distorted
 990 Answered: "I know thee, stranger, who thou art—
 That mighty leading angel, who of late
 Made head⁹ against Heav'n's King, though overthrown.
 I saw and heard; for such a numerous host
 Fled not in silence through the frightened deep,
 995 With ruin upon ruin, rout¹⁰ on rout,
 Confusion worse confounded; and Heav'n-gates
 Poured out by millions her victorious bands,
 Pursuing. I upon my frontiers here
 Keep residence; if all I can will serve 1000 That little which is left so to defend,

⁷ Orcus Pluto, Roman god of the underworld; Ades Hades, Greek god of the underworld; Demogorgon Demon first imagined in the fourth century but believed to be a very ancient underworld god predating Hades.

⁸ the anarch old The old anarchist, i.e., Chaos.

⁹ Made head Battled.

¹⁰ rout Bitter loss.

Encroached on still through our intestine broils¹
 Weakening the sceptre of old Night: first, Hell,
 Your dungeon, stretching far and wide beneath;
 Now lately Heav'n and Earth, another world²
 1005 Hung o'er my realm, linked in a golden chain
 To that side Heav'n from whence your legions fell!
 If that way be your walk, you have not far;
 So much the nearer danger. Go, and speed;
 Havoc, and spoil, and ruin, are my gain."
 1010 He ceased; and Satan stayed not to reply,
 But, glad that now his sea should find a shore,
 With fresh alacrity^o and force renewed energy
 Springs upward, like a pyramid of fire,
 Into the wild expanse, and through the shock
 1015 Of fighting elements, on all sides round
 Environed, wins his way; harder beset
 And more endangered than when Argo passed
 Through Bosphorus betwixt the jostling rocks,³
 Or when Ulysses on the larboard shunned
 1020 Charybdis, and by th' other whirlpool steered.⁴
 So he with difficulty and labour hard
 Moved on, with difficulty and labour he;
 But, he once passed, soon after, when man fell,
 Strange alteration! Sin and Death amain,⁵
 1025 Following his track (such was the will of Heav'n)
 Paved after him a broad and beaten way
 Over the dark abyss, whose boiling gulf
 Tamely endured a bridge of wondrous length,
 From Hell continued, reaching th' utmost orb
 1030 Of this frail world;⁶ by which the spirits perverse

² Now ... another world Newly formed cosmos of earth and celestial sphere (as distinct from heaven where God and his angels are located).

³ Argo The ship of Jason and the Argonauts of Greek legend, sailors who faced many challenges in their travels; the jostling rocks Huge floating rocks that clashed and ground on one another were a peril passed by Jason and the Argonauts.

⁴ Ulysses Subject of Homer's Odyssey and a character in his Iliad, a famous wandering king, sailor, and hero; larboard The port or left side of a ship; Charybdis ... steered Ulysses successfully navigated between the ocean hazards Scylla and Charybdis—a sea monster and a terrible whirlpool, respectively.

⁵ amain Moving at full speed.

⁶ th' utmost orb ... world Edge of the furthest outlying sphere of the universe (in the Ptolemaic model that places Earth in the center).

With easy intercourse^o pass to and fro movement
 To tempt or punish mortals, except whom
 God and good angels guard by special grace.⁷
 But now at last the sacred influence
 1035 Of light appears, and from the walls of Heav'n
 Shoots far into the bosom of dim Night
 A glimmering dawn. Here Nature first begins
 Her farthest verge,^o and Chaos to retire, border
 As from her outmost works, a broken foe,
 1040 With tumult less and with less hostile din;
 That Satan with less toil, and now with ease,
 Wafts on the calmer wave by dubious light,
 And, like a weather-beaten vessel, holds⁸
 Gladly the port, though shrouds^o and tackle torn; ropes
 1045 Or in the emptier waste, resembling air,
 Weighs^o his spread wings, at leisure to behold adjusts
 Far off th' empyreal Heav'n, extended wide
 In circuit, undetermined square or round,⁹
 With opal towers and battlements adorned
 1050 Of living sapphire, once his native seat;
 And, fast by, hanging in a golden chain,
 This pendent world, in bigness as a star
 Of smallest magnitude close by the moon.¹⁰
 Thither, full fraught with mischievous revenge,
 1055 Accursed, and in a cursed hour, he hies.^o goes

THE END OF THE SECOND BOOK

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 3

God sitting on His throne sees Satan flying towards this world, then newly created; shows him to the Son who sat at His right hand; foretells the success of Satan in perverting mankind; clears His own justice and wisdom from all imputation, having created man free and able enough to have withstood his tempter; yet declares

⁷ special grace Unlike common grace, special grace is granted only to the elect and redeems them in spite of their own free will.

⁸ holds Advances towards.

⁹ undetermined square or round In other words, the overall shape of Heaven is indiscernible.

¹⁰ in bigness ... by the moon Refers to the perceived size of the smallest star in the sky compared to the moon (not the actual size of a star compared to the moon); in other words, very, very small.

His purpose of grace towards Him, in regard he fell not of his own malice, as did Satan, but by him seduced. The Son of God renders praises to His Father for the manifestation of His gracious purpose towards man; but God again declares, that grace cannot be extended towards man without the satisfaction of Divine Justice; man hath offended the Majesty of God by aspiring to Godhead, and therefore with all his progeny devoted to death must die, unless some one can be found sufficient to answer for his offence, and undergo his punishment. The Son of God freely offers himself a ransom for man: the Father accepts Him, ordains His incarnation, pronounces His exaltation above all names in Heaven and Earth; commands all the angels to adore Him; they obey, and hymning to their harps in full choir, celebrate the Father and the Son. Meanwhile Satan alights upon the bare convex of this world's outermost orb; where wandering he first finds a place since called the Limbo of Vanity; what persons and things fly up thither; thence comes to the gate of Heaven, described ascending by stairs, and the waters above the firmament that flow about it: his passage thence to the orb of the Sun; he finds there Uriel the regent of that orb, but first changes himself into the shape of a meaner angel; and pretending a zealous desire to behold the new creation and man whom God had placed here, inquires of him the place of his habitation, and is directed; alights first on Mount Niphates.

from BOOK 3

Hail, holy light, offspring of Heav'n first-born,
 Or of th' eternal coeternal beam
 May I express thee unblamed? Since God is light,¹
 And never but in unapproach'd light incomparable
 Dwelt from eternity, dwelt then in thee
 Bright effluence of bright essence increate.²
 Or hear'st thou rather³ pure ethereal stream,
 Whose fountain° who shall tell? Before the sun, source
 Before the Heav'ns thou wert, and at the voice
 Of God, as with a mantle, didst invest° envelop
 The rising world of waters dark and deep,

¹ May I express thee unblamed May I call you that without being blamed; God is light See 1 John 1.5.

² increate Not created, always existing.

³ Or hear'st thou rather Would you prefer to be called.

Won from the void and formless infinite.
 Thee I re-visit now with bolder wing,
 Escaped the Stygian pool, though long detained
 15 In that obscure sojourn, while in my flight
 Through utter and through middle darkness⁴ borne,
 With other notes than to th' Orphean⁵ lyre
 I sung of Chaos and eternal Night;
 Taught by the heavenly Muse to venture down
 20 The dark descent, and up to re-ascend,
 Though hard and rare: thee I revisit safe,
 And feel thy sovereign vital lamp; but thou
 Revisit'st not these eyes,⁶ that roll in vain
 To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn;
 25 So thick a drop serene⁷ hath quenched their orbs,
 Or dim suffusion veiled. Yet not the more
 Cease I to wander, where the Muses haunt,
 Clear spring, or shady grove, or sunny hill,
 Smit° with the love of sacred song; but chief smitten
 30 Thee, Sion,⁸ and the flowery brooks beneath,
 That wash thy hallowed feet, and warbling flow,
 Nightly I visit: nor sometimes forget⁹
 Those other two equaled with me in fate,¹⁰
 So were I equalled with them in renown,
 35 Thy sov'reign command, that Man should find grace;
 Blind Thamyras, and blind Maeonides,
 And Tiresias, and Phineus,¹¹ prophets old:
 Then feed on thoughts, that voluntary move
 Harmonious numbers; as the wakeful bird¹²
 40 Sings darkling,° and in shadiest covert hid in the dark

⁴ Through ... darkness Through the full darkness of Hell and the less dark Chaos.

⁵ Orphean Orpheus, a musician-hero of Greek myth, visited the underworld to retrieve his wife Eurydice. The notes of his lyre won him safe passage.

⁶ Revisit'st not these eyes Milton became totally blind in 1652.

⁷ drop serene Gutta serena, the eye disease Milton had.

⁸ Sion Biblical mountain and site of spiritual learning.

⁹ nor sometimes forget Remember always.

¹⁰ Those ... fate Sharing my (blind) Fate.

¹¹ Thamyras Ancient Greek poet deprived of his sight by the Muses for competing with them; Maeonides Homer, the blind author of The Odyssey and The Iliad; Tiresias Greek prophet king blinded either by Hera or by Diana; Phineus Prophet blinded by the gods for telling too many truthful prophecies.

¹² numbers Lines of poetry; wakeful bird Nightingale.

Tunes her nocturnal note. Thus with the year
 Seasons return; but not to me returns
 Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
 Or sight of vernal^o bloom, or summer's rose, spring
 45 Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
 But cloud instead, and ever-during^o dark ever enduring
 Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
 Cut off, and for the book of knowledge¹ fair
 Presented with a universal blank
 50 Of Nature's works to me expunged and razed,
 And Wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.
 So much the rather thou, celestial Light,
 Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
 Irradiate; there plant eyes, all mist from thence 55 Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
 Of things invisible to mortal sight.
 Now had the Almighty Father from above,
 From the pure empyrean² where He sits
 High throned above all height, bent down His eye
 60 His own works and their works at once to view:
 About Him all the sanctities of Heaven³
 Stood thick as stars, and from His sight received
 Beatitude past utterance; on his right
 The radiant image of His glory sat,
 65 His only Son; on earth He first beheld
 Our two first parents, yet^o the only two thus far
 Of mankind in the happy garden placed
 Reaping immortal fruits of joy and love,
 Uninterrupted joy, unrivalled love,
 70 In blissful solitude; He then surveyed
 Hell and the gulf between, and Satan there
 Coasting⁴ the wall of Heav'n on this side night
 In the dun^o air sublime, and ready now dusky
 To stoop^o with wearied wings, and willing feet, swoop
 75 On the bare outside of this world,⁵ that seemed Firm land embosomed,^o without firmament,^o enclosed / sky
 Uncertain which, in ocean or in air.
 Him God beholding from His prospect high,

¹ book of knowledge Nature, often imagined as a book which, like the Bible, can be studied to obtain divinely revealed knowledge.

² empyrean Highest Heaven.

³ sanctities of Heaven Angels.

⁴ Coasting Following the coast of.

⁵ world Not only the earth but the entire universe.

Wherein past, present, future, He beholds,
 80 Thus to His only Son foreseeing spake:
 "Only begotten Son, seest Thou what rage
 Transports Our adversary? whom no bounds
 Prescribed no bars of Hell, nor all the chains
 Heaped on him there, nor yet the main abyss
 85 Wide interrupt,⁶ can hold; so bent he seems
 On desperate revenge, that shall redound
 Upon his own rebellious head. And now,
 Through all restraint broke loose, he wings his way
 Not far off Heav'n, in the precincts of light,
 90 Directly towards the new created world,
 And man there placed, with purpose to assay
 If him by force he can destroy, or, worse,
 By some false guile pervert; and shall pervert;
 For man will hearken to his glozing^o lies, flattering
 95 And easily transgress the sole command,
 Sole pledge of his obedience: so will fall
 He and his faithless progeny: Whose fault?
 Whose but his own? Ingrate, he had of Me
 All he could have; I made him just and right,
 100 Sufficient to have stood, though free to fall.
 Such I created all th' ethereal powers
 And spirits, both them who stood, and them who failed;
 Freely they stood who stood, and fell who fell.
 Not free, what proof could they have given sincere 105 Of true allegiance, constant faith, or love,
 Where only what they needs must do appeared,
 Not what they would? What praise could they receive?
 What pleasure I, from such obedience paid,
 When Will and Reason (Reason also is choice)
 110 Useless and vain, of freedom both despoiled,
 Made passive both, had served necessity,
 Not me? They therefore, as to right belonged,
 So were created, nor can justly accuse
 Their Maker, or their making, or their fate,
 115 As if predestination over-ruled
 Their will disposed by absolute decree
 Or high foreknowledge; they themselves decreed
 Their own revolt, not I: if I foreknew,
 Foreknowledge had no influence on their fault,
 120 Which had no less proved certain unforeknown.
 So without least impulse or shadow of fate,

⁶ Wide interrupt Extensively dividing Hell from Heaven.

Or aught by me immutably foreseen,
 They trespass, authors to themselves in all
 Both what they judge and what they choose; for so 125 I formed them free, and free they must remain,
 Till they enthrall themselves: I else must change
 Their nature, and revoke the high decree
 Unchangeable, eternal, which ordained
 Their freedom, they themselves ordained their fall.
 130 The first sort¹ by their own suggestion fell,
 Self-tempted, self-depraved: Man falls deceived
 By the other first: Man therefore shall find grace,
 The other none: In mercy and justice both,
 Through Heav'n and earth, so shall My glory excel,
 135 But mercy, first and last, shall brightest shine."
 Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance filled
 All Heaven, and in the blessed spirits elect²
 Sense of new joy ineffable diffused.
 Beyond compare the Son of God was seen
 140 Most glorious; in Him all His Father shone
 Substantially expressed;³ and in His face
 Divine compassion visibly appeared,
 Love without end, and without measure grace,
 Which uttering, thus He to His Father spake:
 145 "O Father, gracious was that word which closed
 Thy sovereign sentence, that man should find grace;
 For which both Heav'n and earth shall high extol
 Thy praises, with the innumerable sound
 Of hymns and sacred songs, wherewith Thy throne
 150 Encompassed shall resound Thee ever blest.
 For should Man finally be lost, should Man,
 Thy creature late so loved, thy youngest son,
 Fall circumvented thus by fraud, though joined
 With his own folly? That be from Thee far,
 155 That far be from Thee, Father, who art Judge
 Of all things made, and judgest only right.⁴
 Or shall the adversary thus obtain
 His end, and frustrate Thine? Shall he fulfil
 His malice, and Thy goodness bring to nought,
 160 Or proud return, though to his heavier doom,

¹ The first sort Satan and the other fallen angels.

² spirits elect Unfallen angels.

³ Substantially expressed Physically demonstrated (as opposed to the Father's unseeable greatness).

⁴ who art ... right See Genesis 18.25 for a similar question from Abraham in response to God's plan to destroy Sodom.

Yet with revenge accomplished, and to Hell
 Draw after him the whole race of mankind,
 By him corrupted? Or wilt Thou Thyself
 Abolish Thy creation, and unmake
 165 For him, what for Thy glory Thou hast made?
 So should Thy goodness and Thy greatness both
 Be questioned and blasphemed without defence."

To whom the great Creator thus replied:
 "O Son, in whom My soul hath chief delight,
 170 Son of My bosom, Son who art alone
 My word, My wisdom, and effectual might,
 All hast Thou spoken as My thoughts are, all
 As My eternal purpose hath decreed;
 Man shall not quite be lost, but saved who will;
 175 Yet not of will in him, but grace in Me
 Freely vouchsafed;⁵ once more I will renew given
 His lapsed powers, though forfeit; and enthrall'd
 By sin to foul exorbitant desires;
 Upheld by Me, yet once more he shall stand
 180 On even ground against his mortal foe;
 By Me upheld, that he may know how frail
 His fallen condition is, and to Me owe
 All his deliv'rance, and to none but Me.
 Some I have chosen of peculiar grace,
 185 Elect above the rest;⁶ so is My will:
 The rest shall hear Me call, and oft be warned
 Their sinful state, and to appease betimes
 Th' incens'd deity, while offered grace
 Invites; for I will clear their senses dark,⁶
 190 What may suffice, and soften stony hearts
 To pray, repent, and bring obedience due.
 To prayer, repentance, and obedience due,
 Though but endeavoured with sincere intent,
 Mine ear shall not be slow, Mine eye not shut.
 195 And I will place within them as a guide,
 My umpire Conscience; whom if they will hear,
 Light after light, well used, they shall attain,⁷
 And to the end, persisting, safe arrive.

⁵ Some ... above the rest Contrary to the Calvinist belief that one's fate was predetermined, God offers an opportunity for salvation to all, while still giving special consideration to a chosen few.

⁶ their senses dark Cf. 1 Corinthians 13.12: "For now we see through a glass, darkly."

⁷ Light ... attain If they use their conscience well, they will gain more and more light.

This My long sufferance, and My day of grace,
 They who neglect and scorn, shall never taste;
 But hard be hardened, blind be blinded more,
 That they may stumble on, and deeper fall;
 And none but such from mercy I exclude.
 But yet all is not done; Man disobeying,
 Disloyal, breaks his fealty,^o and sins faith, loyalty
 Against the high supremacy of Heav'n,
 Affecting Godhead,¹ and, so losing all,
 To expiate his treason hath nought left,
 But to destruction sacred and devote,
 He, with his whole posterity, must die,
 Die he or justice must; unless for him
 Some other able, and as willing, pay
 The rigid satisfaction, death for death.
 Say, heavenly powers, where shall we find such love?
 Which of you will be mortal,² to redeem
 Man's mortal crime, and just the unjust to save,
 Dwells in all Heaven charity so dear?"
 He asked, but all the heav'nly choir stood mute,
 And silence was in Heav'n: on man's behalf
 Patron or intercessor none appeared,
 Much less that durst upon his own head draw
 The deadly forfeiture, and ransom set.
 And now without redemption all mankind
 Must have been lost, adjudged to death and Hell
 By doom severe, had not the Son of God,
 In whom the fullness dwells of love divine,
 His dearest mediation thus renewed:
 "Father, Thy word is past, Man shall find grace;
 And shall grace not find means, that finds her way,
 The speediest of Thy winged messengers,
 To visit all Thy creatures, and to all
 Comes unprevented,^o unimplor'd, unsought? unexpected
 Happy for Man, so coming; he her aid
 Can never seek, once dead in sins, and lost;
 Atonement for himself, or offering meet,^o suitable
 Indebted and undone, hath none to bring;
 Behold Me then: Me for him, life for life
 I offer: on Me let Thine anger fall;
 Account Me Man; I for his sake will leave

Thy bosom, and this glory next to Thee
 Freely put off, and for him lastly die
 Well pleased; on Me let Death wreak all his rage.
 Under his gloomy power I shall not long
 Lie vanquished. Thou hast giv'n Me to possess
 Life in Myself for ever; by Thee I live;
 Though now to Death I yield, and am his due,
 All that of Me can die, yet, that debt paid,
 Thou wilt not leave Me in the loathsome grave
 His prey, nor suffer my unspotted soul
 For ever with corruption there to dwell;
 But I shall rise victorious, and subdue
 My vanquisher, spoiled of his vaunted spoil.
 Death his death's wound shall then receive, and stoop
 Inglorious, of his mortal sting disarmed;³
 I through the ample air in triumph high
 Shall lead Hell captive maugre⁴ Hell, and show
 The powers of darkness bound. Thou, at the sight
 Pleased, out of Heaven shall look down and smile,
 While, by Thee raised, I ruin^o all My foes; overthrow
 Death last, and with his carcass glut the grave;
 Then, with the multitude of My redeemed,
 Shall enter Heaven, long absent, and return,
 Father, to see Thy face, wherein no cloud
 Of anger shall remain, but peace assured
 And reconciliation: wrath shall be no more Thenceforth, but in Thy presence joy entire."
 His words here ended; but His meek aspect
 Silent yet spake, and breathed immortal love
 To mortal men, above which only shone
 Filial⁵ obedience: as a sacrifice
 Glad to be offered, He attends the will
 Of His great Father. Admiration seized
 All Heav'n, what this might mean, and whither tend,
 Wondering; but soon th' Almighty thus replied:
 "O Thou in Heav'n and earth the only peace
 Found out for mankind under wrath, O Thou
 My sole complacence!⁶ Well Thou know'st how dear
 To Me are all My works; nor Man the least,
 Though last created, that for him I spare

¹ Affecting Godhead Desiring or pursuing God's power and position.

² mortal Human, though in the next line the word takes on a meaning of "lethal."

³ Death ... his mortal sting disarmed See 1 Corinthians 15.55.

⁴ maugre In spite of.

⁵ Filial Proper for a child/parent relationship.

⁶ complacence Here, source of satisfaction.

280 Thee from My bosom and right hand, to save,
 By losing Thee a while, the whole race lost.
 Thou, therefore, whom Thou only canst redeem,
 Their nature also to Thy nature join;
 And be Thyself Man among men on earth,
 285 Made flesh, when time shall be, of virgin seed,
 By wondrous birth; be Thou in Adam's room¹
 The head of all mankind, though Adam's son.²
 As in him perish all men, so in Thee,
 As from a second root, shall be restored
 290 As many as are restored, without Thee none.
 His crime makes guilty all his sons; Thy merit,
 Imputed, shall absolve them who renounce
 Their own both righteous and unrighteous deeds,
 And live in Thee transplanted, and from Thee
 295 Receive new life.³ So Man, as is most just,
 Shall satisfy for Man, be judged and die,
 And dying rise, and rising with Him raise
 His brethren, ransomed with His own dear life.
 So heavenly love shall outdo hellish hate,
 300 Giving to death, and dying to redeem,
 So dearly to redeem what hellish hate
 So easily destroyed, and still destroys
 In those who, when they may, accept not grace.
 Nor shalt Thou, by descending to assume 305 Man's nature, lessen or degrade Thine own.
 Because Thou hast, though throned in highest bliss
 Equal to God, and equally enjoying
 God-like fruition,^o quitted all, to save enjoyment
 A world from utter loss, and hast been found
 310 By merit more than birthright⁴ Son of God,
 Found worthiest to be so by being good,
 Far more than great or high; because in Thee
 Love hath abounded more than glory abounds;
 Therefore Thy humiliation shall exalt
 315 With Thee Thy manhood also to this throne:

² Adam's son The Son preexists all beings, but in becoming human he also becomes a son of Adam.

³ Thy merit ... new life Through the Son's absorbing mankind's crimes but also through a transfer of the Son's goodness to mankind, salvation is made possible for all. See Romans 5.18–21.

⁴ By merit ... birthright Contrary to doctrine, Milton suggests the Son deserves his role due to his own merit rather than through inheritance.

Here shalt thou sit incarnate, here shalt reign
 Both God and Man, Son both of God and Man,
 Anointed⁵ universal King; all power
 I give Thee; reign forever, and assume 320 Thy merits; under Thee, as Head Supreme,
 Thrones, principdoms, powers, dominions, I reduce:
 All knees to Thee shall bow, of them that bide^o live
 In Heav'n, or earth, or under earth in Hell.
 When Thou, attended gloriously from Heav'n,
 325 Shalt in the sky appear, and from Thee send
 The summoning arch-angels to proclaim
 Thy dread tribunal; forthwith from all winds,
 The living, and forthwith the cited^o dead called forth
 Of all past ages, to the general doom^o judgment
 330 Shall hasten; such a peal shall rouse their sleep.
 Then, all Thy saints assembled, Thou shalt judge
 Bad men and angels; they, arraigned, shall sink
 Beneath Thy sentence; Hell, her numbers full,
 Thenceforth shall be forever shut. Meanwhile
 335 The world shall burn, and from her ashes spring
 New Heav'n and earth,⁶ wherein the just shall dwell,
 And, after all their tribulations long,
 See golden days, fruitful of golden deeds,
 With joy and peace triumphing, and fair truth.
 340 Then Thou Thy regal sceptre shall lay by,
 For regal sceptre then no more shall need,
 God shall be all in all.⁷ But, all ye gods,^o angels
 Adore Him, who to compass all this dies;
 Adore the Son, and honour Him as Me."
 345 No sooner had th' Almighty ceased, but all
 The multitude of angels, with a shout
 Loud as from numbers without number, sweet
 As from blest voices, uttering joy, Heav'n rung
 With jubilee, and loud hosannas⁸ filled
 350 Th' eternal regions: lowly reverent
 Towards either throne⁹ they bow, and to the ground
 With solemn adoration down they cast

⁵ Anointed The Hebrew title "Messiah," bestowed on the Son, translates to "Anointed."

⁶ New Heav'n and earth See Matthew 24.30–31.

⁷ When Thou, attended ... be all in all This account of the end of all things is paraphrased from the Book of Revelation.

⁸ hosannas Shouts of fervent and worshipful praise.

⁹ either throne Both the throne of God and the throne of the Son of God.

Their crowns inwove with amarant¹ and gold;
 Immortal amarant, a flower which once
 355 In Paradise, fast° by the tree of life, near
 Began to bloom; but soon for man's offence
 To Heav'n removed, where first it grew, there grows,
 And flowers aloft shading the fount of life,
 And where the river of bliss through midst of Heav'n
 360 Rolls o'er Elysian° flowers her amber paradisiacal stream;
 With these that never fade the spirits elect
 Bind their resplendent locks enwreathed with beams;
 Now in loose garlands thick thrown off, the bright
 Pavement, that like a sea of jasper shone,
 365 Empurpled with celestial roses smiled.
 Then, crowned again, their golden harps they took,
 Harps ever tuned, that glittering by their side
 Like quivers hung, and with preamble sweet
 Of charming symphony they introduce 370 Their sacred song, and waken raptures high;
 No voice exempt, no voice but well could join
 Melodious part, such concord is in Heav'n. ...

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 4

Satan now in prospect of Eden, and nigh the place where he must now attempt the bold enterprise which he undertook alone against God and man, falls into many doubts with himself, and many passions, fear, envy, and despair; but at length confirms himself in evil, journeys on to Paradise, whose outward prospect and situation is described, overleaps the bounds, sits in the shape of a cormorant² on the Tree of Life, as highest in the garden to look about him. The garden described; Satan's first sight of Adam and Eve; his wonder at their excellent form and happy state, but with resolution to work their fall; overhears their discourse, thence gathers that the Tree of Knowledge was forbidden them to eat of, under penalty of death; and thereon intends to found his temptation, by seducing them to transgress:
 then leaves them a while, to know further of their state

² cormorant Sea-bird associated with avarice.

by some other means. Meanwhile Uriel descending on a sunbeam warns Gabriel, who had in charge the gate of Paradise, that some evil spirit had escaped the deep, and passed at noon by his sphere in the shape of a good angel down to Paradise, discovered after by his furious gestures in the Mount. Gabriel promises to find him out ere morning. Night coming on, Adam and Eve discourse of going to their rest: their bower described; their evening worship. Gabriel drawing forth his bands of night watch to walk the round of Paradise, appoints two strong angels to Adam's bower, lest the evil spirit should be there doing some harm to Adam or Eve sleeping; there they find him at the ear of Eve, tempting her in a dream, and bring him, though unwilling, to Gabriel; by whom questioned, he scornfully answers, prepares resistance, but hindered by a sign from Heaven,
 flies out of Paradise.

BOOK 4

O, for that warning voice, which he, who saw
 Th' Apocalypse, heard cry in Heaven aloud,
 Then when the Dragon, put to second rout,³
 Came furious down to be revenged on men,
 5 Woe to the inhabitants on earth! That now,
 While time was,⁴ our first parents had been warned
 The coming of their secret foe, and 'scaped,
 Haply so 'scaped his mortal snare: For now
 Satan, now first inflamed with rage, came down, 10 The tempter ere° th' accuser of mankind, before becoming
 To wreak on innocent frail man his loss
 Of that first battle, and his flight to Hell:
 Yet, not rejoicing in his speed, though bold
 Far off and fearless, nor with cause to boast,
 15 Begins his dire attempt; which nigh the birth
 Now rolling boils in his tumultuous breast,
 And like a devilish engine back recoils
 Upon himself; horror and doubt distract
 His troubled thoughts, and from the bottom stir
 20 The Hell within him; for within him Hell

³ O, for that ... to second rout See the Book of Revelation, specifically Revelation 1.10.

⁴ That now / While time was If that had happened now, while there was still time.

He brings, and round about him, nor from Hell
 One step, no more than from himself, can fly
 By change of place: Now conscience wakes despair,
 That slumbered; wakes the bitter memory
 25 Of what he was, what is, and what must be Worse; of worse deeds worse sufferings must ensue.
 Sometimes towards Eden, which now in his view
 Lay pleasant, his grieved look he fixes sad;
 Sometimes towards Heav'n, and the full-blazing sun,
 30 Which now sat high in his meridian^o tower: noon-time
 Then, much revolving,^o thus in sighs began: pondering
 "O thou that with surpassing glory crowned
 Lookest from thy sole dominion like the God
 Of this new world; at whose sight all the stars
 Hide their diminished heads; to thee I call,
 35 But with no friendly voice, and add thy name,
 Of sun to tell thee how I hate thy beams,
 That bring to my remembrance from what state
 I fell, how glorious once above thy sphere;
 40 Till Pride and worse Ambition threw me down
 Warring in Heav'n against Heav'n's matchless King:
 Ah, wherefore! He deserved no such return^o repayment
 From me, whom He created what I was
 In that bright eminence, and with His good
 45 Upbraided^o none; nor was His service hard. admonished
 What could be less than to afford Him praise,
 The easiest recompense, and pay Him thanks,
 How due! Yet all His good proved ill in me,
 And wrought but malice; lifted up so high 50 I 'sdained^o subjection, and thought one disdained
 step higher
 Would set me highest, and in a moment quit^o repay
 The debt immense of endless gratitude,
 So burdensome still paying, still to owe,
 Forgetful what from Him I still received,
 55 And understood not that a grateful mind
 By owing owes not, but still pays, at once
 Indebted and discharged; what burden then
 O, had His powerful destiny ordained
 Me some inferior angel, I had stood
 60 Then happy; no unbounded hope had raised
 Ambition! Yet why not some other power
 As great might have aspired, and me, though mean,^o lowly
 Drawn to his part; but other powers as great

Fell not, but stand unshaken, from within 65 Or from without, to all temptations armed.
 Hadst thou the same free will and power to stand?
 Thou hadst: whom hast thou then or what to accuse,
 But Heav'n's free love dealt equally to all?
 Be then his love accursed, since love or hate,
 70 To me alike, it deals eternal woe.
 Nay, cursed be thou; since against His thy will Chose freely what it now so justly rues.
 Me miserable! which way shall I fly
 Infinite wrath, and infinite despair?
 75 Which way I fly is Hell; myself am Hell;
 And, in the lowest deep, a lower deep
 Still threatening to devour me opens wide,
 To which the Hell I suffer seems a Heav'n.
 O, then, at last relent: Is there no place
 80 Left for repentance, none for pardon left?
 None left but by submission; and that word
 Disdain forbids me, and my dread of shame
 Among the spirits beneath, whom I seduced
 With other promises and other vaunts
 85 Than to submit, boasting I could subdue
 Th' Omnipotent. Ay me! They little know
 How dearly I abide^o that boast so vain, bear
 Under what torments inwardly I groan,
 While they adore me on the throne of Hell.
 90 With diadem and sceptre high advanced,
 The lower still I fall, only supreme
 In misery: such joy ambition finds.
 But say I could repent, and could obtain,
 By act of grace,¹ my former state; how soon
 95 Would height recall high thoughts, how soon unsay
 What feigned submission swore? Ease would recant
 Vows made in pain, as violent² and void.
 For never can true reconciliation grow,
 Where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep:
 100 Which would but lead me to a worse relapse
 And heavier fall: so should I purchase dear
 Short intermission bought with double smart.
 This knows my punisher; therefore as far
 From granting He, as I from begging, peace;
 105 All hope excluded thus, behold, instead
 Of us outcast, exiled, His new delight,

² violent Obtained through force.

Mankind created, and for Him this world.
 So farewell, hope; and with hope farewell, fear;
 Farewell, remorse: all good to me is lost;
 110 Evil, be thou my good; by thee at least Divided empire with Heav'n's King I hold,
 By thee, and more than half perhaps will reign;
 As man ere long, and this new world, shall know."
 Thus while he spake, each passion dimmed his face
 115 Thrice changed with pale,⁹ ire, envy, and despair; paleness
 Which marred his borrowed visage,¹ and betrayed
 Him counterfeit, if any eye beheld.
 For heav'nly minds from such distempers foul
 Are ever clear. Whereof he soon aware,
 120 Each perturbation smoothed with outward calm,
 Artificer of fraud; and was the first
 That practised falsehood² under saintly show,
 Deep malice to conceal, couched³ with revenge:
 Yet not enough had practised to deceive
 125 Uriel⁴ once warned; whose eye pursued him down
 The way he went, and on the Assyrian mount⁵
 Saw him disfigured more than could befall
 Spirit of happy sort; his gestures fierce
 He marked and mad demeanour, then alone,
 130 As he supposed, all unobserved, unseen.
 So on he fares, and to the border comes
 Of Eden, where delicious Paradise,⁶
 Now nearer, crowns with her enclosure green,
 As with a rural mound, the champaign head
 135 Of a steep wilderness,⁷ whose hairy⁸ sides forested
 With thicket overgrown, grotesque⁸ and wild,

¹ his borrowed visage Satan had disguised himself as a "stripling cherub" at the end of Book 3, to fool the angel Uriel into telling him where Earth was.

² first/ That practised falsehood Satan is known as the originator of lies.

³ couched Lying closely next to.

⁴ Uriel Angel standing guard on the sun; the name literally means "fire of God."

⁵ the Assyrian mount Mount Niphates in Syria, named in Book 3 as Satan's landing place.

⁶ Paradise Hilltop garden found east of Eden.

⁷ champaign ... wilderness Pastoral meadow at the foot of a steep and wooded slope.

⁸ grotesque Resembling a grotto, with overgrown vegetation.

Access denied; and overhead up grew
 Insuperable height of loftiest shade,
 Cedar, and pine, and fir, and branching palm,
 140 A sylvan scene, and, as the ranks ascend,
 Shade above shade, a woody theatre⁹
 Of stateliest view. Yet higher than their tops
 The verdurous wall of Paradise upsprung;
 Which to our general sire⁹ gave prospect large i.e., Adam
 145 Into his nether empire neighbouring round.
 And higher than that wall a circling row
 Of goodliest trees, laden with fairest fruit,
 Blossoms and fruits at once of golden hue,
 Appeared, with gay enamelled⁹ colours mixed: vivid
 150 On which the sun more glad impressed his beams
 Than in fair evening cloud, or humid bow,¹⁰
 When God hath showered the earth; so lovely seemed
 That landskip:⁹ And of pure now purer air landscape
 Meets his approach, and to the heart inspires⁹ imbues
 155 Vernal delight and joy, able to drive
 All sadness but despair: now gentle gales,
 Fanning their odoriferous wings, dispense
 Native perfumes, and whisper whence they stole
 Those balmy spoils. As when to them who fail
 160 Beyond the Cape of Hope, and now are past
 Mozambique, off at sea northeast winds blow
 Sabean¹¹ odours from the spicy shore
 Of Araby the blest; with such delay
 Well pleased they slack their course, and many a league
 165 Cheered with the grateful⁹ smell old ocean enjoyable smiles:
 So entertained those odorous sweets the fiend,
 Who came their bane; though with them better pleased
 Than Asmodeus with the fishy fume
 That drove him, though enamoured, from the spouse
 170 Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sent
 From Media post to Egypt,¹² there fast bound.

⁹ woody theatre Wood with tiers reminiscent of those in an amphitheater of ancient drama.

¹⁰ humid bow Rainbow.

¹¹ Sabean Exotic; from Sheba, modern-day Yemen.

¹² Than Asmodeus ... post to Egypt Story from the Apocryphal Book of Tobit, in which Tobit's son Tobias, to win the hand of Sara, defeats the incubus Asmodeus by burning the liver of a certain fish to call the archangel Raphael, who "took the devil, and bound him in the desert of upper Egypt" (Tobit 8.3).

Now to th' ascent of that steep savage hill
 Satan had journeyed on, pensive and slow;
 But further way found none, so thick entwined,
 175 As one continued brake,^o the undergrowth thicket
 Of shrubs and tangling bushes had perplexed
 All path of man or beast that passed that way.
 One gate there only was, and that looked east
 On the other side: which when the arch-felon saw,
 180 Due entrance he disdained; and, in contempt,
 At one slight bound high over-leaped all bound
 Of hill or highest wall, and sheer^o within entirely
 Lights on his feet. As when a prowling wolf,
 Whom hunger drives to seek new haunt for prey,
 185 Watching where shepherds pen their flocks at eve
 In hurdled cotes¹ amid the field secure,
 Leaps o'er the fence with ease into the fold:
 Or as a thief, bent to unhoard the cash
 Of some rich burgher,^o whose substantial merchant doors,
 190 Cross-barred and bolted fast, fear no assault,
 In at the window climbs, or o'er the tiles:^o shingles
 So clomb^o this first grand thief into God's fold; climbed
 So since into his church lewd hirelings² climb.
 Thence up he flew, and on the tree of life,
 195 The middle tree and highest there that grew,
 Sat like a cormorant; yet not true life
 Thereby regained, but sat devising death
 To them who lived; nor on the virtue thought
 Of that life-giving plant, but only used
 200 For prospect³ what well used had been the pledge
 Of immortality. So little knows
 Any, but God alone, to value right
 The good before him, but perverts best things
 To worst abuse, or to their meanest use.
 205 Beneath him with new wonder now he views,
 To all delight of human sense exposed,
 In narrow room, nature's whole wealth, yea more,
 A Heav'n on Earth: For blissful paradise
 Of God the garden was, by Him in the east
 210 Of Eden planted; Eden stretched her line
 From Auran^o eastward to the royal towers Israel

Of great Seleucia,^o built by Grecian kings, Iraq
 Of where the sons of Eden long before
 Dwelt in Telassar:⁴ In this pleasant soil
 215 His far more pleasant garden God ordained;
 Out of the fertile ground He caused to grow
 All trees of noblest kind for sight, smell, taste;
 And all amid them stood the tree of life,
 High eminent, blooming ambrosial fruit
 220 Of vegetable gold; and next to life,
 Our death, the tree of knowledge, grew fast by,
 Knowledge of good bought dear by knowing ill.
 Southward through Eden went a river large,⁵
 Nor changed his course, but through the shaggy hill
 225 Passed underneath engulfed; for God had thrown
 That mountain as His garden-mould⁶ high raised
 Upon the rapid current, which, through veins
 Of porous earth with kindly^o thirst up-drawn, suitable
 Rose a fresh fountain, and with many a rill^o stream
 230 Watered the garden; thence united fell
 Down the steep glade, and met the nether flood,
 Which from his darksome passage now appears,
 And now, divided into four main streams,
 Runs diverse, wandering many a famous realm
 235 And country, whereof here needs no account;
 But rather to tell how, if art could tell,
 How from that sapphire fount the crisped^o waving
 brooks,
 Rolling on orient pearl and sands of gold,
 With mazy error^o under pendant shades meander
 240 Ran nectar, visiting each plant, and fed
 Flowers worthy of Paradise, which not nice^o art careful
 In beds and curious knots, but nature boon^o abundant
 Poured forth profuse on hill, and dale, and plain,
 Both where the morning sun first warmly smote
 245 The open field, and where the unpierced shade
 Imbrowned^o the noontide bowers: Thus darkened was this place
 A happy rural seat of various view;
 Groves whose rich trees wept odorous gums and balm,
 Others whose fruit, burnished with golden rind,

² hirelings Ministers supported by obligatory tithes or taxes. Milton did not believe in a salaried clergy.

³ used / For prospect Used as a perch.

⁴ Telassar Province in southeast Syria.

⁵ river large River Tigris, which runs from Turkey to the Persian Gulf.

⁶ garden-mould Fertile soil.

250 Hung amiable, Hesperian fables¹ true,
 If true, here only, and of delicious taste:
 Betwixt them lawns, or level downs,^o and flocks elevations
 Grazing the tender herb, were interposed,
 Or palmy hillock; or the flowery lap
 255 Of some irriguous^o valley spread her store, watered
 Flowers of all hue, and without thorn the rose:
 Another side, umbrageous grots² and caves
 Of cool recess, o'er which the mantling^o vine climbing
 Lays forth her purple grape, and gently creeps
 260 Luxuriant; meanwhile murmuring waters fall
 Down the slope hills, dispersed, or in a lake,
 That to the fringed bank with myrtle crowned
 Her crystal mirror holds, unite their streams.
 The birds their choir apply; airs,³ vernal airs,
 265 Breathing the smell of field and grove, attune
 The trembling leaves, while universal Pan,
 Knit with the Graces and the Hours⁴ in dance,
 Led on the eternal spring. Not that fair field
 Of Enna,⁵ where Proserpine gathering flowers,
 270 Herself a fairer flower by gloomy Dis
 Was gathered, which cost Ceres all that pain
 To seek her through the world;⁶ nor that sweet grove
 Of Daphne by Orontes,⁷ and the inspired
 Castilian spring,⁸ might with this Paradise

¹ Hesperian fables In classical mythology, nymphs called the Hesperides guarded a tree of golden apples.

² umbrageous grots Shadowy grottos.

³ their choir apply Sing; airs Winds, but also songs.

⁴ Pan Classical god of nature; Knit Taking hands with; Graces Sister goddesses of charm and beauty; Hours Horae, various goddesses of the hours, seasons, and other aspects of time.

⁵ Enna Meadow in Sicily.

⁶ Proserpine ... world Proserpine, the daughter of the goddess of agriculture and the harvest, Ceres, was kidnapped by the god of the underworld, Dis (Hades or Pluto). Proserpine's mother went into mourning, thereby bringing winter to the land. Disagreed to return Proserpine to her mother for half the year; hence, the seasons of summer and winter.

⁷ that sweet ... by Orontes Daphne was a Naiad, a spirit charged with safekeeping of rivers, streams, and brooks. She was willingly transformed into a laurel tree to avoid Apollo's amorous pursuit; this event was supposed to have happened near the river Orontes, where it crosses through Syria, and to have resulted in a peaceful grotto beneath the transfigured laurel, now sacred to Apollo.

⁸ inspired / Castilian spring Spring of the Muses on Mount Parnassus.

275 Of Eden strive; nor that Nyseian⁹ isle
 Girt with the river Triton,¹⁰ where old Cham,
 Whom Gentiles Ammon call and Libyan Jove,¹¹
 Hid Amalthea, and her florid son
 Young Bacchus, from his stepdame Rhea's eye;¹² 280 Nor where Abassin^o kings their issue,^o Abyssinian / offspring
 guard,
 Mount Amara,¹³ though this by some supposed
 True Paradise under the Ethiop line¹⁴
 By Nilus' head,¹⁵ enclosed with shining rock,
 A whole day's journey high, but wide remote
 285 From this Assyrian garden, where the fiend
 Saw, undelighted, all delight, all kind
 Of living creatures, new to sight, and strange
 Two of far nobler shape, erect and tall,
 Godlike erect, with native honour clad 290 In naked majesty seemed lords of all:
 And worthy seemed; for in their looks divine
 The image of their glorious Maker shone,
 Truth, wisdom, sanctitude severe and pure
 (Severe, but in true filial freedom placed),
 295 Whence true authority in men; though both
 Not equal, as their sex not equal seemed;
 For contemplation he and valour formed;
 For softness she and sweet attractive grace;
 He for God only, she for God in him!¹⁶
 300 His fair large front and eye sublime declared
 Absolute rule; and hyacinthine¹⁷ locks

⁹ Nyseian Of Nyseia, an ancient Mediterranean country.

¹⁰ the river Triton Modern-day Gazanos River.

¹¹ Cham ... Ammon ... Jove Cham (the Biblical Ham, son of Noah) was sometimes said to be the same as the pagan Ammon and the Libyan version of Jove.
